Throne which ſhe hopes to aſcend, and have ſo much Satisfaction as to ſee her without a King, without a Kingdom, without Subjects, and without a Slave, I ſhall be the happieſt Man alive: Yes, yes, Sir, replied I, ſo you would, if you could bring your ſelf once to that paſs, as to hate her, or at leaſt not to love her: for if you think to be revenged of her by ſtill loving her, believe me, Sir, the Revenge will light upon your ſelf. Though it ſhould (ſaid he to me) yet I ſhould do as if I were happy; for I do profeſs, that I would die a thouſand times, rather than Elibeſis ſhould ever know that I do not hate her: So that if I could be as happy as I could wiſh, and could not conceal my ſelf, rather than tell her that I loved her, I would hide my ſelf; and to be ſincere with you, I have long time ſince reſolved, that as ſoon as I have revenged my ſelf upon my Rival, to begin a new form of Life, and leave off the Company of all ſuch as Fortune hath been pleaſed to ſet above me, for I am ſo weary of ſeeing my ſelf below them, that I cannot endure it: Indeed I can neither flatter them, nor crouch unto them. Moreover, there is one ſtrong Fancy in my Mind which mightily torments, and ſince I muſt diſcover my weakneſs unto you, I will tell you what it is: Know then, that I cannot ſee Men ſuperiour to me, do any thing ill-favouredly, but I am infinitely angry at Fortune for placing them in that condition they are; it is not out of any Tenderneſs that I do intereſt my ſelf in their Imperfections; but on the contrary, there is an Antipathy in my Nature againſt all that are above me, which is the reaſon that I cannot endure to ſee Princes either weak, or timerous, or covetous, or fooliſh; when I ſee ſuch, I cannot chuſe but curſe Fortune, becauſe ſhe did not rank them according to their Merit: Truth is, I am ſo unable to endure that ill-favoured Men ſhould be placed above me, that I cannot brook Vulcan ſhould be ranked amongſt the Gods: Judg then, whether I can allow ſuch as have the Hearts of Slaves, the Ruſticity of a poor Fiſherman, the Language of a baſe Tradeſman, ſhould be ranked in the Catalogue of Princes: If Elibeſis, Sir, (ſaid I unto him, and ſmiled) did hear what you ſay, ſhe would, according to her cuſtom, accuſe you of Prophanation, and I think ſhe had good reaſon for it. I know not what reaſon ſhe hath (ſaid he unto me) but I am ſure I have reaſon to take it ill ſhe ſhould betray me, and to be glad that I have vexed her.

But, Sir, to return unto Noromanta, give me leave to tell you, that this purely virtuous Perſon, after ſhe had ſpent the whole Night in ſorrow, and ſeeking Remedy againſt ſuch an important Miſery, ſhe had a new cauſe of Grief, for ſhe received a Letter from her Father who was with Thomiris; and who knowing that Adonacris was at Iſſedon, not being ignorant of his correſpondency with Noromanta before her Marriage, did ſend her word, that if ever he heard ſhe let Adonacris come into her Houſe, he would make her the moſt miſerable Woman of her Sex. So that being on all ſides overwhelmed with Sorrows, ſhe took the moſt generous Reſolution in the World, maugre all her tenderneſs to Adonacris, and her averſion to Sitalces. For, Sir, ſince ſhe did apprehend it not handſome to exchange a Lover for a Husband, ſhe reſolved to juſtify her ſelf in her Husband's Opinion, and to let him ſee ſhe was no Obſtacle unto his Liberty; She reſolved, I ſay, to ſteal out of Tipanis, and to return unto Iſſedon to Sitalces: But alas, Sir, this Reſolution was not without many a Tear, and much ado to execute; yet ſince there was no other Remedy to redeem her Reputation, ſhe fully determined upon it (maugre her repugnancy) to leave him ſhe loved, and to go unto him ſhe hated: The tender affection of her Heart unto Adonacris, moved her to wiſh that ſhe could ſpeak once more in her life unto him, to know by what ſad chance her Letters came into her Husband's hands, but ſhe could not find a fit opportunity, unleſs ſhe ſhould do him ſuch a favour as ſhe ſhould upbraid her ſelf withal, therefore ſhe never went about it; but Fortune having no mind they ſhould part in ſilence, did bring it to paſs without her medling in it, as I ſhall hereafter tell you.

In the mean time Noromanta contriving a way how to get out of Tipanis, and to paſs the Guards and Sparga- piſes ſafely, ſhe did at laſt hit upon one which did happily atchieve it. She went unto Eliorante, and told her, as ſhe might truly, that her Husband had a Servant whom he loved very well, who was taken Priſoner with her, and who was married a little before he was taken. But to advance her Deſign, ſhe added a Lye unto this Truth, and told her, that the Wife of this Servant hearing that her Husband was fallen ſick at Iſſedon, and earneſtly deſired to ſee her, ſhe was very deſirous to go thither unto him. After which, Noromanta aggravating the Sorrows of this Wife, deſired Eliorantes favour to procure a Paſport for her, conjuring her to ſolicite her Husband for it, and not let any know that ſhe did meddle in the Buſineſs: For (ſaid ſhe unto her, with much ſubtilty) I have ſo many things to ask of Spargapiſes and Agatherſes, concerning my Husband's Liberty, that I ſhould be unwilling to trouble them with the Buſineſs of others, eſpecially in a Buſineſs which is of no great importance. Eliorante being glad of any opportunity to oblige Noromanta, did never examine her Reaſons any further, but told her, that if ſhe would ſtay half an hour in her Chamber, ſhe would give her an accompt how ready ſhe was to ſatisfy her deſires: She had no ſooner ſaid ſo, but Adonacris, as if he deſtined to ſpeak unto Noromanta no where but at Eliorantes, did enter: So that Eliorante ſeeing him, Sir, ſaid ſhe, I once before entreated you to entertain Noromanta whilſt I retired unto my Cloſet; and I beſeech you once again to make the time ſeem leſs tedious unto her, whilſt I go a little and execute ſome of her Commands. I know not, Madam, replied Adonacris, whether I ſhall be able to fulfil your Commands; but I am ſure, that though I do not divert her as I deſire, yet my Intentions are to do nothing that ſhall diſpleaſe her. After this, Eliorante went out to mediate unto her Husband in Noromanta's Buſineſs: So as theſe two Perſons who had moſt violent inclinations to love each other, and who yet had thoughts very different, had the freedom of talk together; yet they ſaid not what they thought, for Noromanta never acquainted Adonacris with her deſign of going unto Sitalces, talces, leſt he ſhould hinder her; And Adonacris never acquainted Noromanta with the Letter which Argiriſpe ſent unto him, leſt it ſhould grieve her. Noromanta on her ſide would not tell him of thoſe Letters which Sitalces had ſeen, tho ſhe had a great deſire unto it; for ſhe conſidered, that though his Baggage was loſt, and was the cauſe of it, yet the Fault was not in him. Alſo ſince ſhe could not tell him of it, without making him the Confident of her Husband's Jealouſy, ſhe could not do it, thinking it would oblige Adonacris too much, and conſequently reflect upon her Honour: But conſidering, that though ſhe had now the liberty to talk unto him, yet ſhe was never like to have it again, ſhe could not chuſe but ſigh. Adonacris obſerving it, and ſeeing her Eyes full of Curioſity: I know, Madam, (ſaid he unto her) that I ſhall very ill acquit my ſelf of that Commiſſion which Eliorante hath given me to divert you; and I know too well, by that ſigh which I heard, that my Company is not pleaſing enough to keep you from ſome angry Thoughts. Doubtleſs, Sir, replied ſhe, my Thoughts do not pleaſe me, but I will be ſo juſt as not to accuſe you for it, and ask your pardon that I do not force my ſelf unto more complacency. O, Madam, (ſaid Adonacris) It is moſt injurious to ask this pardon; and I have more reaſon to complain that you will not tell me the cauſe of that Sigh, than complain of you for ſighing: For, truly, Madam, methinks the leaſt part that I can pretend unto in your Confidence, is that of your Sorrows: But, Madam, to ſhew that I am eaſily contented in my Paſſion, I will ask of you leſs than ever any Lover did, and declare unto you, that if you will be pleaſed to grant it, I will never complain of you. Though you may ask it, Sir, replied ſhe, as my Lover, yet you ſhall never obtain it. I will ask then as your Friend, Madam, replied he, ſince the Name of Lover is offenſive to you; but I beſeech you let it be as a Friend who loves none elſe but you, nor ever will: I only ask the favour to know all your Griefs; conceal all your Joys from me, but I beſeech you make me a Partner in your Sorrows, and let me know why you ſighed?

After this, I am confident you will not ſay I ask too much, and that my Affection is hard to be ſatisfied, ſince I only ask to be a ſharer in a Sigh, and to know the cauſe of it. In demanding that, Sir, replied Noromanta, you ask perhaps more than you are aware, and more than I can grant: The truth is, there are ſome Sorrows which one cannot impart without being too much engaged, and my Humour is ſuch, that the moſt engaging thing which I can do for thoſe I love, is to truſt them with mine, and to make them ſharers with me. Then, Madam (replied Adonacris) I beſeech you tell me what it was which made you ſigh, for I muſt confeſs. I cannot underſtand the cauſe of it. Without further examination of Cauſes, replied ſhe, I aſſure you I neither can nor will tell you; for the truth is, Adonacris, Reaſon will not permit me to put confidence in a Man whom I ought not to ſee, and unto whom I ought not to ſpeak as I do, if I ſhould keep my ſelf to the limits of exact Vertue: And this is the laſt day I intend to hold any private conference with you, and to behave my ſelf ſo, as you ſhall have none with me, for I will never upbraid my ſelf with doing more than I ought to have done. Alas, Madam, (ſaid Adonacris) if you do now no more than you ought, it may be ſaid that you do nothing; for it is impoſſible one ſhould do leſs than you have done: But, Madam, if it be your reſolution that I ſhall never talk with you in private after this day, then you muſt this day regulate all the reſt of my Life, and tell me what is your pleaſure I ſhall do: I do profeſs I will never either do, or ſay, or think any thing which ſhall diſpleaſe you. If ſo, replied Noromanta, I will once in my life make uſe of that Power which I have over you; but, Adonacris, it ſhall be in commanding you to live as well with Argiriſpe, as I am reſolved to do with Sitalces, and in conjuring you not to tell ſo much as your ſelf, that ever you loved me, nor to think any more of any thing which may renew the memory of our Friendſhip. Alas, Madam, replied Adonacris, if you would be obeyed, you muſt command ſuch things as can be done; but here you command me three things, two of which are abſolute Impoſſibilities, and the other an extream Difficulty; I muſt, Madam, maugre your Command, tell my ſelf, that I do love you, ſince it is not your pleaſure I ſhould tell you of it; I muſt needs, I cannot chuſe, but think of you, ſince you will not give me leave to talk to you: Yes, yes, Madam, I muſt both think and ſpeak of you, ſince I can neither think or ſpeak of any thing elſe, not but that I have done all I am able to forget you: But, alas, I have done it in vain, for wheresoever I go, and whatſoever I do, my imagination is all on you: when I have been in the Wars, in the very heat of Fight, and moſt dangerous Occurrences, my Mind hath ſtill kept to its ordinary Object: if I come into any Company where you are not, I preſently lament your Abſence, and value not their Preſence: I never walk out, but my Mind is pleaſingly fill'd with a thouſand thoughts of what you have done, and of what I have heard you ſay, and my Sleep is nothing but Dreams of you: And, Madam, if I could tell you, without hinting my crimes unto you, I would ſay, that I did not marry Argiriſpe without a thought of Noronanta, as perfidious as ſhe hath been unto me; and if I could ſhew you the ſtate of my Soul, when after your Example I did for ever engage my ſelf, you would ſee that my Heart diſavowed all the words of engagement which my Tongue pronounced, and I thought more of what I loſt, than what I got; yet for all this, you are ſo unjuſt as to command me not to think any more of you: But let me tell you, Madam, that if the Gods be juſt, they will force you to think of me, and they will grant me ſo much favour, as to cauſe you many an angry Minute by my being much in your Mind.

In wiſhing as I do (replied ſhe) that the Gods will give you the ſame tranquillity of Mind which I wiſh unto my ſelf, I am more juſt than you are; and conſequently have reaſon to believe, that they will rather hear my Prayers than yours: But, Madam, I beſeech you (ſaid he unto her) what hurt can a pure innocent Paſſion do you, when it is locked up in my Heart? And what matter is it when I am out of your ſight, whether I think of you or no? So I could think that you do not think of me (replied ſhe) doubtleſs it would not at all concern me, but ſtill it would concern you, that you might be more at reſt. Then, Madam, (ſaid he unto her, and looked upon her with amorous Eyes) I may hope, when I ſee you not, that you will think to gueſs whether I think upon you or no, and conſequently I am not ſo miſerable as I imagined; for it is ſome conſolation to know, that you have not baniſhed me out of your Memory, though out of your Heart. Oh, Madam, for Heavens ſake (added he with moſt paſſionate earneſtneſs) do not deny every thing to a Lover, who is not of their Humours which think Felicity conſiſts in higheſt Favours, but on the contrary, he knows how to multiply the Delight, by the Price which he will ſet upon the meaneſt Favours; Permit me, Madam, I beſeech you, only to think of you, and to believe, that ſometimes you do me the honour to think of me, and I ſhall not murmur at your exceſſive Rigour: I ſhould think that what I ask cannot offend you, nor would it be a grand Crime, if I beſeeched you to pronounce the Name of Adonacris ſometimes: For my part I do proteſt unto you, Madam, that the Name of Noromanta is very often in my Mouth, and it is a ſound ſo agreeable to me, that I cannot hear it without abundance of delight: But, Madam, I aſſure my ſelf that mine is not ſo to you; and you can hear it pronounced a thouſand times without the leaſt alteration in your Colour.

As Adonacris ſaid ſo, Noromanta (who was vexed at her ſelf in ſecret, that ſhe was not ſo inſenſible as he ſaid ſhe was) could not chuſe but bluſh. So that Adonacris obſerving it, he was now as full of Curioſity to know the Cauſe of that Bluſh, as he was before to know the Cauſe of the Sigh: But ſince Noromanta's Modeſty would not give her leave to tell him, ſhe only left him ſo much ſubject, as whereby he might gueſs that her Heart entertained no diſadvantagious thoughts of him; for he importuning her to tell him her Thoughts, and ſhe thinking upon a Deſign of going unto Sitalces, and parting from Adonacris, the tenderneſs of her Soul did appear more in her Eyes than ſhe deſired it ſhould, and her very words did utter ſomething to him againſt her Mind; for as he did importunately preſs her to tell him her Thoughts a little more clearly, and what her pleaſure was to command him, ſhe gave him an anſwer much more favourable than ſhe intended one quarter of an hour before: You are ſo very importunate (ſaid ſhe unto him) that becauſe I would be rid of you, I will confeſs ingenuouſly, that I am not ſo abſolute a Miſtreſs of my Heart, as of my Actions; and that my Thoughts and my Words do not agree, and that when I command you to forget me, yet I ſhould not have been very glad if you had obeyed me; all I can ſay unto you Adonacris is, that what Reſolutions ſoever I have taken, to do always what I ought to do, yet I perceive I ſhould more eaſily pardon you if you do not forget me, than I ſhould my ſelf if I do not. In the mean time, whether I baniſh you out of my Heart or not, yet I will ſo behave my ſelf towards you, as if you had not the leaſt ſhare in it, and after this, Adonacris, ask me no more; I know that I do give you more obliging Language than I would, and the words which I pronounced, do make me bluſh as oft as I remember them: But for all that, the Infidelity which my Obedience to my Father did make me commit againſt you, doth merit doubtleſs that I ſhould puniſh my ſelf, and comfort you; and therefore, though I have ſaid more unto you than did become me, yet I do not repent of it, though I know I ſhall repent as ſoon as you are gone. You have reaſon, Madam, replied Adonacris, to repent of what you have ſaid, for it is ſo little obliging unto me, that I conceive you have great cauſe of Repentance.

As Adonacris pronounced theſe words, Eliorante returned: ſo that Noromanta fearing that ſhe would ſpeak before him of that Office which ſhe was to do for her, and fearing leſt his Love ſhould gueſs at her ſecret Intention, ſhe went towards Eliorante, and underſtood from her, that what ſhe deſired ſhould be effected before the day was done, Eliorante aſſuring her, that it reſted only upon this, That the Wife unto the Servant of Sitalces, who was to go and viſit her ſick Husband, was not to depart until the next Morning. Noromanta having obtained her wiſh, thanked Eliorante for the Favour, and took her leave immediately; but when ſhe returned towards Adonacris to ſalute him, and it coming into her thoughts, that perhaps ſhe ſhould never ſee him again, ſuch a deep melancholy did ſeize upon her Spirit, that Tears ſtood in her Eyes: But ſhe no ſooner perceived this weakneſs in her ſelf, but ſhe haſted out, leſt it ſhould be obſerved; So pulling her Hood haſtily down, ſhe did the better hide thoſe impreſſions of Sorrow which came from her Heart unto her Face: But though ſhe had Wit enough to hide, yet ſhe had not Power of overcoming her ſad Reſentments, but paſſed over all that day, and the night following, in ſuch tranſports of violent Sorrow, as ſhe confeſſed ſince, that ſhe was never in all her life in ſo ſad a Condition. However, her Vertue being above her Sorrows, ſhe kept cloſe unto her reſolution of going unto her Husband, and to perſwade him that ſhe did not obſtruct his Liberty, nor deſire the ſociety of Adonacris. And in order to this, ſhe made choice of two ancient Servants unto Sitalces to conduct her, and a Woman to go with her, giving order that a Coach ſhould be ready by break of day, but not her own Coach, leſt her Deſign ſhould be diſcovered. And to the end her departure ſhould not be known until ſhe was gotten far enough from Tipanis to be overtaken, if Agatherſts ſhould ſend after her, this virtuous Lady commanded her Women which ſhe left at Tipanis to let none come into her Chamber for three days after, and to tell all the reſt of her Domeſtiques that ſhe was Sick, having to this end imparted her Deſign unto an old Phyſitian her Friend, who promiſed to come unto her Chamber, as if ſhe were really ſick. And to the end he ſhould not be ill treated by Spargapiſes and Agatherſes when the thing was diſcovered, it was agreed upon that he ſhould ſay he was deceived, and that one of Noromanta's Women did counterfeit her Voice, and lay in her Bed, and the Curtains being drawn, he thought it to be her Miſtreſs, and that ſhe was ſick. Moreover, ſhe writ a Letter unto Eliorante, giving Orders to deliver it three days after her Departure. To be ſhort, the Buſineſs was carried ſo well, that none of her Servants knew it, except thoſe who were of the Conſpiracy. So that putting the Woman which was to go with her in the beſt place of the Coach, ſhe cauſed her to ſpeak unto the Keepers of the Gates, and ſhew them her Paſport, which was to let her paſs out with one Woman, and two Men to conduct her. Thus it being very early, and not light enough to know one another, ſhe eaſily got out undiſcovered, but not without much Sorrow; for when ſhe was out of the Town, and began to think that perhaps ſhe ſhould never ſee Adonacris again, whom ſhe ſo tenderly loved, and that ſhe was going to abide eternally with Sitalces, who ſhe loved not, her Sadneſs was above Expreſſion, and her Journey was the moſt Melancholy that is imaginable; yet ſometimes ſhe rejoyced in the doing of an Act of ſo much heroick Virtue, but ſometimes again this Joy did coſt her very dear: However, ſhe paſſed over her Journey without any Obſtacle, for all the Troops of Spargapiſes obeyed the Paſport, and when ſhe came into the Quarters of Ariantes, ſhe diſcovered her ſelf unto the Commander in Chief, and deſired a Guard to be conducted unto Iſſedon, where ſhe arrived ſooner than ſhe deſired, though her Reſolution was yet to go unto it.

But, Sir, before I tell you how Sitalces received her, I muſt acquaint you with ſome paſſages at Tapanis; be pleaſed to know therefore, that Noromanta's Orders were ſo well obeyed, that every one believed her to be at home, yes, Adonacris did believe it more really than any other, ſo that he paſſed over theſe three Days well enough; yet at the end, Eliorante received Noromanta's Letter, which deſired pardon for deceiving her, and concealing her Deſign, and which intimated unto her, that ſhe was gone to her Husband, and to ſolicite Ariantes for his liberty. But when Eliorante received this Letter, Adonacris was with her, and ſhe not being able to conceal her Admiration, did acquaint him with the cauſe of it. You may well imagine, Sir, that the Admiration of A-donacris was above Eliorante's, and he cried out ſo loud when he heard that Noromanta had not been in Tipanis this three days, that Eliorante who had a moſt ſharp Wit, began to ſuſpect that he had a far greater intereſt in this departed Lady, than ever ſhe imagined. How, Madam, (ſaid he unto her) is not Noromanta here? You will ſee that by her Letter (ſaid ſhe,and ſhewed it him) and you will doubtleſs ſay that Noromanta is the beſt Wife in the World. Adonacris taking the Letter, did read it with as much Grief as Wonder, and with as much wonder at Noromanta's Vertue, as at her Beauty. When he had done reading the Letter, Agatherſes came in, who underſtanding how ſquares went, did think it ſtill convenient for him to make a ſhew as if he were much troubled at Noromanta's Departure, purpoſely to make Elibeſis believe that he loved Noromanta: So that expreſſing much Grief, he was much more zealous than Adonacris, who durſt not expreſs his. However, the Buſineſs had no Remedy, for in all Probability before Noromanta could be overtaken, ſhe would be in the Quarters of Ariantes, where he could not ſtay her. So that Adonacris ſeeing he had nothing elſe to do but lament, he retired to his Chamber, but with ſo ſad a Soul, that I am confident never was ſuch a ſudden Alteration ſeen as was in his Face; indeed he was not the ſame Man he was before, and Sorrow was ſo apparent in his Eyes, and he had ſuch a deadly paleneſs in his Cheeks, that any one would have ſaid he was not only ſadly afflicted, but that he would not live, and yet his Condition was worſe within an hour after he was gone from Eliorantes.

And, Sir, to acquaint you with the cauſe of the Augmentation of his Sorrows, give me leave to acquaint you, how by an unparellell'd example of Fortune, the very ſame time that Noromanta out of her Vertue went unto her Husband, Argiriſpe out of her Jealouſy, came to hers.

Thus when Noromanta came to Iſſedon, Argiriſpe came to Tipanis, and came juſt in the height of Adonacris his Sorrows for the departure of Noromanta; and being conducted by an Officer of Spargapiſes his Army, who brought her to Tipanis, and made her known unto that Prince and Agatherſes, they did receive her with much Civility; and thinking that Adonacris would be very pleaſingly ſurprized at the ſight of her, they cauſed her to be conducted unto his Chamber, before he was acquainted with her coming. I being then with the grieved Adonacris, am able to relate their meeting as an Eye-witneſs: But, Sir, I am not able to repreſent unto you the wonder of this ſad Lover, when he ſaw her enter; Truth is, it was ſo great, and his Soul was in ſuch a maze, that he was not Maſter of his own Thoughts; ſo that in lieu of hiding that Sorrow which appeared in his Face, and Anger meeting with his Melancholly, he ſeemed more deſirous to quarrel with her, than to ſalute her. Yet bethinking with himſelf, that in relation unto Noromanta's Intereſt, his beſt way was to force himſelf, Love did more than his Reaſon could to perſwade him, and he did ſo ſtrive with himſelf, that he almoſt made his Sorrows to ſeem only Wonder, and endeavoured to perſwade Argiriſpe that his ſadneſs was only an effect of his Impriſonment: Therefore he ſaluted her very civilly, and expreſſed himſelf as handſomly as he could at ſuch a Meeting.

But Argiriſpe being witty and jealous alſo, ſhe dived ſo far into his Heart, that as ſoon as ſhe ſet her Eyes upon him, ſhe ſaw that ſhe was the cauſe of his Grief, and Agatherſes telling her at firſt, how Noromanta's Deſign and hers did ſtrangely parallel, ſhe eaſily apprehended that her Husband grieved only for the abſence of that fair one. So that though the departure of Noromanta did leave her Thoughts in ſome doubt, yet the Sadneſs of Adonacris did confirm her in her Jealouſy: And I can aſſure you, that this Meeting had nothing of ſweet and pleaſingneſs in it. In the mean time, ſince Eliorante came to offer Argiriſpe all the Accommodations within the compaſs of her power, Adonacris took that time to go unto ſome place where he might lament. And taking me aſide, we went preſently after unto a Cloſet, in which we no ſooner were, but he broke out into moſt ſad Expreſſions of the pittiful Condition wherein he was; his greateſt Perplexity was, that being a Man excellently qualified, he could not be imperious over Argiriſpe, nor could he rid himſelf that way from the cruel Perſecution in which he was; and certainly he gave it a true Epithite of Perſecution; for Eliorante was no ſooner gone, but this jealous Woman twitted him with all imaginable Malice: Truly (ſaid ſhe unto him) if you had fallen in love with Noromanta after our Marriage, you could be accuſed only of weakneſs and unconſtancy, but being in Love with her before, you may (and with abundance of Reaſon and Juſtice) be charged with Perfidiouſneſs, with Treaſon, and with Indiſcretion: Pray tell me, how could you ever think to live happily with one you lóved not? Do not deceive your ſelf, and deny your love unto the Wife of Sitalces, for I have in my Hands all her Letters to you, and I know very well that you are a Priſoner unto Spargapiſes, only becauſe you are the Slave of Noromanta. Alſo I know very well, that you did with a premeditated Deſign abſent your ſelf, only to be far off from her you loved not. To teſtify my ſincerity (anſwered he) I will ingenuouſly confeſs that I did love Noromanta, and that I do ſtill hold her Vertues in the ſame Admiration; but I proteſt, Madam, that I do hold no private Correſpondency with her, and thoſe Letters you have of hers to me were written before her Marriage, and conſequently before you were. I further proteſt, that ſince that, I never received any more from her but common Civility, and in all likelihood it will be long before I ſhall ſee her again, perhaps never. Moreover, though it were ſo, that ſuch a Paſſion had ſeized upon my Soul, as I could not maſter, yet were I not to blame, ſince I was not able to overcome it, and ſince I ſhould behave my ſelf never the worſe towards you: Therefore, Madam, ſince I am able to aſſure you, that I never received the leaſt favour from Noromanta, and ſince you never received any Rudeneſs or Incivility from me, I hope I may well beſeech you to reſt ſatisfied, and let me be at reſt alſo. But Argiriſpe did not do as Adonacris deſired her, but went from him in a Chaſe, telling him ſharply, that ſince he went about to delude her, ſhe would carry her ſelf as one that would not be deluded, but as one that knew all his Weakneſſes and Infidelities; but that which moſt netled her, was to ſee, that all ſhe ſaid unto Adonacris did not anger him, and to ſee his Spirits ſo taken up with Sorrow for the departure of Noromanta, that he hardly minded what ſhe ſaid. So that ſhe being vexed more and more, ſhe vented ſuch bitter Expreſſions unto Adonacris, that he was forced to go into another Chamber. In the mean time, ſince he had no mind to be a Priſoner; but only becauſe Noromanta was at Tipanis, ſo now, he deſired his Liberty, ſince ſhe was not there. So that the next Morning he ſent ſecretly to the Prince Ariantes, beſeeching him now not to obſtruct his Liberty, becauſe now he did very punctually know of all the Deſigns of his Enemies, and conſequently he would be uſeleſs at Tipanis. Now, Sir, I have acquainted you how Adonacris received Argiriſpe, give me leave to tell you in few words how Sitalces received Noromanta. I aſſure my ſelf, Sir, that you will think her Action generous enough to oblige her Husband unto a good Reception of it and her; but it did not, for on the contrary, he received her very ill, and not putting any good Conſtruction upon her Reſolutions, he twitted her with the Letters which ſhe had writ unto Adonacris; he told her ſhe had not ſolicited for his Liberty, and that ſhe would not have come from Tipanis, but becauſe ſhe knew that Adonacris would not long continue there, and would releaſe himſelf ſome other way than by the exchange which was propounded. All this while ſhe took this unjuſt Accuſation ſo patiently, that ſhe was not ſo much as moved againſt Sitalces, only ſaying without any Bitterneſs, as much unto him as might juſtify her ſelf, though her Soul was full of Grief and Sorrow, to ſee her Innocency ſo unjuſtly injured: But, Sir, to abridg my Relation as much as I may, the Prince Ariantes having received the Letter from Adonacris, he did no longer retard his releaſe; and Agatherſes deſiring ſtill to perſwade Elibeſis that he was in love with Noromanta, did preſs on the exchange between Sitalces and Adonacris, to the end he might make her believe that he did it only to ſee her again; and indeed Elibeſis did not only believe that he did it for Noromanta's ſake, but alſo ſhe thought that Noromanta, manta, whoſe Virtue ſhe was well perſwaded of, had not come out of Tipanis, but only to avoid the trouble which ſhe was put unto by the Affection of Agatherſes: So that being extreamly grieved, ſhe would willingly have oppoſed her Brother's Liberty, purpoſely to hinder Sitalces from carrying his Wife to Tipanis: But ſince Prudence would not allow her to do ſo, ſhe diſſembled her Reſentments, leſt Ariantes ſhould gueſs the cauſe of them. But all things being concluded on both Sides, it was reſolved that Sitalces and his Wife ſhould the ſame day depart from Iſſedon unto Tipanis, that Adonacris and Argiriſpe ſhould ſet out of Tipanis to come for Iſſedon; and for an equal Security of both ſides, theſe four Perſons were to meet in a place, which was juſt between the Quarters of both Armies, to the end that the Convoy which brought Adonacris and Argiriſpe from Tipanis, might carry Sitalces and Noromanta thither, and that Convoy which brought Noromanta and Sitalces from Iſſedon, might carry Argiriſpe and Adonacris thither. So that by this means, Sir, theſe four Perſons ſaw each other, and talked together. In the mean time, Sitalces and Argiriſpe were extreamly vexed at this Adventure, yet dine all together they muſt, for he who was to ſee this exchange performed on the part of Ariantes, being a Man of a generous Mind, he made theſe Priſoners and Ladies a very ſumptuous Feaſt; ſo that the conſtraint of Sitalces and Argiriſpe continued very long; and it was the greater, becauſe they durſt not talk together, leſt they ſhould give Adonacris time to talk to Noromanta; and yet they needed not to fear it, for Noromanta did not only carefully ſhun talking with Adonacris, but even looking upon him alſo; yet ſhe could not be ſo careful, but he would ſometimes look in her Eyes, and find much Sorrow in them, and he carried it ſo cunningly, that whilſt he who treated them was talking to Sitalces and Argiriſpe, he ſpoke unto Noromanta in a low Voice, and conjured her to confeſs that Fortune was extreamly unjuſt in not letting Sitalces carry Argiriſpe unto Tipanis, and him her unto Iſſedon. But Noromanta being reſolved to be neither ſweet nor ſharp with him, would not give any anſwer, and ſeeming not to hear him, ſhe changed place, not ſo much as looking upon him; yet Adonacris made no queſtion but that ſhe heard what he ſaid, and conſented to it in her Heart, for ſhe could not chuſe but bluſh and ſigh in changing her place. In the mean time, the hour of their parting being come, Adonacris, who did not love Argiriſpe, but loved Noromanta, did take the way to Iſſedon; and Noromanta, who did not love Sitalces, but loved Adonacris, took the way to Tipanis, waited upon by her Perſecutor, and parting from the moſt reſpective Lover in the World; and ſhe parted from him with ſo much ſetled Reſolution, that ſhe did not ſo much as turn her Head aſide to look after him, but it was not ſo with Adonacris, for though he intended to reſtrain himſelf, leſt he ſhould incenſe Argiriſpe, yet he looked after Noromanta as long as ever he could, and turned his Head after her above twenty times when ſhe was out of ſight. I ſhall not any longer inſiſt upon any Aggravations of the various thoughts in all theſe Perſons, ſince it is ſufficient to know the ſtate of their Souls by the ſtate of their Fortunes. But give me leave to tell you, Sir, that the end of Winter being come, both Sides began to think of taking the Field. Agatherſes had ſtill the diſpleaſure to know that Thomiris would have him ſtill be wary of his Troops, and not to give Battel unleſs he was forced unto it, becauſe ſhe had ſome grand Deſign which ſhe would not publiſh; and Agatherſes in his heat of hatred unto Ariantes, he deſired to tumble him preſently from his Throne, and not to protract the War. And he ſo wrought upon the wiſe Terez, who had a great prevalency with Thomiris, that he perſwaded him there was no way to ruin Ariantes but by Battel; ſo that this Princeſs did at laſt permit him to hazard a Fight, if occaſion was favourably offered. Agatherſes not willing to loſe a minute of time, cauſed Spargapiſes to draw his Troops firſt out of their Winter-Quarters, and draw towards Iſſedon, which began to ſuffer much; becauſe the Army of Ariantes had been cloſe under the Gates of that Town all that ſharp Seaſon.

Ariantes alſo ſeeing his Enemies in ſuch haſte, did take the Field alſo, and went to take his leave of Elibeſis with extraordinary melancholly, which was no good Omen unto him; the greateſt cauſe of his Sadneſs was, becauſe he knew almoſt of a certainty, that Elibeſis did not value his love, but out of ambitious ends; ſo that his Mind being filled with this Thought, he could not chuſe but expreſs ſomething of it at his bidding her adieu. Since I know not, Madam, ſaid he unto her, whether Fortune will ſmile or frown upon me, I muſt tell you that I know not how you will look upon me when I ſhall return, nor know I Madam, whether you know it your ſelf, ſince my good or bad Fortune depends upon the Fate of Arms: However, ſince it is not your pleaſure I ſhould be happy before the War be ended, yet I beſeech you aſſure me that I may loſe a Battel, and yet not loſe you: If you will be pleaſed to honour me with this favour, Madam, I aſſure you, I ſhall not be eaſily overcome: But if you will not, alas Sorrow it ſelf will vanquiſh me before I fight. Methinks, Sir, (anſwered Elibeſis very wittily) that I could anſwer you in not anſwering, only by beſeeching you to anſwer your ſelf all that I would anſwer, if I ſhould utter all the Thoughts of my Soul: Therefore, Sir, ſince it is ſufficient for you to imagine what I would ſay, if I would ſatisfy you, it is better to employ that little time which I have of ſeeing you, in aſſuring you, that I ſhall ſpend the time of your abſence in making Prayers for your return, and in wiſhing moſt zealouſly, that I may ſoon ſee you return victorious over all your Enemies. More than this, Sir, do not ask me, unleſs you would have me think, that you ſeek out for a pretence of quarrelling with me. No, Madam, I do not ſeek for any pretence of quarrelling with you, but it is you that ſeeks for a pretence of not giving me a direct anſwer. However, ſince it is your Pleaſure I ſhould be kept in ignorance until the end of the War, I muſt obey, though I can tell you it is with much ado. After this, Ariantes left Elibeſis, who to keep him upon ſuch Terms as ſhe deſired, did permit her Eyes to tell him more than her Mouth, to the end, that if he were victorions, he might be ſtill her Slave, and ſhe a Queen. In concluſion, ſhe did ſo cunningly manage the Mind of Ariantes, both by her Looks, and the Manner of her bidding him adieu, that he did almoſt repent of his Suſpicions, and parted from her not ill ſatisfied, though ſhe did not ſay any thing that could engage her ſelf to follow his Fortune, if it was not good. But in concluſion, Sir, that Prince Ariantes departed from Iſſedon, and went unto his Army, which was not far off, and Adonacris had the comfort of being abſent from Argiriſpe by following him; and well may I call it comfort, for ſhe was perpetually twitting him, though he carried himſelf very civilly towards her, for all her jealouſies of him. On the other ſide, Noromanta had the pleaſure of ſeeing Sitalces depart, and go unto the Army, and rid her from the moſt terrible Perſecution that is imaginable; for ever ſince ſhe came from Iſſedon, until he left her at Tipanis, there was every day ſome Jars paſſed between them: But, Sir, not to trouble you with the jealous Thoughts of Sitalces and Argiriſpe, nor with the tender and virtuous Thoughts of Noromanta, nor with the amorous Imaginations of Adonacris, give me leave to tell you, that Agatherſes having ſtill a deſign in his Heart to ruin his Rival, he neglected no Occaſions of it; for he did not only husband every advantage which the Fate of Arms did give him, but alſo he held private Correſpondencies within Iſſedon, purpoſely to move the Inhabitants of the Town to rebel againſt Ariantes, during his Abſence. Fortune alſo was ſo favourable unto him, that at the firſt drawing into the Field, he put the Vanguard of Ariantes to the rout; and though this firſt Occaſion was not deep in Blood, yet this firſt advantage ſerved to quell the Hearts of that Prince's Side, and to incourage the oppoſite Party, not but that Spargapiſes loſt as many Men of Quality as Ariantes did; but yet he being the Maſter of the Field, Fame did trumpet him Victorious: But, Sir, the moſt remarkable paſſage of this Encounter was, that Sitalces was killed in it; and Noromanta behaved her ſelf ſo, as if ſhe had no cauſe of rejoycing at his Death; yet truly ſhe did not mourn in the deepeſt Blacks, but kept ſuch an even temper in all her Actions, that no one living could lay any fault to her charge. She alſo had the Happineſs to know, that it was not Adonacris who killed Sitalces, for he was not in the fight; indeed it was the wiſe Terez, who commanded the Reſerve Brigade that day, and it was Terez, who with his own Hand killed Sitalces: 'Tis true, he revenged his Death by the laſt blow he ſtruck, for it wounded him ſo deep and dangerouſly, that this wiſe and experienced Captain was ſtonied, and could not get up on Horſeback. But, Sir, though the Death of Sitalces did at firſt give ſome Satisfaction unto Adonacris, becauſe he thought that now Noromanta would be at reſt and liberty, yet afterwards it did double his Torment; for when he conſidered, that had he not married Argiriſpe, he had married Noromanta, his Mind was moſt lamentably tormented; but to eaſe himſelf, he intended to let Noromanta know his Mind: So that ſending one of his Servants ſecretly unto Tipanis, hoping that Noromanta, now having no jealous Husband to fear, ſhe would not ſtartle at a Letter from him, ſince now all decency did allow her to receive any Letter from an abſent Friend: But his hope was ill bottomed; for Noromanta was ſo far from receiving or anſwering it, that ſhe refuſed it, and was angry at him, though ſtill ſhe retained much Tenderneſs towards him. On the other ſide, Argiriſpe was ſo extreamly troubled at the Death of Sitalces, that ſhe was almoſt ſtark Mad; reſenting it as a moſt conſiderable loſs, ſince ſhe whom Adonacris loved, had loſt one of the moſt jealous Husbands in the World. But the wonder of all is, Argiriſpe being a little ill when ſhe heard of Sitalces his Death, ſhe was then in ſuch a fear of Death, leſt then Adonacris ſhould marry Noromanta, that ſhe fell into a very violent Feaver, and died in earneſt. I ſhall not tell you, Sir, how Adonacris took her Death, for having deſcribed him before, to be a very accompliſhed Man, you may well imagine that he would not expreſs any Joy; but having alſo deſcribed him in Love, you may well think he was no great Mourner.

In the mean time, Agatherſes making his beſt uſe of his Victory, he did ſo negotiate by his Councels, that Spargapiſes was adviſed by him in all things, and therefore it was reſolved to give a deciding Battel: And though it did not concern the Intereſts of Ariantes to hazard any thing lightly; yet give Battel he muſt, becauſe he underſtood from Octomaſades, that if he did not vanquiſh preſently, the People of Iſſedon would revolt, for they grew weary of the War. But, Sir, though this Prince did as much as any great and valiant Captain could, yet he loſt the Battel, and was forced to hide himſelf in a poor Shepherds Hut, in the midſt of a thick Wood, intending to ſave his Perſon from the Victory of his Rival, and in the night time to get into Iſſedon; and to do it more ſafely, he ſent one of his Servants to ſpy out the Paths of the Wood, to ſerve him as a Guide: But, Sir, the return of this Servant brought him abundance of Grief; for he brought him an Officer whom that Prince had left in Iſſedon, and whom this Servant did accidentally meet, This Officer told him that at the very ſame time the Battel was fighting, there was a Sedition raiſed in Iſſedon by the Friends of Agatherſes: And that his Enemies were become Maſters of the Town after a ſharp Diſpute: After which they ſent unto Spargapiſes to tell him, that if Thomiris would pardon their Rebellion, they were ready to enter into her Obedience: So that I am confident, Sir, (added this Officer) that Spargapiſes is at this very hour the Maſter of Iſſedon; for I ſaw a far off, ſome of his Troops marching that way.

Ariantes hearing this ſad News, was extreamly ſad; but Love being ſtill above his Ambition, he never asked any particulars of this diſorder, but asked him very haſtily what news of Elibeſis; Sir, anſwered the Officer, the Father of Elibeſis no ſooner heard how ſquares went, but he departed the Town with all his Houſhold, and conſequently carried his Daughter with him, fearing doubtleſs to fall into the power of Spargapiſes, until things were better ſetled. Afterwards Ariantes asked him whether he knew which way Elibeſis went; and the Officer telling him that he thought unto a Caſtle which belonged unto Tiſſagettes ſome three hundred Furlongs from Iſſedon. This Prince having neither Army nor Place of retreat, reſolved to go whither his Love invited him, believing that the Father of Elibeſis would not deny him Reception into his Houſe, which was very ſtrong; and where he might rally together ſome part of his ſhattered Army: But, Sir, this Prince was deceived in his Hopes; for the Father of Elibeſis would not receive him but upon condition he would depart the next Morning, telling him, that this Houſe was not ſtrong enough to reſiſt a victorious Army, and therefore he would not expoſe her and his Family unto ruin: But, Sir, the thing which ſtruck him even dead with Sorrow, was, That when he ſaw Elibeſis, he found her much different from what ſhe was at Iſſedon; and far from following his Fortunes when ſhe ſaw it ill. Yet this Prince did accoſt her in ſuch an humble ſubmiſſive manner (as I underſtood ſince by one of her Woman) that the Heart of any but hers would have melted. Now, Madam, (ſaid he unto her, with a moſt melancholy Look) I am come to know whether I have loſt your Affection in loſing the Battel; and whether you have chaſed me out of your Heart, as they have chaſed me out of Iſſedon. Truly, Sir, (replied ſhe) my Soul is ſo diſturbed with Fears, that I cannot tell you what to think, and as the ſtate of your Fortune ſtands, I do not think my Affection can do you any good, for when you have overwhelmed me under the ruins of that Throne upon which you intended to ſet me, you will be never the better: Therefore, Sir, let me adviſe you to think upon your own Safety, and think no more of me: Fie, Madam, (ſaid he, and looked upon her with wonder) are you ſo inhumane as to diſcover the Neutrality of your Soul unto me upon ſuch an occaſion as this? I begun the War only to make you a Queen, and will you forſake me as ſoon as Fortune forſakes me? will you not favour me ſo far as to diſſemble part of your Thoughts? Ah, Madam, this is ſo ſtrange that I cannot believe I rightly underſtood you, and therefore I beſeech you explain your Words, and tell me what I muſt truly think of you? You may think, Sir, that I would do any thing in my Power to make you mount a Throne (replied ſhe;) But you muſt think withal, that ſince I am not able to alter your Fortune, I will not fooliſhly and to no purpoſe follow it: Nor can I ſee which way your Propoſition to me can any way advantage or oblige me. I cannot tell whether it can any way oblige you, Madam, (replied he) but I am ſure your expreſſions have not much Generoſity in them: And unleſs I be the baſeſt of Men, I ſhall hate you as much as ever I loved you. You may do even as you pleaſe, Sir, (anſwered ſhe) for truly my Humour is to comply with the Times, and change as they do. Then, Madam, replied he, I ſee you know how to change with Fortune. I know not, Sir, how you can blame me for it, replied ſhe, but I think it commendable and Wiſdom ſo to do. Madam, ſaid he, is it poſſible you ſhould not apprehend that this Act is ſo unworthy of your ſelf, that if Agatherſes knew it, he would certainly eſteem you much leſs? And I am moſt confident, that as furious as he is, he would treat me better than you have done, if I ſhould fall into his Power, though he be both my Enemy and my Rival. But, Madam, (added he to vex her) ſince his Example tells me that it is not impoſſible to ceaſe loving you; I ſhall hope to imitate him, and though I ſhall not be a King, yet I ſhall have ſome advantagious hopes of not being your Slave; and I think that I ſhall be as great a Gainer by getting out of your Power, as I am a Loſer by loſing a Crown. After this, Elibeſis wiſhing him heartily out of her Father's Houſe, leaſt Agatherſes hearing he was there, ſhould come and ſeek him, and leſt he ſhould fall into the Power of a Man who loved her not, ſhe talked to him ſo ſharply, that Ariantes not being able to endure it, did abruptly leave her; and going out of the Caſtle, went to ſeek a Sanctuary with Octomaſades his Couſin, or at leaſt to ſtay a while with him conceal'd, to ſee if any Remedy for his Misfortune was to be found.

In the mean time, the ambitious Elibeſis being vexed to the Heart that ſhe had loſt Agatherſes, and that her Ambition did thrive no better, ſhe could not avoid that Miſery which ſhe feared, which was, that Agatherſes would hear the Prince Ariantes had been at her Father's Houſe, and would come thither to look for him, as a puniſhment upon her for her Inconſtancy, for her Ambition and hardneſs of Heart unto Ariantes. Agatherſes hearing he had been at the Father of Elibeſis Caſtle; he had no ſooner carried Spargapiſes unto Iſſedon, whoſe Inhabitants opened their Gates, but he went thither with ſome of his Forces, fancying high ſatisfaction, in getting both his Rival and his Miſtreſs into his Power, and was in hopes of full Revenge for all the Miſeries he had endured. But he was much ſurprized, when coming to the Caſtle, and by a Herald demanded the Prince Ariantes; he was anſwered that he was not there. At the firſt he would not believe it, but at laſt he was forced unto it, for Tiſſagettes being retired unto this Caſtle in the Tumult, he fell very ſick, and was not able to defend it if it were aſſaulted. So that conceiving, the ſooner he yielded, the better it would be for him; he reſolved to treat, and to obtain liberty for himſelf and his Daughter. And to that end thinking it was not poſſible that a Man who had once loved Elibeſis, ſhould have any inveterate Quarrel, he commanded her to parle with Agatherſes, ſince he was in Bed, and not able to do it, deſiring her to uſe her beſt Ingenuity to move Agatherſes not to bring him under the Power of Thomiris. After which, giving notice unto Agatherſes, that he would parle; and Agatherſes conſenting unto it, the Troop retreated, to make a void place before the Caſtle-gate: before which was a kind of Portal, which the Courts of Guards in time of War made uſe of: And this place being choſen to treat in, Agatherſes, with a very ſmall number of his Men, advanced. But he was much ſurprized, when in lieu of ſeeing Tiſſagettes appear, he ſaw only his Daughter, accompanied only with ſome few Men and Women: for he loved her ſtill in ſpight of his Teeth, and could not look upon her without ſome agitation of Spirit. Yet he was ſo fully reſolved not to ſhew any ſigns of Love unto her, that the better to hide his weakneſs, he ſeemed to be a little arrogant; and he was ſo glad at Heart to ſee Elibeſis, in lieu of being Queen, to ſtand in need of his protection, that eaſily ſurmounting the tenderneſs of his Love, he carried himſelf as if he would guſt his Revenge with full Delight; and after he had ſaluted Elibeſis, there appeared ſuch a kind of inſolent Joy in his Face, as was enough to vex her: But that which moſt vexed her was, he would not give her leave to ſpeak firſt: Madam, (ſaid he, and looked ſternly upon her) you ſee I was not miſtaken, when I told you heretofore, that Fortune would never do Juſtice unto your Merit in making you a Queen; but the worſt is, in lieu of being a Queen, you muſt now be a Subject unto a Princeſs whom you have incenſed. Since Thomiris is a Debtor unto your Valour, (replied Elibeſis) for the Victory which her Son hath gotten, I hope ſhe will not deny you any thing; but I will hope that you will obtain of her liberty for my Father and all his Family.

Since it were a moſt cruel thing to make a Queen a Slave, (replied Agatherſes to vex her) I will promiſe you, Madam, to move Thomiris ſo far, as that ſhe will give me leave to ſet you at Liberty, that you may follow the Fortune of Ariantes, and conduct you unto the place where he is retired: therefore, Madam, if you know it, as I doubt not but you do, I beſeech you acquaint me, that I may appoint a Convoy for you thither. Fie, Agatherſes (cried ſhe) your Revenge goes too far in ſaying ſo. Why, Madam, (replied he, with a counterfeit Wonder) do you take it ill I ſhould offer to convoy you unto a Prince, for whoſe ſake you forſook me? 'Tis true, he is no King, nor ever ſhall be, and in all probability is like to wander from Kingdom to Kingdom amongſt ſtrange Princes; but for all that it is to be thought, that when you contracted Friendſhip with him, when you ſlighted my Love to accept of his, you then conſidered what the Sequel of his Fortune might be, and reſolved to follow it: For I muſt tell you ingenuouſly, it were unworthy if you ſhould forſake a Prince becauſe Fortune hath forſaken him, as you did me, becauſe you ſaw him more hopeful than my ſelf. If you did not love Noromanta, and hate Elibeſis (replied ſhe) you would not ſpeak thus unto me, you would forget a Weakneſs which Ambition only cauſed, and endeavour to regain what you have loſt: Since, Madam, this Interview is upon a Buſineſs neſs of War, wherein Love has no part, I ſhall not now make any exact explanation of my Thoughts, it will be enough to tell you what I writ unto you before, that though I ſhould love you more than ever I did, yet you would not accept it for the Love of me; and though you ſhould repent of what you have done, yet I am not beholden to you for it, ſince you changed only, becauſe Fortune changed; and, truly Madam, I deſire not to be taken as the moſt happy, but as the moſt loved, and loved for ſomething which is purely my own, and not for my collateral Reſpects and Reaſons, which do not really relate unto my Perſon: Therefore, Madam, without any informing you whether I do love you, or whether I ever will love you, or without enquiring whether you love Ariantes, or whether you have caſt him off, I only ask you what Tiſſagettes demands of me? Had you been a little more inquiſitive, Sir, (replied ſhe) perhaps you would not have repented it; but ſince you are not, let me tell you, from my Father, that he deſires Thomiris would pardon him, and that Spargapiſes would do the like, and permit him to live in quiet at his own Houſe with his Family. Since, Madam, replied he, his Houſe is too ſtrong to be in the Hands of a Rebel, that muſt not be, but Tiſſagettes and you muſt go to Iſſedon, and ſtay there till Peace be fully ſettled in the State; unleſs, as I told you before, you had rather follow the Fortunes of Ariantes. Since we are not in a capacity to reſiſt you, replied ſhe, we muſt ſubmit unto your Will. Ah, Madam, ſaid he, had you gone out of Iſſedon when I deſired you, you would have entred with more delight than now you are like; but ſince what's paſt cannot be recalled, the future muſt be diſpoſed according to my Mind; and that you, Madam, ſhall have no more power in my Heart, than Ariantes hath in the Kingdom of Iſſedon. It plainly appears, replied ſhe, that I have none at all, ſince you inſult ſo over one that is miſerable, and will not ſo much as ask whether or no I am capable of Repentance. I do never intend to inquire, Madam, (replied he) becauſe though you ſhould repent, yet I would not alter my Reſolution never to love you. Since it is ſo, (ſaid ſhe, and and would have left him in a Fume) then I pray let me have your Hatred, and with the ſame Hand you tumbled Ariantes from his Throne, pull down, if you can, the Caſtle into which I enter, that burying me in its Ruins, I may find an end of my Miſeries. No, no Madam, (ſaid he, and ſtaid her) I will not do ſo; and as violent as you are, I will never pull down that Altar unto which once I ſacrificed: So, Madam, though I am fully reſolved never to give you any ſigns of my Love as long as I live, yet you ſhall taſte of my Generoſity; and to revenge my ſelf in a more noble way, I will ſo highly protect you, that perhaps I will force you to repent as long as you live of your Behaviour to me; and to begin it, Madam, I beſeech you let Tiſſagettes know, that provided he will let me conduct him to Iſſedon, and that you will accompany him, he ſhall ſhortly be readmitted unto the Favour of Thomiris, and Spargapiſes, and ſhall not loſe the leaſt jot of his Eſtate: So that, Madam, (except the Heart which you have reſtored me, and which I will never render again) you may be in the ſame condition you were before you knew Ariantes. As that Heart eſcaped me, replied Elibeſis, ſo it may eſcape Noromanta. No matter, replied he, whether Noromanta keep it or no; but I tell you, that though it were abſolutely in my own diſpoſe, yet it ſhall never be yours: For, Madam, ſhould I render it unto you, perhaps when ſome other Uſurper would come and promiſe you a Crown, you would reſtore it me again. I could never have believed (ſaid ſhe) that you are able to be ſo tart; but ſince, to my ſhame, I muſt confeſs, that I have merited ſome part of it, I will endure it as patiently as if I were altogether innocent; yet I muſt tell you, that they have ſo much incenſed my Spirits, that I wiſh my Father would rather periſh in his Houſe, than to be obliged unto a Man, who does things only out of revenge upon me. After this, Elibeſis retired, though Agatherſes would have ſtaid her: However, ſince Tiſſagettes was of a milder Temper than his Daughter, he accepted of the Propoſition which Aga- therſes made; and accordingly the next morning, by reaſon of his Sickneſs, he took Coach and went towards Iſſedon, Elibeſis following him with her Women. But, Sir, I forgot to tell you, that before their departure, Agatherſes who gave them a Convoy, and took command of the Caſtle, had private conference with Elibeſis; but the Wonder was, he found her changed ſince he ſaw her laſt; for, be pleaſed to know, that Ariantes having received a Letter from Octomaſades, which gave him ſome new hopes, and that he had gathered together ſome Troops of his ſhattered Army, he writ unto her; That ſince he had not loſt all his Hopes, he beſeeched her, ſince ſhe was capable only of Ambition, to look upon him yet as in a poſſibility of making her a Queen: So that, Sir, this Lady being now of another mind, ſhe talked more ſharply unto Agatherſes than ſhe did before, yet ſhe ſtill talked ſomething, which made him ſee that it vexed her to think he did not love her. But, as good Fortune for Agatherſes would have it, as ſhe went unto her Coach, Ariantes his Letter fell out of her Pocket, Agatherſes took it up unſeen, and read it as ſoon as the Coach was gone; and imagining that theſe new hopes of Ariantes cauſed the arrogant Alteration which he found in her, he was ſo extreamly incenſed, that had he followed the firſt motions of choller, he had ſent after Tiſſagettes and Elibeſis, and had ſent them Priſoners to the Tent-Royal; but I being then with him, and he acquainting me with the cauſe of his Fury, I hindred him from following them, and told him, it was a better courſe to leave loving Elibeſis any longer. I can do no more than ſtrive, (replied he haſtily) but I do profeſs this laſt weakneſs of hers, hath quaſhed all my Love to her, and brought into my Heart ſuch a kind of Hatred and Scorn of her, that if I be not much miſtaken in my ſelf, theſe Paſſions will be as violent in me, as ever my Love was: Methinks I ſee Elibeſis now with other Eyes than I was wont; and I begin to think ſhe hath not that Beauty and Spirit which methoughts ſhe had. But, Anabaris, though ſhe were fairer than ever Venus is painted, and had more Charms than ever any had, yet for all this I ſhould hate her. You are now (ſaid I unto him) in ſuch a height of Choler, that you do not know whether you do love or hate Elibeſis. Ah, Anabaris, ſaid he unto me, it is dot now with me as heretofore it was, when you made me confeſs I loved her, though I thought I did not; and to teſtify it unto you, I profeſs I wiſh ſhe were as ill-favoured, as if ſhe were an hundred Years old; and I think I could wiſh her dead, were I not perſwaded that Death is a Remedy againſt all ſorts of Miſery, and thereby ſhe would eſcape all thoſe I deſire may fall upon her.

I ſhould never make an end, Sir, if I ſhould relate all that Agatherſes ſaid in his Anger; and therefore to abbreviate the Story, let me only tell you, that to give Ariantes no time of recruiting his Forces, Agatherſes went ſtreight unto the place where he was, and did ſo abſolutely quaſh him, that he was forced, as brave as he was, to ſave himſelf with Octomaſades, Adonacris, and ſome Servants in a thick Foreſt, where they found a little Houſe. In the mean time, after they had conſidered what to do, they reſolved to ſtay hid in that place for a while, and to ſend to enquire the ſtate of Things.

But, Sir, they ſoon heard that all obeyed Spargapiſes, and as things ſtood, there was no hopes left for them; yet they underſtood, that moſt People murmured much againſt Thomiris, becauſe of her amorous Paſſion, which they ſaid her Soul was ingaged, and that they had ſtill a diſpoſition to Revolt: But ſince that Conjuncture was not then fit to be made uſe of, and ſince in all probability ſhe would not continue long in that Mind, they reſolved, that knowing Tiſſagettes had made his Peace, Adonacris ſhould ſecretly render himſelf to his Father, and afterwards, as occaſion ſerved, put all his Friends at Iſſedon into a diſpoſitiou of a new Rebellion. They reſolved further, that Octomaſades ſhould go to the Prince of Calipides, and obtain freſh Forces when it ſhould be time; and that Ariantes, who knew how ill the Queen his Siſter had treated you, Sir, ſhould come unto your Army, and help you to deliver Mandana, who was then reported to be in Armenia, to the end, that obtaining Eſteem and Amity, he might afterwards obtain ſome Aid from you, in caſe Adonacris could bring things into a condition fit for a new Rebellion. But ſince it did neerly concern the Prince Ariantes, that Thomiris ſhould not know where he was, leſt ſhe ſhould diſcover his Deſigns, and hinder you from aiding him, he reſolved to change his Name, and take upon him that of Anaxaris; and the rather, becauſe he was ſure that neither you, Sir, nor any in the Court, could know him; for as Scythians are ſeldom ſeen in the Court of other Nations, ſo other Nations are ſeldom ſeen in the Court of Scythia.

Thus, Sir, Ariantes became Anaxaris, and he met with you in Lydia. Octomaſades, he went unto the Prince of the Callipides, and Adonacris went unto his Friend's houſe, until he had made his Peace, which would eaſily be done. For to pacifie things the ſooner, a General Act of Pardon was granted unto all Rebels, except the Prince Ariantes, and Octomaſades, who were the firſt beginners of this Revolt. But, Sir, I forgot to tell you, that whilſt Ariantes was hid in that Foreſt I ſpoke of, he writ unto Elibeſis, who ſeeing his Fortunes deſperate, did return him ſo ſharp an anſwer, that this Prince began to cure himſelf of his Paſſion towards her. And he told Adonacris, when he ſaw the Princeſs Mandana neer the Caſtle of Hermes (as I remember) where he ſaid that Princeſs delivered you, Sir, that he then began to hope he had abſolutely left loving Elibeſis, and that he was ſo charmed with the beauty of Mandana, that he thought her a thouſand times fairer then Elibeſis.

How's this, (ſaid Cyrus, and interrupted him) did Ariantes, who then called himſelf Anaxaris, and who was a Priſoner as well as I, when Mandana releaſed me neer the Caſtle of Hermes, did he begin that very day to love Mandana? He did not ſay, Sir, that he began to love her that very day, replied Anabaris, but he ſaid, That he began that day to leave loving Elibeſis.

However, to return from whence I digreſſed, and to acquaint you with the State of Ariantes, and his Affairs, I muſt tell you, that Agatherſes hating Elibeſis in his very Soul, would needs, as ſoon as he came at Iſſedon, (ſay what I could unto him) go and carry Ariantes's Letter unto her, which ſhe let fall as ſhe took Coach; and which now he would needs reſtore, as an excuſe of his laſt time of ever talking to her. And indeed, ſince he knew how to hate her, with as much violence as ever he loved her, he went unto her very early: So that Elibeſis, who ſtill loved him for all her Ambition, imagined, that perhaps he would return unto her; for though ſhe knew very well, that ſhe had loſt the Letter of Ariantes, yet ſhe could not imagine that he had found it. But ſhe was not long in that Error; for as ſoon as ever he accoſted her, he gave her the Letter: I beſeech you pardon me, Madam, (ſaid he unto her) for reſtoring it no ſooner: But ſince in reading it, I found my Soul diſpoſed to hate you, as much as ever I loved you, I deſired to read it very often; to the end I might love you no longer; for as weak and ambitious as you were, I loved you, even when I told you I did not. But now, thanks unto my own ſpite, I am come to that paſs, as I do not only not love you, but I hate you, and hate with as quiet and calme a hatred, as ever any was capable of. And, I aſſure you, I never had more pleaſure heretofore in telling you that I loved you, than I have now in telling you that I hate you, and ever ſhall do, as long as I live. Moreover, Madam, never think that this is ſo, becauſe I love Noromanta; for I do proteſt, I neither do, nor ever did love her, for you were the cauſe I never loved any; for I looked upon all fair Women in general, only as beautiful Objects, without any captivation: But now I look upon you in particular, as one of the weakeſt, the moſt ambitious, and perfidious Perſon in the World: And now, Madam, I have no more to ſay unto you. I wiſh, ſaid ſhe, that you had ſaid leſs; but ſince you tell me plainly that you hate me, I muſt do the like, and hate you. Agreed, Madam, (replied he, and did riſe up); But if you know not how to hate, better than you know how to love, your hatred will never do me any great harm. Upon theſe words Agatherſes left her, and went from her ſo well ſatisfied with what he had ſaid, that it was very apparent he did not love her.

Thus this Woman, who would needs entertain both Love and Ambition at once, did not ſatisfy either of thoſe two Paſſions; and it may well be ſaid, that ſhe did not raign in the Heart of Agatherſes, but only becauſe ſhe would needs raign over Iſſedon. And thus, after ſhe had loſt two Lovers, the ſame Paſſions ſtill remained gnawing in her Heart, ſo as ſhe became ſo melancholy, and ſo unhealthful, that ſhe became extreamly ugly. Moreover, Adonacris hath chid her a thouſand times for her Behaviour, both towards Agatherſes and towards Ariantes: So that her own Fault did bring all ſorts of Miſery upon her. . In the mean time, Adonacris was no ſooner at liberty to do what he would, and all the Kingdom quiet, but he prepared himſelf for Tipanis: yet that labour was ſaved, for Noromanta having ſome Buſineſs of Importance at Iſſedon, ſhe came thither juſt as he was ready to depart it: You may well imagine, Sir, that the meeting of theſe two Perſons was no more pleaſing at Iſſedon, than when Fortune brought them together at Tipanis: for then Adonacris was Husband unto Argiriſpe, as Sitalces was unto Noromanta; but now, they were both free, yet Noromanta made ſome ſcruple of marrying him ſo ſoon.

But her Father having changed his Opinion of Adonacris, becauſe now he thought him unlooſed from the Intereſts of Ariantes; This Marraiage was made as ſoon as they returned to the Tents Royal, and ſolemnized in mighty magnificence. Thus the Adventure of Agatherſes and Adonacris did both end very happily; for that of Agatherſes ended with the recovery of his Liberty, and that of Adonacris in the enjoyment of his Miſtreſs; Agatherſes bragged, that he thought himſelf more happy in enjoying himſelf than his Miſtreſs.

After this, when all was quiet, Spargapiſes returned to Thomiris, and Agatherſes, after a Voyage to her, being Crowned with Lawrels of that Victory which he had obtained, he returned to Iſſedon, where he lived as he did before the War, to wit, not caring for any above him, or any thing elſe, but to enjoy his Friends, and pleaſe himſelf.

On the other ſide, Adonacris amidſt all his joyes did not forget his Promiſes unto the Prince Ariantes, but on the contrary, he tranſacted with ſo much Wiſdom (after Spargapiſes was returned to Thomiris, and Tirez carried away in his Coach) that he had laid a Plot, and carried it ſo judiciouſly, that nothing was diſcovered. The truth is, there was much more facility in the Matter, becauſe both the Iſſedonians and the Maſſagettes did extreamly murmur to ſee how careleſly Thomiris diſpatched the Affairs of her two Kingdoms, ſince her Paſſion was above her Reaſon; and that which moſt incenſed the People was, becauſe they ſaw continual preparations of War, and could not ſee an Enemy that Princeſs had to fight with. So that Adonacris cloſing with ſuch a favourable opportunity, did not depart from Iſſedon to come unto Ariantes, until after he had brought things into a condition of commanding in one day the Metropolis of the Kingdom, and Tipanis, and until an Army from the Prince of Callipedes entred, which Octomaſades had negotiated, and levied Men under another pretence. So that by this means Ariantes will hazard to ſpoil all the Deſign, by carrying away Mandana; for he told Indatherſes, that if he did not find the deſign of getting upon a Throne infallible when he came upon the Frontiers of the Maſſagettes, he would negotiate with Thomiris, knowing very well, that conſidering her affection to you, he could certainly make his Peace with her, by bringing the Princeſs Mandana into her power, and by demanding her protection to marry her, and to defend her againſt you, Sir. And certainly, Sir, I make no queſtion but this Negotiation takes; for that Princeſs is ſo fully bent, either to make you change your Mind, Sir, or elſe to be revenged of you, by declaring War, that ſhe hearing I condemned ſuch an unjuſt Enterprize, was ſo incenſed againſt me, as for the ſecurity of my Perſon I came out of her Dominions. And ſince Fame Trumpets the Glory of your Arms, Sir, through the whole Earth, I reſolved to imploy the time of my Exile, in being a Witneſs of all thoſe Glorious Actions, of which Renown makes a noiſe through all the World. But as Fate aſſembles and ſevers Friends and Enemies as ſhe pleaſeth, in coming hither, I met the Servant of Adonacris, who carried me to the place where his Maſter was, for whom I received the knowledg of theſe laſt Occurrences, after we had renewed our ancient Acquaintance.

Anabaris having ended, Cyrus ſaid he was much obliged to him for acquainting him with many things, which might help him to prevent the deſign of Ariantes. Alſo he deſired him, to aſſure Adonacris that he would be glad to ſerve him. After which, to make uſe of this Intelligence, he diſpatched another Poſt to Gelonide, to inform her of all that might hinder Thomiris from having Mandana in her Power.

ARTAMENES, OR THE GRAND CYRUS.

Part IX. Book II.

AFter Cyrus had well examined all the Intelligence concerning Ariantes, which he received from the Friend of Adonacris, he concluded, that his beſt courſe was to execute his former Reſolution, and to march towards the Maſſagettan Country, to the end he might fall upon Thomiris, if ſhe received Mandana with intentions of keeping her, or upon Ariantes, if he carried her to Iſſedon. So that betimes the next Morning, giving out all requiſite Orders, and himſelf ordering the Ways which every Troop was to take, he departed two days after: But before he went, he viſited Adonacris, (Indatherſes being with him) with whom he had ſo much diſcourſe, as did let him ſee that Anabaris gave a true Character of him, when he ſo highly commended him.

This Viſit was more than a Viſit of Civility; for Cyrus told Adonacris, that being acquainted with his Vertues by Indatherſes, he deſired him to go unto the Prince Ariantes, and endeavour to bring him unto Reaſon, and make him repent of that unjuſt Reſolution which he had taken. Sir, replied Adonacris, though you had not made this Propoſition unto me, yet I would have addreſſed my ſelf unto you for liberty to do as you command me. But, Sir, ſince the high eſteem which I know the Prince Ariantes hath of you, and the Obligations upon him, as Anaxaris could not diſſwade him from following his Paſſion, I fear I ſhall not prevail with him; yet I am reſolved to do what I can, both for your ſake and his, as ſoon as my Wounds will permit me. After this, Cyrus imbraced Anabaris alſo, who offered to do him all the Service he was able in delivering Mandana, knowing that the Liberty of that Princeſs would prevent the Deſolation of his Country. As for Indatherſes, though he had cured himſelf of his dotage upon Thomiris, yet for all that he was not altogether neutral and indifferent; but on the contrary, he could not chuſe but wiſh, as generous as he was, that nothing might ſucceed happily unto her. So mixing a thought of Revenge unto the Intereſts of Cyrus, whom he highly honoured, he followed him with much joy.

This march having much wearied his Army, he thought it convenient to make a halt before he advanced any farther towards Thomiris, whom he knew had a very numerous Army. Alſo not yet knowing where Mandana was, he thought good to get more Intelligence before he went any further; but he ſtaid not long for it, becauſe the third day, as he was talking with the Prince Mazares, and the Prince Myrſiles, Feraulas returned, who by his look made Cyrus to know that he had ſome News concerning his Princeſs. For Heaven's ſake, dear Feraulas (ſaid he at firſt unto him) tell me quickly what News of Mandana? For I know, by your Eyes, that you have ſomething to tell me of her. 'Tis true, Sir, replied he, I can tell you ſomething which you deſire to know; but the worſt is, I can tell you nothing that will pleaſe you: Be pleaſed to know, that in obedience to your Orders, I went unto the next Port to the place where I left you; but, Sir, in lieu of finding many Ships to follow Ariantes, I found but one that was fit to ſail the ſame hour: So that imbarquing, with twenty of thoſe Men which you gave me, I left the reſt to get into other Ships which were preparing; and I told my Pilot, that my Deſign was only to croſs the Sea towards Colchides, in hopes to hear ſome news of a Ship which I was in queſt of: Indeed, Sir, I was ſo fortunate as to underſtand from ſome Fiſhermen, that they ſaw ſuch a Ship as I enquired after, which though it had not a favourable Wind, yet ſtill made forward; ſo that hoping it was the ſame I deſired to find, I deſired my Pilot to ſteer that way, and to follow it. To ſay the Truth, Sir, it plainly appeared, that the Gods were pleaſed you ſhould know where Mandana is; for after this, I ſtill met with Barks or Ships which met with that I followed: That which did confirm me in my Opinion this Ship was Ariantes's, was, becauſe the Captain of a Ship I met with told me, he ſaw upon the Deck of that which I enquired after, two very fair Ladies, which ſeemed to be much troubled; and a third whoſe Face he could not ſee, becauſe ſhe was always wiping her Eyes as if ſhe wept. This, Sir, made me glad; but gladder I was when he told me, that the Pilot which guided this Ship I enquired after, had conference with him I met, and asked him whether he might ſafely land near that place where the River Phaſes empties it ſelf into the Euxine Sea? and this Pilot aſſuring him that he might, provided he took the Water at full Tide, and avoided one Rock which the Water covered near that place. I made uſe, Sir, of all this, and made immediately unto the Place where Ariantes would land; but he having much the ſtart of me, make what haſte I could, he was landed before I came thither: But, 'tis true, I underſtood that he had carried the Princeſs Mandana unto a Caſtle not above ſix Furlongs from thence, and which is ſeated upon the River Phaſes. But now my greateſt fear was, that if I ſhewed my ſelf, I ſhould be known by thoſe who followed Ariantes, and Andramites. So that to hear more certainly, I ſent thoſe to Land whom I brought from the Port where I firſt imbarqued; but they being a company of dull Fellows, I was not a jot the better informed; all they could tell me was, that it was a thing impoſſible for me to attempt the delivery of that Princeſs, for Ariantes and Andramites did ſo carefully guard her, and the Caſtle was naturally ſo very ſtrong, that all would be in vain: So that having only twenty Men, I could do nothing more than as a Spy. Then after many days Patience, I could deviſe no better way, than to endeavour the getting one of Ariantes Men into my Ship, that I might out of him get ſome light of Ariantes his Deſign, and to keep him there.

So that making choice of three reſolute Souldiers, I put them into the Habit of Mariners; after which, they went and fell in conference with them of a Ship upon that Port; for being all of them idle, when they are off their Guard, that have nothing to do but to walk, and hunt ſome of thoſe Birds which Phaſes gives a name unto, and of which there are a great abundance in that River. So that after they were landed, and had walked and hunted together, and talked of ſeveral indifferent things, thoſe of Ariante's Ship deſired thoſe I ſent to come into their Ship, and they to render Civility for Civility, invited them into theirs: So it chanced that almoſt all thoſe who were invited, were called away upon ſome buſineſs, and only one of them ſtaid behind them. Here, Sir, may the order of Providence be wondered at, for this Man who ſtayed behind, chanced to be one of Mandana's Guard, and a Man beſt able to ſatisfy me in all I deſired to know: So that as ſoon as he was in my Ship, I ſhewed my ſelf unto him, and ſo amazed him, that imagining you were there alſo, and would throw him overboard, as a Puniſhment for his Crime, he threw himſelf at my Feet: For Heaven's ſake, Feraulas, ſaid he, I beſeech you ſave my Life; for if our Prince will ſpare me, I ſhall inform him of ſuch things, as may perhaps deliver Mandana. You may well imagine, Sir, that I promiſed his Life unto him, upon condition he would be as good as his Word, and indeed I made ſuch uſe of his Fears and Hopes, that he told me all he knew. And Andramites having loſt his Man after the Combate, he had entertained this Fellow to wait upon him, until he found his own, or get another. So that this Man being very intimate with him, he often heard the diſcourſe of Ariantes and Andramites concerning their Deſigns. Pray Feraulas (ſaid Cyrus, and interrupted him) tell me quickly if you know them. I ſhall tell you, Sir, replied Feraulas, how I underſtand by this Guard, that though the Prince Ariantes has a great mind to make himſelf King of Iſſedon; he had rather preſerve Mandana, than conquer a Kingdom, and hazard the loſing of her, not doubting but both you and Thomiris will fall upon him, if he carry her unto Iſſedon.

So that caring for nothing but how to keep Mandana, he was no ſooner aſhore, but he writ unto Thomiris, and to all his Friends about her, beſeeching her to forget what was paſt, and he would ſolemnly renounce all his claim unto the Crown of Iſſedon, and pretend unto nothing but the Quality of her Subject, provided ſhe would receive Mandana into her Court, that ſhe would promiſe never to render her unto you, Sir, but uſe her beſt endeavours that he might marry her. Thus, Sir, you may well conceive, that Thomiris would not refuſe a Propoſition which would aſſure her of a Crown, and which would bring that Perſon into her Power, whom ſhe believed was the only cauſe why you, Sir, did not love her. Alſo this Guard told me, that Ariantes received an anſwer as favourable as he could wiſh; that Thomiris would forget all that was paſt, and offered him what Security he would deſire for the Safety of his and Mandana's Perſon; and that ſhe would ſolemnly ingage her ſelf never to reſtore her unto you, Sir. And indeed this Guard further told me, that Thomiris ſent two Men of Quality unto Ariantes to tell him, that if he deſired her Son in Hoſtage, ſhe would give him, provided he would let Mandana be in her Power. But Ariantes knowing very well that Thomiris had ſuch an Intereſt as would make her keep promiſe as to Mandana, he thought it his beſt courſe abſolutely to truſt her; therefore the next Morning he went by Land unto Colchides, and from thence to Thomiris.

At the ſame time he ſent unto one, who as I think was called Octomaſades, to tell him, that now he had no further deſign of making himſelf King: He ſent alſo unto Iſſedon, to all them that had ſtirred in his behalf, to tell them the ſame. I heard all this I tell you from the Mouth of Ariantes and Andramites, as they talked together, not thinking that I heard them, for Love had ſo blinded them both, that they hardly knew who was preſent. After this, Sir, I believed this Guard could tell me no more, and I thought my beſt courſe would be to gain this Fellow, and to ſend him back, purpoſely to hear more news of Mandana. And indeed, I inſpired him with ſo much Horror againſt the perfidiouſneſs of all them that had betrayed you, that I am confident he will prove a faithful Spy; yet I ſent him not away, until I had asked him how Ariantes behaved himſelf towards the Princeſs? and he told me, that he was ſo full of Reverence and Reſpect, that ſhe had no reaſon to complain of any thing but his carrying her away; yet he aſſured me, that ſhe was extreamly troubled, and that if ſhe had not the comfort of Marteſia's Company, he knew not what ſhe would do, for Doraliſa was ſo full of Sorrow and Anger againſt Andramites, that ſhe was not in any capacity of a Comforter. But, Sir, not to truſt too much unto this Fellow, I hoiſted Sail as ſoon as I had ſet him on Land, leſt he ſhould betray me, and cauſe me to be ſtayed, and ſo hinder me from coming to advertiſe you: Yet ſince I was very deſirous to know certainly whether the Prince Ariantes departed the next Morning according to this Fellows Relation: I put a good way into the Sea, and ſent one in a Cock-boat to enquire the truth; being extreamly ſorry, that I had not Men enough wherewith to hinder him from carrying Mandana with him: But ſince I had Men too few to have any ſuch Thoughts, I conceive it a better courſe to come immediately and acquaint you, Sir, with what I heard, than to attempt things impoſſible; yet I could not make ſo much haſte as I deſired, becauſe the Winds were contrary: But if Geloxide, who heretofore was very kind unto you, have a mind, ſhe may let you know all the news of Mandana. But, Sir, I forgot to tell you that this Guard, who vowed Fidelity, did alſo promiſe me to acquaint her that I had ſpoken with him, upon the firſt opportunity that he found. And that he would aſſure her, you would deliver her out of the Power of Thomiris, very ſhortly, as well as you had done out of the King of Aſſyria's, and the King of Pontus. Indeed Feraulas (ſaid Cyrus) you have done me moſt notable Service, in cauſing him to ſpeak of me unto my Princeſs: But (ſaid he, and turned towards Mazares and the Prince Myrſiles) I do not ſee any thing we have to ſtay for: As he ſaid ſo, Ortalques appeared, and Cyrus admiring his haſte, received him with Joy, in hopes of hearing ſomething concerning Mandana, and indeed his Hopes were not deceived; for Ortalques told him that ſince he went all the way by Land,he came not to the Tents Royal until the day before Mandana arrived, and was there received in huge Pomp. How (ſaid Cyrus) have you been in the very ſame place where Mandana was? Yes, Sir, replied Ortalques, and Gelonide, unto whom I gave your Letter that Night, would needs have me ſee that Princeſs enter. Myrſiles then could not chuſe but enquire of her he adored; ſo that he engaged Ortalques to ſpeak of Doraliſa, and to tell him that ſhe and Marteſia were ſtill with the Princeſs, but I pray (ſaid Cyrus) what ſays Gelonide? You ſhall know, Sir, replied Ortalques, when you have peruſed what I ſhall preſent unto you. I ſaying ſo, Ortalques gave Cyrus a Packet which was ſo big as filled him full of Curioſity to open it in all haſte; as ſo he did: But he was pleaſingly ſurprized, when he ſaw Gelonides Letter which accompanied with two others, the one from Mandana, the other from the Princeſs Ariminta: And firſt he read Mandana's, wherein he found theſe Words.

Mandana unto Cyrus.

SIR,

IT is by the Goodneſs and Wiſdom of the vertuous Gelonide, That I have ſo much liberty as to tell you, that if I did not remember the great Acts you have already done to deliver me, I ſhould deſpair of ever being free: But ſince I have not loſt the Memory of them, I ſhall ſtill hope to ſee you break thoſe Chains which impriſon me: Yet manage well your Life, and do not expoſe me by expoſing your ſelf too far, unto the greateſt of all Misfortunes. Ortalques will tell you how I have been received by the the Maſſagettan Queen: but let me tell you, that I have abundance of comfort in finding the Princeſs Ariminta here; for ſince ſhe cannot yet meet with Happineſs, I am glad that we are miſerable together: for truly I love her ſo well, that I was to blame in accuſing you for the ſame. This is all that one can ſay who hopes e're long to be delivered by you; if Fortune will but be juſt unto your Valour; as I will be unto your Vertue and your Affection.

Mandana.

The reading of this Letter made Cyrus both glad and ſad: he was joyed to find ſome Expreſſions of Tenderneſs towards him; but grieved that ſuch an Illuſtrious Perſon ſhould be under the Power of an incenſed Queen, and of a Rival, who had an Army more numerous than his: but after a whiles reſentment both of Joy and Sorrow, he opened Ariminta's Letter, which gave him theſe Words.

Ariminta unto Cyrus.

SIR,

I Perceive that Fortune will ſtill have me delivered either as the Princeſs Mandana, or as a Slave with her. However to acknowledge my Obligations to you, Sir, I aſſure you that I will do all is poſſible to make her Priſon leſs tedious unto her, and will be as careful to eaſe her Miſeries, as my own: In exchange of which, I conjure you, Sir, to have a care of Spitridates, in what part of the World ſoever he be; and oblige the Prince Tigranes to chide the unjuſt Phraartes for his violent Reſolutions. I ask your Pardon, Sir, for ſpeaking of any thing but the Princeſs Mandana, at a time when I know ſhe takes up your whole Mind: but ſince I know you will meaſure the Miſeries of others by your own, I ſhall hope for a Pardon, and the rather becauſe I ask it in the name of the Princeſs Mandana, whoſe Merits and Vertues I admire, and in whoſe Name I hope you will not deny Ariminta.

What eſteem ſoever Cyrus had of this excellent Princeſs who writ this Letter, doubtleſs he had read it in haſte, as the ſtate of his Soul then ſtood, if ſhe had not both begun and ended it with the Princeſs Mandana: But finding things which related both unto his Miſtreſs and his Friend, he read it both with leaſure and ſatisfaction: Afterward he opened Gleonides, and found what follows.

Gelonide unto the Invincible Cyrus.

SIR,

Since I conceive it better to truſt Ortalques than this thin Paper, with what is worthy your knowledg, I will not therefore write it; Only tell you, Sir, you may be aſſured I will ſerve the Princeſs Mandana in all things: For ſince it is good ſervice unto the Queen whom I ſerve, to oppoſe whatſoever ſhe would do againſt you; and ſince it is a good Office unto you, without betraying her, believe it, Sir, I ſhall do it with all the wit I am capable of, and with all affection poſſible.

Gelonide.

As Cyrus ended the reading this Letter, Chriſantes and Aglatidas came to him: and this Prince knowing they writ unto Gelonide, he asked Ortalques whether ſhe had returned any Anſwers to them? And after he ſaid that ſhe had anſwered them, he bad him deliver the Letters unto him; for ſince they writ only concerning Mandana, he had more intereſt in her Anſwer than they had: And it was apparent by thoſe two Letters, that ſhe really intended to do all good Offices ſhe was able for that Princeſs. However, after he had read them aloud, and given them unto whom they were written, he commanded Ortalques to tell him all he knew concerning Mandana, and to ſpeak in the preſence of Mazares, Merſiles, Aglatidas, Chriſantes, and Feraulas. Sir, replied Ortalques, I do underſtand by Gelonide, that the Prince Ariantes, after he had carried away Mandana, did land at Colchides: and afterwards had negotiated ſo well with Thomiris, that ſhe, to get Mandana into her Power, promiſed him to forget all Paſſages; never to reſtore that

Princeſs back, and to endeavour a Marriage with her to him. As I have gotten her out of the Power of the Aſſyrian King, and the King of Pontus, replied Cyrus haſtily, ſo I hope to get her out of the power of Thomiris: Her Tents are not ſo hard to be ſcaled, as the Walls of Sinope, Babylon, Sardis and Cumes. But Ortalques, go on (ſaid he) and tell me all I deſire to know, eſpecially how the Queen of Maſſagettes doth treat Mandana, and whether you have ſeen her? Sir, replied Ortalques, to ſatisfy your curioſity, I muſt tell you, that as ſoon as the Treaty between Thomiris and Ariantes was ended, there appeared more joy in the Face of that Queen, than ever appeared ſince you parted from her; and the very thought of having the Princeſs Mandana in her Power, was a moſt incredible ſatisfaction unto her: But to the end this Treaty might be the more ſolidly concluded, there was an Enterview between Ariantes and Thomiris, upon the Banks of the River Araxes; that Prince having left Mandana under the Guard of Andramites whileſt he went to meet the Maſſagettan Queen: Moreover I underſtand by Gelonide, who was preſent at this Enterview, that there was a Solemn Reconciliation made between them: yet Ariantes carried it ſo cunningly, that he ſpoke not a word unto Thomiris of her Affection unto you, Sir, and ſhe carried her ſelf ſo demurely, maugre the violence of her Temper, that ſhe told him that the reaſon why ſhe treated him ſo well, was not becauſe he was her Brother, but becauſe he was Rival unto you, Sir, yet they underſtood each other very well. But in concluſion, the more eaſily to make the Princeſs Mandana diſpair of liberty, and not to grieve Ariantes, they reſolved to bring her through all the Army of Thomiris: And accordingly, Sir, when Mandana was conducted by the Prince Ariantes to the Queen his Siſter, Thomiris cauſed her Army to be drawn up into Battalia in a great Plain; So that Mandana (unto whom ſhe ſent a ſtately Charriot, and a Complement by one of her Officers) did paſs through the midſt of all theſe Troops, whoſe Multitude and Magnificence made that Princeſs extreamly melancholy, as Marteſia told me ſince. However, Ariantes antes and Andramites did ride on Horſe-back after Mandana's Chariot, which was conducted into a moſt ſtately Tent, next unto that belonging to the Princeſs Ariminta, for whom Phaartes, after he carried her away, asked Sanctuary and Protection from the Maſſagettan Queen: But, Sir, ſhe was no ſooner there, than they placed Guards upon her, and within an hour after, Thomiris came to viſit her; for the Prince Ariantes upon the Treaty obliged her to do all imagineable Honours unto her: and it is to be believed, that though ſhe had no other reaſon for her Viſit unto this Princeſs, but only the ſatisfaction of her own Curioſity, yet that was enough.

To give you, Sir, an exact Relation of all the Paſſages at this Enterview, will be a difficult task: For Marteſia, told them unto me in ſuch haſte, that perhaps I may forget ſome Circumſtances, though I did my beſt to remember all: But, Sir, give me leave to tell you, that when Thomiris came in, Mandana was lamenting with Doraliſa and Marteſia, the cruelty of her Fortune; and as ſoon as ſhe knew that Thomiris was coming, ſhe went unto the Door of the Tent to meet her, and received her with as much Sadneſs in her Countenance, as Civility in her Language: But, Sir, for all her ſadneſs, Thomiris was amazed at the Beauty of this Princeſs: at leaſt thoſe who were preſent obſerved, that as ſoon as ſhe ſaw her, ſhe bluſh'd, and ſuch Admiration appeared in her Eyes, that Doraliſa believed ſhe repented of her Injuries unto a Perſon of ſuch rare Beauty: Mandana alſo, found Thomiris ſo fair (though ſhe had not the freſhneſs of ſixteen upon her Cheeks) that Marteſia charged me to tell you, Sir, that Mandana thought her ſelf obliged unto you, for refuſing the Affection of ſo fair a Queen as ſhe. The truth is, Sir, Thomiris ſeemed to be not above two and twenty, or three and twenty at the moſt.

But to return from whence I digreſſed, the Maſſagettan Queen no ſooner ſaw Mandana, but this Princeſs began to ſpeak. I know not, Madam, (ſaid ſhe unto her, in the Aſſyrian Tongue, knowing Thomiris could ſpeak it) whether I ought to complain againſt, or commend you, for the Honours you have done me; yet ſince Fame ſpeaks ſo loud in your advantage, I ſhall hope that for your Honour and my Satisfaction, you will protect me.: I will believe that theſe Guards which you have placed about me, are more for my ſafety than to keep me Captive: I am almoſt perſwaded, that your Reaſon, Madam, will ſatisfy Ariantes, and that he will repent of his unjuſt courſe. As he is my brother, Madam, replied Thomiris, it would not be juſt in me to be againſt him abſolutely, but give me leave to tell you, Madam, that as ſoon as you have ſet him at liberty, I will do the like to you, and I promiſe, that when he is no more your Slave, you ſhall be no longer my Priſoner; and this is as much as I ought to promiſe you: But, Madam, the chief cauſe of my coming hither, is to tell you that your Captivity ſhall not be harſh, and that you ſhall be waited upon with all reverence and reſpect, due unto your Quality and Merit. Though this be very civil and obliging, replied the Princeſs, yet I cannot chuſe but think it infinitely harſh; for I beſeech you, Madam, tell me what right had Ariantes to bring me hither, and what colour of right have you to keep me here? By the right of Force and Arms, Madam, replied Thomiris, which is the very ſame right Cyrus hath to be Conqueror of the greateſt part of Aſia. However, Madam, let us not now examine my Brother's Reaſons, nor let us talk either at this time of Liberty or Impriſonment: Victory is ſo uſed to follow Cyrus, that though you ſhould not be free until after he hath vanquiſhed me, yet doubtleſs you will expect it very ſhortly: for truly what likelyhood is there, that a Queen can reſiſt a Prince who hath conquered ſo many Kings? for I have neither walled Towns, nor fortified Places, nor no Sanctuary but the Valour of my own Subjects: therefore, Madam, it is very improbable that a Princeſs whom Cyrus eſteems not, can long defend her ſelf againſt him. Indeed, Madam, (ſaid Mandana, very prudently, and interrupted her) I cannot agree unto all you ſay, for I know that Cyrus doth infinitely eſteem you.

I know better than you do, Madam, what he thinks of me (replied Thomiris, and bluſh'd for ſhame): But for all that, I aſſure you Madam, as weak as I am, and though the Maſſagetteans have no ſtrong Towns, yet they are not eaſily vanquiſhed. For they fight only for Glory, and never fear that a long War will ruin their Towns and Houſes, becauſe they have them not, they will fight reſolutely, and never ſubmit till the laſt gaſp. But, Madam, added ſhe, I beſeech you let us talk no longer of Victory or of War: let us leave the future to the Gods, and let us at this time think upon nothing that may diſpleaſe you: and to that end, Madam, I will ſuffer the Princeſs of Pontus, who is here, to ſee you; for ſhe being of that Country where there is more politeneſs than you will find in ours, I believe ſhe will more divert you, and will think her ſelf very happy in the ſociety of ſuch a one as you.

Mandana wondering to hear that Ariminta was there, could not chuſe but expreſs her Wonder, and ask how ſhe came thither. So that Thomiris who was not ſorry to change the Diſcourſe, told her, in few words, that the Prince Phraartes brought her thither, and deſired protection for her. After which, Thomiris not being able to ſtay longer with a Perſon whom ſhe found fairer than ſhe wiſhed, did retire, after a civil Complement unto Mandana. She was no ſooner gone, but the Princeſs Ariminta, conducted by him who guarded her, did enter into the Chamber of this Princeſs. But, Sir, this Enterview was more pleaſing than that of Mandana and Thomiris; for though theſe two Princeſſes had never ſeen each other, yet they accoſted each other as if they had been ancient Friends; and the ſuitableneſs of both their Fortunes together, with the high eſteem they had of each other, by the Reports of ſuch as ſpoke of their Merits, did preſently contract a moſt intimate League of Friendſhip between theſe two admirable Ladies.

The ſame alſo was between Heſionide and Marteſia: And as for Doroliſa, her Deſtiny was ſo happy upon this Occaſion, that ſhe became a great Conſolation unto theſe two Princeſſes; for though ſhe was extreamly grieved at Mandana's dana's Miſery, and to ſee Andramites ſo near her, yet a kind of ſpiteful Sorrow (if I may ſo phraſe it) made her expreſs a thouſand pleaſant Paſſages ſince ſhe came to that place. But, Sir, to conclude all I know, be pleaſed to underſtand, that vertuous Gelonide carried the matter ſo handſomly, that the next morning ſhe brought me to the ſpeech of Marteſia, who ſhewed me a glimpſe of the Princeſs, who commanded me to acquaint you with all I knew. So, Sir, Gelonide thinking it convenient that you ſhould preſently be acquainted with the ſtate of things, did give me a Packet to preſent unto you: She bad me ſet forward the next Morning, and procured me a Guide, leſt I ſhould be ſtopped at the Paſſage over the River Araxes: But as I took my leave of her, ſhe commanded me to tell you, Sir, that ſhe would do all that ever ſhe could to infuſe Reaſon into the Mind of Thomiris and Ariantes; yet adding, that ſhe feared all would be to no purpoſe. After this, Ortalques was ſilent, and Cyrus put many Queſtions unto him, unto which he anſwered according to his Knowledg or Ignorance; and after he had ſufficiently ſatisfied his Maſter's Curioſity, he retired. But as for the Prince Myrſiles, though he durſt not interrupt them, yet he was extreamly deſirous to be ſatisfied of all Paſſages concerning Doraliſa; and therefore upon the firſt occaſion, he left Cyrus, and went to talk with Ortalqnes at more leaſure.

In the mean time, ſince no further Intelligence was to be expected, Cyrus reſolved with Mazares to advance to the River Araxes, and afterwards to carry things fairly towards a Queen, whoſe injuſtice proceeded only from her too much Affection to him; he ſent a Perſon of good Quality to her, to demand the Princeſs Mandana, and the Princeſs Ariminta, before he proceeded to the laſt Remedy of War. In the interim, he took Order for ſo many Boats as would make a Bridg over the River Araxes: So that calling a Council the next day, more for Form than Need, it was reſolved upon as he propounded, and accordingly his Army began to march, and marched without any Obſtacle unto the River Araxes, where it encamped.

He was no ſooner there, but he underſtood that the Princeſs Oneſile, Wife unto Tigranes, was come unto a little Town which was one of his Quarters, and that from thence ſhe would come unto him, to enquire news of her Husband from his Mouth. Cyrus having a high eſteem of this Princeſs, and knowing how ſorry Tigranes was for her, and ſhe for him, he would needs go and viſit her, ſince he had time enough to do it without prejudice to his Deſign; for ſince he could not ſend to Thomiris until the next day, he had that day entire to render Civilities to the Princeſs of Armenia: And certainly Cyrus had abundance of reaſon for his high eſteem of her, for indeed ſhe was a Princeſs of a moſt extraordinary Merit: The very Truth is, Oneſile had all the Excellency that could be wiſhed for in Woman, either for Graces of Body, or Qualities of Soul. Oneſile was big, of a tall Stature, and a moſt excellent Preſence; ſhe had brown Hair, black Eyes, pure Complection, delicate Skin, Lips red and ſmiling, and the whole compoſure of her Face pleaſing, tho of a very particular Symitry, for one could not ſay that it was either abſolutely oval, or abſolutely round; moreover, her Noſe was rightly ſhaped, neither too great nor too little, but it and every Part ſo fitly proportioned, as made her the faireſt and moſt charming Beauty in the World; for ſhe was not only all that I have already deſcribed, but moreover there was ſuch a ſplendent Luſtre in her Eyes, ſuch a fineneſs of Air, and ſo noble and ſprightly a Phyſiognomy, ſuch a particular beauty in her Mouth, her Neck ſo admirably fair, and ſo brave a Character in all her Geſtures, as did infinitely pleaſe: So that though ſhe had no other Graces but thoſe of her Perſon, yet they were enough to beget both Love and Wonder: Yet her Mind did ſhine more glorious than her Eyes, for it was moſt penetrating, moſt knowing, moſt pleaſing, moſt ſolid, and of a vaſt Capacity: For though her Fancy was ſo ready and quick, that ſhe did anticipate the Thoughts of all who talked unto her; and though her manner of conceiving things might be called ſometimes a Divination, yet it is moſt certain, that as quick as her Fancy and Imagination was, yet it did never go before her Judgment, which always gave a true Judgment upon every thing: 'Tis true, ſhe might ſometimes ſeem blameable for not being always ſo; for the truth is, there are ſome few Men in the World which could ſo much take up her Mind, that ſhe could not for a long time think upon any thing but what they ſaid unto her, but ſhe would return ſo handſomly and pleaſingly out of theſe little Diſtractions, (for which her intimate Friends did chide her) that ſhe would anſwer ſo juſtly unto what they thought ſhe did not hear; as it was apparent, that that which ſeemed diſtraction and ſtudying, was only an effect of her vaſt Mind, which could not be confined to one ſingle Object, but divided it ſelf into ſo many ſeveral, as it was not poſſible, whilſt it was ſo divided, but ſomething muſt appear, either in the Tone of the Voice, or in the Eyes, or in ſome of the Actions; and I think, that her Generoſity may as well be accuſed, for often when ſhe hath been hearkening unto one Friend, ſhe hath been thinking how to ſerve another.

Thus it may, without flattery, be ſaid, that whatſoever the Princeſs of Armenia can be accuſed of, does conduce to render her more amiable, and more perfect, and are only pure Effects of the greatneſs of her Soul and Goodneſs; and when ſhe talked in good earneſt unto any, her Diſcourſe was the moſt pleaſing in the World, and able to give full ſatisfaction unto the moſt delicate and difficult Queſtions, there being nothing ſo high, unto which ſhe could not give a good account, nor nothing ſo low unto which ſhe would not nobly ſpeak. Moreover, it may be ſaid, that never any ſerious Perſon would be ſo wittily merry when ſhe had a mind, nor ever any had ſuch a fine mixture of Modeſty and Gallantry together, as this Princeſs; nor who better underſtood the Subtilties and Intrigues of the World.

As Oneſile was eloquent in her Language, ſo was ſhe as excellent at her Pen; few Women ever writ comparably to her; yet for all this, her Eloquence, her Wit, and her Beauty came ſhort of her Generoſity, of her Goodneſs, and of her Vertue; never any had a Soul more ſolidly generous than Oneſile had, nor did ever any know how to oblige in a more noble way, for ſhe would not only do ſuch Favours for her Friends as they deſired of her, but ſhe would do ſuch Offices for them, as they never did, nor durſt ask her. Moreover, whoſoever was vertuous, was ſure of her Protection; and ſhe was ſo much taken with any extraordinary Merit, that ſhe could never ſee any Man of Parts miſerable without much ſorrow, though they had no relation to her. Indeed, Oneſile had ſo great and noble a Heart, that though ſhe was deſtined to ſit upon the Throne of Armenia; yet it may truly be ſaid, that ſhe was below her Fortune and Merit; and all the World who knew her did ſo pity her want of Health, that they did moſt zealouſly pray for it. Moreover ſtill, Oneſile was as liberal as ever any was; and the very truth is, ſhe had all the Vertues in a high degree; and ſhe was ſo reſpective, and ſo tenderly loved of every one that had the honour to come unto her, as it was no wonder the Merit of ſuch a Perſon ſhould make a deep impreſſion in the Mind of Cyrus, and move him to all poſſible Civility in going to her, as ſoon as he heard ſhe intended to come unto him; and he went with Indatherſes, and ſix more only.

As ſoon as Oneſile heard that Cyrus was coming to her, ſhe went to meet him; but he going very faſt up the Stairs, ſhe was no further than the Door of her Chamber, where after the firſt Complements were over, and that Cyrus had ſaluted a Cozen of Oneſiles which was with her, he preſented Indatherſes unto her, and in few words acquainted her with his Quality and Merit. After which Oneſile expreſſed her Sorrows for the Actions of her Brother-in-law Phraartes, and that ſhe could not hear where Tigranes was, whom ſhe heard went with Spitridates to ſeek his Brother, and to move him concerning the Princeſs Ariminta. I am confident, Sir, (ſaid ſhe, after many other things) that you will think my Sorrows not without good cauſe; and that hearing Phraartes was gone to ask Retreat from Thomiris, I had reaſon to undertake this Journey, to the end if Tigranes came hither, I might prevent thoſe two Brothers from killing each other; for Phraartes always expreſſing much friendſhip to me, I had ſome hopes of reducing him to reaſon if I could ſee him. I wiſh unto the Gods, Madam, replied Cyrus, that you could perſwade both Phraartes and the Prince Ariantes, to ſet thoſe two Princeſſes, whom they carried away, at Liberty; and that the Reports of ſuch a noble Adventure might bring Tigranes back to you. But, Madam, not to ſpend time in vain Wiſhes, give me leave to tell you, that I make no doubt but you will e're long ſee the Prince Tigranes here: for, ſince it is impoſſible, but Fame muſt needs tell him, that the Princeſs Ariminta is with Thomiris, and that I am at the River Araxes; It is very credible that I am not deceived in ſaying you will ſee him very ſhortly.

Whileſt Cyrus was thus talking with the Princeſs of Armenia, Indatherſes and other men of quality who came with Cyrus, did talk unto the Couſin of Oneſile, whoſe name was Telagene, who was one of the moſt noble Families in all Armenia. This Lady underſtood Greek, and Indatherſes having got that Language very perfectly, in his queſt of Anacharſis, he much delighted to talk with her; and certainly not without great reaſon, for ſhe had many attractive and pleaſing qualities. Telagene was of a mean ſtature, but well made: She had Eyes great and blew, of a ſweet and languiſhing luſtre, which pleaſed infinitly: Her Complexion was ſmooth; her Face oval, and her Hair ſo fine, that one may call it fair without doing her a favour. Moreover Telagene, had not only much Beauty, much Sweetneſs; but her Memory was furniſhed with all the excellencies of Greece; And from Heſiode unto Sapho, nothing of all that the Muſes produced, eſcaped her curioſity: Her Reading gave her a moſt excellent faculty in Writing, and that of gallantly, as that might with reaſon be ranked amongſt thoſe which rendred her moſt amiable: Her Diſcourſe was ſweet and complaiſant: Her Soul was tenderly inclined unto Friendſhip; and all her inclinations ſo noble and diſpoſed unto Vertue, that it was no wonder if Indatherſes took delight in talking with her, and thought the time not a quarter of an hour, when Cyrus went from the Princeſs of Armenia, who was reſolved to ſtay in that place, in hopes of ſeeing the Prince Tigranes: For the Town where ſhe was, being an Allie both unto the King of Armenia, and the King of Medes, ſhe was ſafe enough there: Alſo Cyrus being Maſter of the Field on this ſide Araxes, And all the Forces of Thomiris being on the other ſide, ſhe might ſafely enough ſtay there.

In the mean time, as Cyrus returned back along the River, with thoſe who accompanied him, he ſaw a good way before him, a Man who went into a Boat, which was ſo little, as not being able to hold his Horſe, he let him go, and beckned unto another Man on Horſe-back, as if he deſired him to make haſte; Cyrus obſerving this, the looſe Horſe came towards him, and ſeeing him to be a very handſome Horſe, he conceived the Maſter to be a Man of Quality. Cyrus being full of curioſity to know who he was, did gallop as faſt as he could to the place where this Boat was; but when he was within fifty paces, and he in the Boat knowing Cyrus, he changed his intentions of ſtaying for the Man he beckened unto, and rowed in all haſte from the River ſide: and indeed the two Fiſhermen who undertook to paſs him over, did row ſo faſt from ſhore; that there was no ſtaying of them. Cyrus did not know this Man, for he ſo turned his Head from the Shore, that he could not ſee his Face; yet he knew whom he was, for the Man who was coming towards him, ſeeing his Maſter ſtaid not, he turned back, and endeavoured to ſhun meeting with thoſe whom he ſaw. But Cyrus being ſtill fuller of Curioſity, he made towards him ſo faſt, that the Man being amazed at the ſight of him, had not power to fly away: But lighting haſtily from his Horſe, he fell on his Knees before Cyrus, who at firſt knew him not; but preſently recollecting his Memory, he knew him to be one of thoſe forty Cavaliers who heretofore had conſpired againſt him, and whom he had pardoned.

In the mean time, this Wretch ſeeing himſelf in the power of a Prince unto whom he owed his Life, and whoſe Life he would have taken away, began to ſpeak in a trembling tone; I am aſhamed, Sir, (ſaid he unto him) to appear before you, and may ſeem ungrateful: But, Sir, if you will be pleaſed to conſider by what a pitiful Adventure I came to ſerve a Maſter who is your Enemy, I believe you will pardon me; For, Sir, I was born a Subject unto the Prince of Cumes, and I returned unto that Town when you beſieged it: And being choſen one of the Guard of the Caſtle, when Anaxaris made himſelf Maſter of it, and drove out the King of Pontus, that unfortunate Prince, commanding me to follow him in his Flight; I did ſo, and never forſook him ſince. How (ſaid Cyrus, and looked towards the River) is he who is in the Boat the King of Pontus? Yes, Sir, replied he, and I am not afraid to tell you, that he is the moſt miſerable Prince upon Earth. After this, Cyrus looked both up and down the River, to ſee if he could find a Boat to execute a Deſign which he had in his Mind; but ſeeing none, he turned towards the Man again: Though after I have ſaved your Life, (ſaid Cyrus unto him) I might eaſily puniſh you for bearing Arms againſt me; yet I will once more promiſe a Pardon, provided you will truly tell me, what the King of Pontus hath done ſince he went from the Tomb of Meneſteus, and what his Deſign is in going to the Country of Maſſagettes. Sir, (replied the Man, very glad to hear Cyrus ſay ſo) to inform you truly of all this, be pleaſed to know, that the unfortunate King of Pontus, miſerably wounded, departing in the Night, and going along a Terrent, was in an hundred dangers of loſing his Life; but at laſt, day beginning to break, as weak as he was, he went ſo faſt, that he got into a thick Wood, and lighted from his Horſe; then lay under a Tree, becauſe he could not go any further: As ſoon as he was laid, the loſs of Blood had ſo weakened him, that he ſwounded, ſo that then I was in a moſt pitiful caſe; but hearing accidentally ſome Cock crow, I concluded that an Houſe muſt needs be near; ſo that going to the place where I heard the Cock, I found a Shepherd's Cottage ſome two hundred Paces from the place where the King of Pontus lay, and finding in it a good charitable old Man, I told him in what condition my Maſter was, but did not acquaint him with his Quality. This honeſt officious Shepherd calling up all his Family, went with me to the Root of that Tree where

I left the King of Pontus in a Swound; and being moved with Compaſſion, he did not only carry him to his Cottage, but he dreſſed his Wounds, telling him, that it was his Fortune in his Youth to receive a Wound, and an old Shepherd ſhewed him an Herb that grew in the Wood, which would both ſtop Blood, and cloſe up the Wound. The truth is, Sir, this wiſe Shepherd having dreſſed the King of Pontus, he brought him out of his Swound, and was ſo careful over him, that he ſaved his Life. However, falling into a Feaver, he was not able to go out of this Cottage until he had heard that Mandana was carried away, and that you, Sir, was marched towards the Maſſagettans. So that making no queſtion but the place unto which Cyrus went, was that where Mandana was, he made that way, travelling only in the Night, till he heard of certainty that the Princeſs Mandana was with Thomiris, and then he reſolved to go thither. But, Sir, I aſſure you, he had much ado to take this Reſolution; and though I am not worthy to be a Confident of ſo great a Prince's Sorrows, yet I did know ſome of his Thoughts: And indeed he took me along with him, ſince he came from Cumes ſo kindly, and having none to talk unto, rather than not talk, he would ſometimes bemoan himſelf to me: And after I had acquainted him where the Princeſs Mandana was, and who carried her away, I ſaw the perplexity of his Mind. Then ſeeing he was put to the neceſſity of chuſing one Side, he was ſo perplexed, that he knew not which to chuſe: Sometimes his Mind was to fight againſt that Prince who took Mandana away; but ſince he could not find a Heart to be in your Army, he could not reſolve upon that courſe, but choſe rather to take the part of Thomiris, with a reſolution to ſerve in her Army unknown: And in caſe he were diſcovered, then to tell the Prince Ariantes that he pretended not now unto Mandana; and all he aimed at, was to hinder Cyrus from enjoying her: For being perſwaded, that the Princeſs would never conſent that Ariantes ſhould marry her; he thought, that in yielding him all, he yielded him nothing: Thus he went thither, without any hopes, but only of ſeeing Mandana before he died, and to meet with Death in that War. This, Sir, is the Deſign of the Pontean King, whom I have heard a thouſand and a thouſand times ſay, that when he remembred his Obligations unto you, Sir, he could not chuſe but complain againſt the violence of his Paſſion, which forced him to be both unjuſt and ungrateful.

After this, Cyrus ſeeing the Man could tell him no more, he pardoned him: And I will give you leave (ſaid Cyrus) to paſs over the River, and to return unto your Maſter, and tell him from me, that it is the part but of a bad Lover, to ſide with the Raviſher of his Miſtreſs. Tell him further, that if he be truly generous, he will come and imploy his Valour for her Liberty, and fight in my Army: Tell him, that I offer him all that the Princeſs Ariminta his Siſter offered him in Didia: And ſince the Gods are not pleaſed that his Merits ſhould move the Heart of Mandana, methinks he ſhould rather yield her unto me, than [illegible]to the Prince Ariantes. Tell him that Mandana will hate him if he fight for her Raviſher, and will be his Friend if he fight for her Liberty.

Cyrus having ſpoken theſe words, he left this Cavalier; and as he marched on, he complained unto Indatherſes, that Fortune ſhould ſend ſo violent a Man amongſt his Enemies. When he came near his Tent, and lighted from his Horſe, ſome Cavaliers brought four Men unto him, which they had ſtopped as they endeavoured to get over the River: As ſoon as he caſt his Eyes upon the Eldeſt of them, he knew him to be no ordinary Man; yet his Clothes were mean and careleſs, and his Face rather ill-favoured than fair; yet for all this, there was ſuch a ſprightlineſs in his Phiſiognomy, and ſuch fine tranquillity in his Looks, that Cyrus was moved thereby to that Opinion; the reſt of his Companions were handſome, and in the prime of their Age, but as for him, he ſeemed to be above Fifty.

Indatherſes being with Cyrus, knew him to be Anacharſis; ſo that this worthy Nephew of ſuch an illuſtrious

Uncle ſpoke firſt unto Cyrus : I hope, Sir, (ſaid he unto him) that theſe Priſoners will find a favourable Reception, as ſoon as you ſhall know, that the famous Anacharſis, whom I ſought ſo all over Greece, is now in your Power. Since my Souldiers (replied Cyrus moſt obligingly) ought to take none but my Enemies Priſoners, and ſince I do not take the wiſe Anacharſes to be one of that number, I declare him free, and am ſo far from thinking him my Priſoner, that I ſhall think it a great Honour if he will give me leave to be his Friend. Sir, replied Anacharſis, you have no reaſon to rank me in the number of your Enemies, ſince I have made too publick a Profeſſion of being a Friend unto all ſuch as are Owners of any extraordinary Merit, not to eſteem my ſelf in being yours : But, Sir, I deſire you as a ſingular favour to believe, that I do not at all give you my Friendſhip as you are the Conqueror of Aſia, but as you are the Conqueror of Vices, and a Profeſſor of all the Vertues. Did you know me, Sir, replied Cyrus, and ſhould then commend me as you do, I ſhould think my ſelf the moſt glorious of Men ; but ſince you know me only by Fame, which has long uſed to flatter me, I cannot take any great delight in the Commendations of a Man who merits them the moſt of any Man living.

After this, that place being unfit for any long diſcourſe, Cyrus took Anacharſis by the Hand, and carried him unto his Tent ; as ſoon as he was there, he asked him who thoſe were which were with him ; who ſeemed more like Grecians than Scythians ? Sir, replied Anacharſis, he who is next you is indeed a moſt illuſtrious Greek, called Cherſias, a moſt excellently accompliſhed Man, and one who as young as he is, is thought worthy as well as Meneſiphiles and Diocles to be at that famous Banquet of the Seven Sages, where it was my Happineſs to meet them, and of which all the World hath ſo much talked. To be born a Subject unto the Sage Bias, (replied Cyrus) to be the Friend of the wiſe Anacharſis, and to have been in the Society of Periander, Cleobulus, Solon, Pittacus, Thales, and Chilon, is ſo great an advantage, as it is eaſily believed that Cherſias does merit that Honour. I aſſure you, Sir, (replied Cherſias) if all thoſe you have named ſhould often make ſuch ill choice of their Friends as they have done of me, they would not merit the Names of Wiſe; but to ſay truth, certainly they had never done it, but in advantage unto me; I am moſt ſure, that Solon in chuſing Meneſiphiles, whom you ſee there, was not deceived in his choice, no more than the King of Corinth in loving Diocles, whom you ſee there next that generous Athenian. For my part, replied Diocles, I am obliged in memory of that great Prince of whom I had the Honour to be loved, to ſay, that it was my zeal unto his Glory which made him excuſe all my Faults. And I may alſo ſay (added Meneſiphiles) that it was my Love unto my Countrey which moved Solon to be my Friend. However it be, Sir, ſaid Cyrus, I do already much eſteem you all, though I have not yet had the honour of knowing you: But I beſeech you, what cauſe did move three famous Greeks to come into Scythia, which doubtleſs is nothing ſo pleaſant a Countrey as Greece? Sir, (replied Anacharſis, and ſmiled) theſe famous Grecians would perſwade me, that they came hither more for Love of me, than out of any Curioſity of travelling, but I cannot tell whether I ſhould merit the Friendſhip of ſo many wiſe Men if I ſhould ſuffer my ſelf to be ſo eaſily deceived. For my part (replied Diocles) the ſtrongeſt motive of my making this Journey was to ſee the Countrey where the Man was born whom the Sages of Greece admired. As for me (added Cherſias) I cared not ſo much for ſeeing the Countrey of Anacharſis, as for ſeeing Anacharſis himſelf, and for bettering my ſelf by his Wiſdom. I muſt ſincerely acknowledg, Sir, (ſaid Meneſiphiles) that the reaſon of my croſſing the Seas, and paſſing out of Europe into Aſia, was not only to follow Anacharſis, but alſo to have the Honour of being a Witneſs to ſome of thoſe great Acts which Fame ſpeaks ſo loud of through all the World; and to ſee in your Perſon, Sir, the Man whom of all People in the World the famous Solon moſt eſteems; and he charged me to tell you, Sir, how joyed he was when he heard of your generous act in ſaving the King of Lydia from the Fury of the Faggot. I am extreamly glad, replied Cyrus, that Solon can remember me; and I aſſure you I will omit no opportunity of letting you ſee how much I honour the Vertue of that wiſe Man. After this, Cyrus uſed a thouſand obliging Expreſſions unto that famous Scythian, who anſwered him with all imaginable Civility; and though there was a kind of natural Severity in his Diſpoſition, and though he was a profeſſed Enemy unto all frivolous Ceremonies which paſs for the Complements of the time, yet his Travels through Greece and Egypt had a little ſweetned the Severity of his Nature, and ſomething civilized his Philoſophy: So that though he was a little Auſteer, yet he was alſo ſweet and pleaſing, and Cyrus did him all Honours imaginable; he would have them in one of his Tents, he cauſed his own Officers to wait upon them, and he treated Cherſilas, Diocles, and Meneſiphiles ſo well, that they were charmed with his Generoſity. In the mean time, ſince the mind of Cyrus did run continually upon the Intereſts of Mandana, it came into his Thoughts to deſire Anacharſis that he would be a Mediator betwixt Thomiris and him; for having a deſign to ſend unto that Princeſs before he entred into her Countrey, he conceived this wiſe Scythian to be fitter than any other to perſwade her. This Thought no ſooner came into his Head, but he imparted it unto Mazares, who approved of it.

So that to loſe no time, he went unto the Tent where Anacharſis was lodged, and took him aſide to propound his Deſires unto him: To teſtify unto you, Sir, ſaid Cyrus, how much I honour your Vertue, and how well I am perſwaded of all that Fame ſpeaks concerning your Sufficiency and Honeſty, I beſeech you, wiſe Anacharſes, to arbitrate the Buſineſs betwixt me and the Queen of Maſſagettes; I deſire you would go unto her, and move her to releaſe the Princeſs Mandana, who ſhe cannot detain without a groſs Violation of all Laws; for I will render ſo much reſpect unto that Princeſs, as I will not make any War upon her, until after ſhe hath denied me what with all Juſtice I ſhall demand. Sir, replied Anacharſes, I know not how to be an Arbitrator of your Differences; for ſince I can never take any unjuſt Side, I declare unto

You, that though I be a Scythian, I cannot ſide with Thomiris, but am abſolutely all for you; yet if you pleaſe, Sir, to honour me with the Quality of your Ambaſſador, I ſhall with all my Heart go unto that Princeſs, and endeavour to infuſe ſome reaſon into her Soul, and prevent a War, which cannot chuſe but prove deep in Blood: For, Sir, (added this wiſe Scythian very modeſtly) I believe I do underſtand the Language of Thomiris better than any about you doth; alſo I have Greek enough to underſtand your meaning. After this, Cyrus to loſe no time, acquainted him with the ſtate of things, and without telling him how Thomiris was in love with him, he inſtructed him in all Reaſons and Expedients to perſwade that Queen. Cyrus alſo ſpoke to him concerning the Princeſs Ariminta, that he would endeavour her Liberty; and after he had talked above two hours in private with him, it was reſolved that Anacharſes ſhould paſs over the River the next Morning, and accordingly this Reſolution was executed. Cyrus would have ſet Anacharſis forth in an Equipage beſitting his worth; but he told him, that thanks be to the Gods he had long ſince left off all manner of Vanities; and therefore beſeeched him to let him go by himſelf without any other Company; for Cherſias, Diocles, and Meneſiphiles being Greeks, and the Maſſagettans not loving that Nation, he thought it not convenient to carry them: yet Cyrus would not ſuffer him to go ſo, but would needs have Ortalques and two Servants go with him; and the reaſon why Cyrus made choice of Ortalques was, becauſe he intended to write by him unto the Princeſs Mandana, to Ariminta, and to Gelonide, unto whom he was already known: But to the end the Voyage of this Sage Scythian might the better proſper, Cyrus ſent Adonacris another way to perſwade Ariantes not to perſiſt in his unjuſt courſe: Anabaris alſo gave Ortalques many Letters for ſome Friends he had about the Tents-Royal, whom he deſired they would move Thomiris to reſtore Mandana. So that thus many Men negotiating at once, there was ſome reaſon for hope that the Voyage of Anacharſis would not be in vain. In the mean time, this wiſe Scythian having wafted over the River in a Boat, he was ſtopped by ſome Souldiers on the other ſide, who after they knew his buſineſs, conducted him to Thomiris.

But whilſt Anacharſis was going to this Queen, Cyrus was making Prayers for the happy Succeſs of his Voyage, and that Thomiris might be as much moved by his Reaſons, as he was by his Vertue: However, Cyrus knowing that in the beſt hoped for Expeditions, War muſt be looked unto; ſo he gave all neceſſary Orders for making a Bridg of Boats, and he divided his time ſo well, that he had ſome to ſpend in viſiting of theſe three Friends unto Anacharſes, who ſeemed unto him to be worthy of that Honour: Sometimes he would talk to Diocles of the late Corinthian King, and of the Queen his Daughter; ſometimes again he would ſpeak of Solon concerning Policrite, and of Piſiſtrates unto Meneſiphiles; and ſometimes he would deſire Cherſias to diſcourſe concerning the wiſe Bias, unto whom he was a Subject: But he talked principally to them all three concerning Anacharſis; for ſince he was then upon the Negotiation of Mandana's Liberty, he thought it his Duty to take more intereſt in him, than in any elſe.

So that one Morning having Indatherſes, Cherſias, Diocles and Meneſiphiles with him: He conjured them all to tell him what they knew concerning him. Indatherſes then told him, that Anacharſis was wiſe even in his very Cradle: That indeed he never was a Child; that he knew almoſt all things before he was taught them: That his Manners and Behaviour was all Innocency; and that his way of Life, was ever very far from all that can be named Voluptuous. That from his Infancy he ſcoffed at Grandure, and would never admit of any difference between Men, but what Vertue made. This, Sir, (added Indatherſes) was Anacharſis before he went out of the Country of the Thauroſcites, judge you what he is now after ſo many years travel in Egypt and Greece, which are the places where all the Vertues and ſublimeſt Sciences are moſt practiſed; and after the Friendſhip of ſo many excellent Men.

For my particular, ſaid Meneſiphiles, I can aſſure you that Solon was charmed with the Vertue of Anacharſis, whom

when he came to Athens: And believe it, their firſt meeting was ſomething extraordinary: For Anacharſis believing that it was enough to be what he was, to be well received by Solon, he never ſought out for any Man to preſent him unto him, but went himſelf upon his firſt Viſit: So that having Clothes meaner than theſe you ſee him wear, and Solons Mind being poſſeſſed with ſome ſerious Thoughts, he asked him roughly what he was? I am, anſwered he, a poor Stranger, who came to Athens only to be acquainted with you, and to get your Friendſhip. I cannot tell, replied Solon, what advantage you may get, by being acquainted with me, but I know that it is better getting of Friends in ones own Country, than in a ſtrange one. If ſo, anſwered Anacharſis, and ſmiled, then you that are in your own Country, and your own Houſe, muſt be acquainted with me, and make me your Friend. This quick Anſwer did much ſurprize Solon; ſo that looking better upon Anacharſis, he ſaw in his Phyſiognomy a kind of Grandure, which made him repent of the manner of his Reception; ſo that embracing him, he asked pardon for his Incivility: And to repair his Fault, he would needs have him lodge with him: But, Sir, whilſt he was there, he uttered a thouſand excellent things, which made his Capacity apparent; for Anacharſis being altogether for Monarchical Government,he ſhewed a Million of Inconveniences in any other; and ſaid boldly in a full Aſſembly (when he ſaw publick Affairs conſulted upon by a Multitude) that he thought it very ſtrange, that wiſe Men ſhould propound things concerning the Publick-Good, and Fools decide them, hinting at the abundance of young Men who over-voted the old in all great Aſſemblies, and who for want of old Experience, are unable to reaſon juſtly in the manage of great Affairs. In ſhort, Sir, Solon found Anacharſis ſo admirably knowing in all things, that he conſulted with him, and relied upon his Judgment in things of higheſt Concernment, and made him known unto all his Friends. Truly, ſaid Cherſias, it was Solon who writ unto Bias, what Anacharſis was: And it was he alſo (ſaid Diocles) who cauſed Periander to invite him unto that famous Feaſt, at which, (except my ſelf who by their favour was permitted) there were none but Perſons of moſt illuſtrious Fame; and indeed, this Feaſt for the excellency of it, was called the Banquet of the ſeven Sages, not comprehending the reſt who were there, becauſe indeed it was prepared only for them. As Diocles ſaid ſo, one came to acquaint Cyrus that the Princeſs of Armenia was coming, ſo that deſiring to do her all poſſible Honours, he went to meet her at the Door of his Tent, where he received her with much Civility, telling her that if ſhe had any ſervice to command him, ſhe did him much wrong not to command him to come and wait upon her. Since it would not become me, Sir, ſaid ſhe, and ſmiled, to command him, who commands moſt of all Aſia, I thought it more fit to come my ſelf to tell you that I have heard news of Spitridates and Tigranes. Oneſile had no ſooner ſaid ſo, but Cyrus being very impatient to know what they had done ſince their departure, and where they were, he deſired her to tell him. So that this Princeſs acquainted him how ſince Tigranes embarqued from Galatia, with the Prince Spitridates to follow Phraartes who had carried away Ariminta, they wandred continually from Sea to Sea, and could hear nothing of her, until at laſt landing at Cholchides, they underſtood that Phraartes had carried Ariminta unto the Dominions of Thomiris, and that Mandana was there alſo, and that he would march with his Army towards that part of the River Araxes which limits the Maſſagettes on that ſide. And Tigranes who writ all this unto me, further added, that as ſoon as their Equipage which was in making, was ready, they would come unto you Sir; and Tigranes told me further, that he would think himſelf obliged unto me, if I would come unto this place, whither of my ſelf I am come.

Cyrus hearing this, ſeemed to be much joyed that Tigranes and Spitridates would ſo ſhortly be in his Army: For truly, Madam, (ſaid he unto her) I do value thoſe two Princes as good as ten thouſand Men, and I do not doubt but I ſhall deliver Mandana, ſince they will fight for her. They would think themſelves very happy, Sir, replied ſhe, if they can contribute any thing towards the delivery of ſo famous a Princeſs; at leaſt, I am able to anſwer for Tigranes, that he deſires nothing more zealouſly, than to have the glory of ſerving you, Sir.

After this, Cyrus acquainted Oneſile how he had ſent to Thomiris; and ſince he knew Oneſile to be of a very Illuſtrious Houſe, originally a Greek Republique, he preſented thoſe three Grecians unto her, with whom he was talking before ſhe came in, and preſented them as Men who were eſteemed by all the Grandees of Greece: So that this Princeſs being very civil, ſhe received them with the ſweeteſt Grace that was poſſible; the fair Telagene who was with her, did no leſs, and they were all three ſo happy in this Diſcourſe, that at the very firſt meeting they got the eſteem of this Princeſs, and her lovely Couſin. In the mean time, it being Dinner-time, Cyrus told Oneſile, that he left it to her choice whom ſhe would be pleaſed to have dine with her, not excepting himſelf. I have already told you, Sir, replied ſhe, that it becomes not me to preſcribe any thing unto the Conquerour of Aſia. 'Tis true, Madam, ſaid he unto her, but I anſwered always that you might command me any thing. Thus both Cyrus and Oneſile did ſo vie Civilities, that they could not excel each other.

But whilſt they were talking, moſt of the Company there being withdrawn out of reſpect, there was none remaining but Indatherſes and thoſe three Grecians, who dined with Cyrus, Oneſile, and Telagene, and two other Ladies of Quality who followed that Princeſs in her Travels: So that the laſt thing which Cyrus talked on with Diocles, Meneſiphiles, and Cherſias, being the Banquet of the Seven Sages, as ſoon as they did riſe from the Table, he turned towards them: Though there be not ſo many Sages at this Dinner (ſaid he unto them) as at that Feaſt in Corinth; yet I believe we had one Advantage which they had not. Since theſe Ladies who are here, replied Diocles, were not there, nor you neither, Sir, doubtleſs there wanted the greateſt Ornaments of the World: But, Sir, I aſſure you, that Feaſt was more Gallant then you imagine it, for it was not only an Aſſembly of grave Philoſophers, but alſo a moſt pleaſant meeting of Ladies, for the late Queen of Corinth was there, ſhe who raigns at this day alſo, and the Princeſs Eumetis, who otherwiſe is called the Princeſs of Lindes, ſhe was alſo there with the wiſe Cleobulus her Father. Moreover, there was an Embaſſador from the King of Egypt, called Niloxenus; the intimate Friends of Periander were there alſo; the merry Eſope, who at his departure from Lydia came to Corinth, he was there; and indeed this Aſſembly was ſo mixed, that there was enough to find in it all that would ſatisfy any Humour. The truth is, added Meneſiphiles, all manner of things was diſcourſed upon. Queſtions were argued upon all imaginable Subjects; Policy, Morality, Oeconomy, Pleaſures, Riddles, and Muſique, were treated upon, abundance of pleaſing Raillary; a million of Queſtions in matter of Love were put; many an amorous Hiſtory was related; the Adventure of Arion was told, who alſo was there: Indeed, Sir, this Feaſt deſerved the Fame it hath gotten over all Greece. For my part, ſaid Oneſile, I have had the greateſt deſire in the World to know all the particulars of it, ſince a Grecian once coming to Artaxates told me ſomething of it, but not being preſent, he told me only as much as filled me fuller of Curioſity, but nothing to ſatisfy me. Since ſo, Madam, (ſaid Cyrus) you ſpeak it in a happy Hour, for Meneſiphiles, Diocles, and Cherſias were all three preſent at it, and are able to ſatisfy you: Now, Sirs, ſaid he, I know not how time can be better imployed, than in hearing the Sayings of theſe Sages of the World, and of the moſt meritorious Princeſſes upon Earth: For, truly, Madam, the Princeſs Cleobuline is a Perſon compoſed of Wonders; and the Princeſs of Lindes hath been deſcribed unto me ſo amiable, that the time will be very well ſpent in hearing their Wits. After this, Oneſile importuning Diocles, Meneſiphilies and Cherſias to acquaint them with all that was done and ſaid at this famous Feaſt, theſe three Friends did in civility diſpute amongſt themſelves, who ſhould have the Honour to relate it. But in concluſion, it being agreed that Meneſiphiles ſhould begin it, and that Cherſias ſhould end it, the firſt began to ſpeak in theſe terms, addreſſing his Speech unto Oneſile, according to the Orders he received from Cyrus.

The Banquet of the Seven Sages.

BEfore I begin the deſcription of this famous Feaſt, which the Greeks do call Simpoſia, it's fit I tell you, Madam, that though I have related it a hundred times in my Daies, yet I cannot deliver it in the ſame terms, though I never did vary from the Truth in any, when I told unto Men of knowing Capacities, I never mentioned any thing but what paſſed among the Sages, and of things ſuitable to their underſtandings, but never told them of any Paſſages in the Garden amongſt the Princeſſes, Cherſias, Eſope and my ſelf, whilſt the Seven Sages were diſcourſing in high Points of Philoſophy with Anacharſis, Niloxenus, and ſome others. But ſince I am now to make this Relation unto you, I think it convenient not to omit the pleaſing Paſſages of the day preceding this Feaſt; give me leave therefore to tell you, Madam, that ſince nothing was then talked on in Corinth but of theſe famous Men who were met there at one time, and of that Embaſſador from Amaſis, who they ſaid was ſent unto the Seven Sages of Greece, every one was filled with curioſity to know what he would ask of them from the King his Maſter: Great talk was alſo of an extraordinary foreſight in one of thoſe Sages called Chilon, who ſmelling ſomething of the Lacedemonian Severity, being of that Country, he was nothing of Solons Humour, nor of the other Sages, who ſuited their Philoſophy according to the mode of the World; as for Chilon, he would have all the World conformable unto him: So that ſquaring all the Actions of his Life by the ſtraight Rule of Reaſon, he was as careful as could be to converſe with none but ſuch as he eſteemed, and none elſe; and to prevent his being in any other Company, whenſoever his Friends invited him to eat at their Houſes, he would firſt ask who would be there, before he would make any promiſe, ſaying, That a Man who travelled at Sea, might be in the ſame Ship with Men who pleaſed him not, as well as a valiant Souldier might be in the ſame Tent with a Coward, becauſe neceſſity of travelling and encamping with ſuch as Fortune brought together, did allow it without any imprudence: But the caſe was otherwiſe in gojng to Feaſts, and the Man was out of his Wits that would venture himſelf wilfully among a miſcellany of all ſorts of ſeveral People: So, that, according to his Humour and Cuſtom, when Periander invited him to be at this famous Banquet, Chilon asked, before he would promiſe to make one, who would be there? As they named unto him, Thales, Solon, Pittacus, Bias, Cleobulus, and Anarcharſis, he was well contented, and was well pleaſed alſo that Eſope was to be there; but when he was told there would be ſome Ladies alſo, he refuſed to go, and had abſolutely abſented himſelf, if they had not been named unto him: yet ſeeing there was to be but three; The firſt Meliſſa, Wife to Periander: The ſecond, the Princeſs her Daughter; and the third, the Princeſs of Lindes; and that theſe three were the Wives and Daughters to as wiſe a Man as himſelf, he promiſed to be there. As for Diocles, Meneſiphiles, and my ſelf, he did us the favour not to refuſe our company: Yet ſince he had never ſpoken unto the Princeſs of Lindes, Eſope underſtood that he inquired of her very inquiſitively, he was full of his Raillery all that evening with the Princeſs of Lindes, playing upon the ſeverity of Chilon in the wittieſt and pleaſant manner in the World, affirming boldly, that nothing in the World was more dangerous than being over-wiſe. For my part (ſaid he, and ſmiled) it plainly appears that I am not of Chilon's Humour; at leaſt, the Fable which I compoſed of the Country-Mouſe, which came to ſup with the City-Mouſe, makes it appear: I am not ſo ſevere as this Lacedemonian. But (ſaid Eumetis then unto him) your Country-Mouſe does ſo much repent the leaving of her Achorns whereon ſhe lived, and her coming for better Cheer, when ſhe heard the Door open where the City-Rat feaſted her ſelf, that I cannot tell whether Chilon or you have greater Reaſons for your Opinions, and whether he have not more reaſon to be at Home in quiet, than come unto ſuch ill Company as mine: However, I ſhould be very angry with my ſelf, if I ſhould be the cauſe of his not being at the Feaſt to morrow; for I have heard ſay, that though he be ſevere, yet he is a moſt excellent Man; and though he be melancholy, yet he is ſenſible of joy. Since now it is very late, replied Cleobuline, he cannot ſee you before the Feaſt: Yet I have heard ſay, replied ſhe, that Chilon never judges upon any thing by Reports, nor ever truſts any but himſelf. Then it were requiſite (replied Cleobuline) that the Princeſs Eumetis did write ſome piece of Wit, which may be ſhewed unto him, and that ſhe compoſe one of thoſe pleaſant Riddles which ſhe uſed ſo happily to invent, and ſend it unto him, that he may know ſhe has as much Wit as himſelf.

As ſoon as Cleobuline ſaid ſo, all the Company concurred in her Opinion, and moved Eumetis to compoſe a Riddle: So that Eſope, who had always a Table-Book about him, did take one out of his Pocket, and offered himſelf as Secretary unto that Princeſs; who being excellent good at Railiary, told Eſope, that ſhe would let him be her Secretary for once, provided he would let her be his another time: So that ſeeming to ſtudy a while, ſhe writ in Eſops Table-book a Riddle which formerly ſhe had made, and which none ever yet ſaw; but in lieu of addreſſing it unto Chilon, ſhe addreſſed it unto Cleobuline. Then after ſhe had written it in Eſope's Table-Book, ſhe gave it unto Eſope, and he did read theſe words in a diſtinct Voice.

A Riddle unto the Princeſs of Corinth.

What is it,

Which flatters not Kings more than Beggars?
Which ſerves to correct the Faults of others, yet knows them not?
Which is Dumb, and yet gives Counſel?

Which when in the right, is not believed ; but when it flatters, is always credited ?
Which one part of the World makes uſe of to conquer the other ?
Which is multiplied by its own Ruin ?

For my part (ſaid Eſope, and ſhrugged his Shoulders) I muſt confeſs that I better underſtand the Language of my Crows, than the words of the Princeſs of Lindes, though their Voices be nothing ſo charming as hers; and I confeſs, to my ſhame, that I cannot reſolve this Riddle: And I will not ſay for my ſelf, as I made my Fox ſay, when he ſaid, That the Fruit which he could not reach was too Green, and therefore would not reach them: So I will not ſay I will not unty this Riddle, but ingenuouſly confeſs, that I cannot, but am confident that it would puzzle all the Seven Sages of Greece. Really, Eſope, (ſaid the Princeſs of Corinth, and took the Table-Book) it is a great ſhame unto you not to underſtand this Riddle, ſince you could underſtand that which none elſe could without you. Since my ſhame is a glory unto the Princeſs Eumetis, ſaid he, doubtleſs you will rejoice at it. I muſt confeſs it, (replied ſhe) but I ſhould rejoyce much more, if I could have the honour of finding that out which you cannot: However, replied Eumetis, I would not have you find this Riddle out, until Chilon hath tried what he can do, ſince I writ it only to get his good Opinion of me. If you pleaſe, Madam, ſaid Eſope, I will ſhew it unto him immediately, for I know he is in Periander's Chamber. At firſt Eumetis was againſt this, but Cleobuline being of Eſope's Opinion, ſhe bad him ſhew it unto Chilon; yet he would not, until after all the Company confeſſed they underſtood it not: However, Eſope went, and found Chilon in Periander's Chamber, unto whom he ſaid he had ſome Buſineſs of conſequence to impart: He being uſed to the pleaſant Humours of Eſope, and expected ſome diverſion of Wit from him, he hearkened unto him, though he had then with him Solon, Thales, Chilon, and Pittacus: So that after Periander had given him leave to ſpeak, he told Chilon, that knowing he loved not to go unto any Feaſt, unleſs he were acquainted with all the Gueſts and not being ignorant how he had never ſpoken unto the Princeſs of Lindes, he had brought him one of her Riddles, to the end he might ſee ſome of her Wit, and not refuſe her Company the next day. After which preſenting the Riddle unto him, and Chilon as ſevere as he was, loving Raillary, at the deſire of Periander he began to read it aloud; after which, he confeſſed that he did not underſtand it, and that if it proved as true, as it was obſcure, it was an admirable good one. For my part, ſaid Periander, I ſay as much as Chilon. And for my part added Thales, I ſhould be leſs troubled in obſerving the courſe of the Sun, and regulating Seaſons and Years, than I am in finding out this Riddle. As for Solon, he found it out as ſoon as ever he heard it, but being naturally civil towards all Ladies, and Gallantry, not being incompatible with his Philoſophy, he would not make it known that he had found it out, purpoſely to glad the Princeſs of Lindes that her Riddle was undiſcovered: So that Eſope by the order of Periander returned to bring back the Interpretation of this Riddle: For till then, ſaid he, it cannot with Juſtice be commended, ſince it is not enough to be good, but it muſt be underſtood alſo, and be found true in every part, and that when the thing is known, one ſhall admire it was not underſtood. So Eſope returned, and told Eumitis ſhe had puzled all the Sages, and that none of them did underſtand it. Since ſuch things as theſe (replied the Princeſs of Corinth, modeſtly) are ſomtimes found out more by chance than wit; perhaps I have done that which ſome more able than my ſelf could not: And truly Eſope (ſaid ſhe) if you will caſt your Eyes upon that Glaſs which you ſee upon the Table, I am confident you will find that it does flatter the Princeſs of Lindes no more than the Slave behind her; and therefore it was juſt to ſay it does not flatter Kings any more than Beggars; and that it's true, it doth correct the Faults of others, yet knows them not; at leaſt, I am ſure, it hath done me a good Office a thouſand times, yet knew not what it did: It is alſo as true (purſued ſhe) that this Mirror counſels, but ſpeaks not, ſince it hath told me that Carnation Colours better become me than Green. It is alſo as true, that a Mirror is always believed when it flatters, and not believed when it does not. Moreover, the Princeſs of Lindes ſaid, that half of the World makes uſe of a Mirror to conquer the other, could not be enough commended; for all Beauty who would make Conqueſts, do it by the advice of their Mirrors, and add freſh Graces unto their Beauty; ſo that ſhe could not expreſs her thought more nobly: And if you will ſee how the laſt part of my Riddle holds true (ſaid ſhe, and ſmiled,) you may let my Glaſs fall, and find twenty Glaſſes, and twenty Eumettiſes for one, ſo that it might well be ſaid, it was multiplied by its Ruin. Really, ſaid Eſope, I know not who merits moſt Commendations, ſhe who made this Riddle, or ſhe who found it out: For my part, ſaid Eumetis, the Princeſs Cleobuline deſerves moſt, for the Interpretation is more ingenious than the Riddle it ſelf. However it be, ſaid Eſope, I will go preſently and tell Periander, that the Princeſs his Daughter hath done more than he could do; and indeed ſo he did, but he expounded the Riddle unto the King of Corinth after his own mode, to wit, Raillary: for as ſoon as Periander ſaw him: Well, Eſope, ſaid he, What's that which flatters Kings no more then Beggers? It is a thing, Sir, ſaid he, which let's the Princeſs of Corinth, ſee every day when ſhe dreſſeth her ſelf, that ſhe is the faireſt Princeſs in the World, and which ſometimes lets me ſee that I am the uglieſt Fellow upon Earth. As ſoon as Eſope had ſaid ſo, Periander, Solon, Thales, Pitticus, and Chilon began to laugh, and confeſs that the Riddle was moſt ingenious: After which, Eſope began to commend the Interpretation which the Princeſs of Corinth had made upon it, and to ask Chilon whether he thought Eumetis worthy to be at the Feaſt with him. Doubtleſs ſhe hath a moſt rare Wit, (replied he); But, Eſope, I hope you can aſſure me, that the Charms of her Soul will pleaſe, as well as the Beauty of her Wit. After this, Eſope broke out into a hundred pleaſant Expreſſions, twitting at the ſeverity of his Philoſophy, and the exceſs of his Prudence; and afterwards he returned to the Princeſſes, whom he did entertain ſo pleaſantly, that it was late before they retired.

However, the next morning Periander went unto the place where he intended to make this great Feaſt: For to the end it might be more pleaſing, he would have it out of the Town, at a place called the Lecheon Port, neer the Temple of Venus: And indeed, it was the moſt beautiful place in the World: Firſt, the Houſe was a moſt magnificent Structure, and had a huge vaſt Hall Arched, and fit for ſo great an Aſſembly: Then there is a moſt rare Garden, and a moſt pleaſant Grove along the Sea ſide, with ſuch goodly Walks, that a fitter place could not be found again in the World, to entertain ſuch a Company as Periander intended, and to paſs away a day in pleaſure. But, ſince he was to treat Men that were wiſe in the moſt Soveraign degree, he would not uſe all his Magnificence, leſt he ſhould offend their moderation: The truth is, he baniſhed ſuperfluity, but had abundance, kept order, and was neat: Alſo, he had excellent Muſick, and after Dinner, he had a Maſque of Dancing for a Repaſt. But, to do all things with ſplendor, he ſent a Coach unto every one of his invited Gueſts, and he received them at the Gate of the Houſe where he was to treat them, as if he were only a private Man, declaring unto them all as they came, That he would not be a King that day; and that the laſt Act of Authority which he would uſe all that day, ſhould be to command them, to look upon him as their friend, and not at all as the King of Corinth. Had I given ſuch a King unto my Frogs (ſaid Eſope, and ſmiled, ſpeaking in a low Voice) they had not diſobeyed him when he diſpleaſed them. Ha Eſop (replied Periander and ſmiled,) Though you had made me King of your Frogs, yet they would have been Rebels: But you do know the nature of People ſo admirably well, who uſe to murmur both againſt clement and ſevere Princes, that you with much reaſon do merit to be this day a Companion unto them that Greece hath moſt admirable.

As Eſope was ready to anſwer, the Queen of Corinth, the Princeſs her Daughter, and the Princeſs of Lindes came in: preſently after, Solon, Chilon, and all the reſt of the Company aſſembled, for Thales, Pittacus, Bias, Cleobulus, Anacharſis, Niloxenus, Meneſiphiles, Cherſias, a Man of Corinth called Cleodemus, Ardales that famous Muſician, and my ſelf were there before.

I ſhall not now tell you, Sir, the firſt Complements which all theſe illuſtrious Perſons uſed, ſince by ſuch things they cannot be diſtinguiſhed from ordinary Men; nor will I deſcribe the Feaſt unto you; it will be ſufficient I tell you, that all was exquiſite, the Muſick excellent, the Dances admirable, and the Diſcourſe raviſhing: The truth is, there was ſuch a Spirit of joy which did ſo ſpread it ſelf through all the Company, and which did much baniſh all ſeriouſneſs, yet this jollity had nothing in it which was not worthy of thoſe whereof the Company was compoſed; the Company played upon Eſope, and he played upon them after his uſual rate of Raillary; and Anacharſis himſelf was ſo good at it, that no Grecian was better at Raillery than he: The Princeſs alſo did much contribute to the pleaſure of this mixed Converſation, which changed ſubject according to the humour of thoſe who ſpoke; and Periander would have the Princeſs his Daughter with her own hand give Chaplets of Flowers unto every one of the Gueſts, according to the cuſtom of that place. In the mean time, ſince this was not an Aſſembly of Gallants, but of Sages only, Cleobuline and Eumetis were not dreſſed as if they were going to a Ball, yet ſo handſome, that I never ſaw them better than that day. But Madam, as ſoon as they were all riſen from the Table, Niloxenus the King of Ægypts Embaſſador, who was ſent only to conſult with the Seven Sages upon certain Propoſitions which the King of Æthiopia made unto his Maſter, he changed the Diſcourſe: for, after he had read that Kings Letter, and Bias had given a pleaſing Anſwer unto the odd Propoſition which the King of Æthiopia made unto him, and which I ſhall not repeat, becauſe all the World knows it, they fell upon more ſerious things: They began to examine, what would render a King moſt glorious? Solon ſaid, If my Memory fail not, that a King cannot render himſelf more Glorious, than in communicating his Authority. Cleobulus ſaid in his turn, That he was a wiſe Prince who never truſted unto any. Pittacus ſaid, That the greateſt Glory was for a King, to make all his Subjects fear him. And Chilon ſaid, It was moſt glorious to love Honour above all. As for the reſt of the Sages, I muſt confeſs, Sir, I do not well remember what they ſaid: But, as for Eſope, I do remember very well he ſaid, That King was always moſt glorious, who had the valour of a Lyon, the ſubtilty of a Fox, and to his Subjects, the love of a Pelican to her young ones: And for my part (added he with an admirable Action) I muſt uſe my Beaſts and my Birds as well in my Compariſons, as in my Fables.

But after every one had anſwered ſomething to the raillery of Eſope, they fell into Diſcourſe concerning Republiques: And, Thales ſaid, That to govern a Commonwhalth well, Men muſt be kept neither too poor, nor too rich: Anacharſis ſaid, That the beſt way was to make Vertue and Vice the only diſtinction of the Inhabitants: Pittacus ſaid, That Commonwealth was in beſt order, where the Virtuous Commanded, and the Vicious had no Authority: Cleobulus ſaid, That Commonwealth was happieſt, where the People feared Infamy, more than the Law. Solon ſaid, They were beſt, where thoſe who were not oppreſſed, protected them who were, and proſecuted the Oppreſſors as their own Enemies. Bias ſaid, Where the People feared the Law as a Tyrant. Chilon ſaid, Where Ambition was baniſhed. And Periander affirmed, That there the State was happieſt, where the publick Intereſt of the Country was above all private Intereſts. After which, They diſcourſed upon ſeveral other Theams; and indeed, after they had talked of Monarchies, and Republicks, They diſcourſed concerning the Government of private Families, and Chilon maintained, That to be the beſt governed, which moſt reſembled the State of a Monarchy, whoſe Authority is in one only. For my particular, ſaid Eſope, I take moſt delight in being like to the King of Bees; to wit, ſole Maſter of my Houſe: But I muſt confeſs, that when I was a Slave, I had rather have been in my Maſters Houſe, as Ants are in theirs; to wit, with equality in all things. After which, the Embaſſador of Amaſis falling upon the moſt ſublime Subjects, They began to define what Time, what Light, and what Truth was; and to ſpeak of Death, of Fortune, and of the Gods. So that the Three Princeſſes having in modeſty no mind to meddle in ſuch diſcourſes, they retired, and went to walk in that pleaſant Grove I told you of, which was by the Sea ſide. Thus they left the Seven Sages with Anacharſis, Niloxenus, Cleodemus, and Diocles, to talk concerning the moſt ſublime Sciences. In the mean time, Eſope naturally loving the company of Ladies better than mens; and Cherſias and I being obliged to wait upon the Princeſſes, and to ſpeak truth, ſince we were not ſo wiſe, and knowing Men as thoſe we left, we were not ſorry to wait upon theſe amiable perſons: Our company alſo encreaſed, for many in Corinth being full of curioſity to ſee theſe Seven Sages of Greece together; and alſo to ſee that famous Scythian, who was ſo highly ſpoke of; the Princeſſes, with Perianders leave, gave orders to thoſe who kept the Gates of the Garden, after Dinner to let in ten or twelve Ladies of Quality. So that the Princeſſes in their going out of the Hall ſeeing them, theſe Ladies followed them into the Grove, Cleobuline aſſuring them, That ſhe would let them ſee thoſe Illuſtrious Men, whom they ſo longed to know; but ſince they were then very buſie, they muſt ſtay till they went out of the Hall. After which, going to this Grove, they came to a place, which towards the Sea ſide reſembled a Half-Moon, having round about it Seats of Graſs, and theſe Seats being at the feet of Trees, a great number might ſit very conveniently, ſince the place was ſhaded. Theſe Princeſſes then being come to this place, they ſat down, and cauſed all thoſe to ſit alſo who were of Quality befitting their preſence; the reſt, either ſtood behind, or elſe, lay upon the Ground. As for Æſop, he ſtood behind the Princeſs Eumetis, leaning againſt a Tree; at the root of which, was a ſeat of Graſs, upon which She ſat with the Princeſs of Corinth. As for Miliſſa, She was ſeparated from them, and was talking in private with two of the new-come Ladies. So that it was a pleaſant ſight to ſee the Head of Æſop between the heads of thoſe two fair Princeſſes: Yet certainly, as ugly as he was, he made one delight to look upon him; for maugre his uglineſs, there was ſuch a kind of ſubtilty in his phyſiognomy, and all his actions were ſo ingenious, and ſo pleaſing, that I aſſure you, he pleaſed as much by his Perſon, and well by his way of ſpeaking things, as by the things themſelves. As for Cherſias, and I, we ſtood before the Princeſſes, with ſome others which they had let enter with them, and the Ladies I ſpoke of.

As the Beauties were in this poſture, one of the Ladies began to ſay ſhe was exceeding ſorry that a Prince called Baſilides was not then at Corinth, another grieved that a Gallant named Myrinthus was abſent alſo, wiſhing he had ſeen that which perhaps they ſhall never ſee again, it not being poſſible Fortune ſhould aſſemble ſo many great Men together. For my part, ſaid the Princeſs Eumetis, I am vexed at the Egyptian Embaſſadour being here this Day, for though he be a well accompliſhed Man, yet I wiſh he had been abſent, ſince if he had not come in with his Queſtions, the Converſation had not been ſo ſerious; for I muſt confeſs that I am very much pleaſed with the reading of many things which I do not like in converſation; perhaps it is an ill grounded Niceneſs of mind in me, but for all that, I would he had in lieu of talking of Time, of Light, and of Truth, propounded ſome queſtions of Gallantry unto the Sages: As for Solon, replied I, I aſſure you he would have pleaſed you upon ſuch a ſubject, eſpecially if he had talked of Love. As for Love, replied Cleobuline, I confeſs I ſhould not care to hear it ſpoken of before ſuch pieces of Gravity: for though it be a Paſſion as well as the reſt, and though it ſtands in as much need of the Sages help, as any of the other Paſſions, to regulate the Minds of ſuch as are poſſeſſed with it; yet certainly none is able to ſpeak upon that ſubject handſomly, unleſs he were in a Capacity either to love, or to be beloved. I beſeech you, Madam, replied Cherſias, did never any tell you that no wiſe Man could ever be in love? For my part, (ſaid Eumetis to the Princeſs of Corinth) I wiſh Anacharſis were in love with you, that he might not return into Scythia, but ſtay always in Greece. Were he in love with me, and ſo old as he is, replied the Princeſs of Corinth, you would never deſire he ſhould ſtay here; for if he did, certainly he would not be ſo wiſe as he is. To ſpeak rationally (ſaid the Princeſs of Lindes) Love is a ridiculous thing in an old Man; and more in an old Woman, replied Cleobuline. Doubtleſs it is, anſwered Eumetis, but yet this is the difference, ſince the he Lover is obliged unto more ceremony than the ſhe loved, he is put to the Neceſſity of appearing more ridiculous. Eumetis had no ſooner ſaid ſo, but all the Company concurred with her, and an old Lover was blazed in his ridiculous Colours. For my particnlar ſaid one of the Ladies, methinks I ſee him a thing out of faſhion, one that will walk as if he were young, yet do what he can, is old and walks ſo; he will be talking of ſuch Matters of Gallantry, which none can underſtand; he cannot tell how, and yet he will talk of Love, and can talk of nothing elſe. I would fain know, ſaid Eumetis, whether there be any Lady that deſires to hear ſuch a one talk? If there be, replied Cleobuline, queſtionleſs it is to jear him: But yet (added ſhe, and turned towards Eſope) what ſay you unto all this? I ſay, Madam, replied he, as my Wolf ſaid unto the Shepherds who were eating Mutton in their Cottage, (what a noiſe would be made, if I ſhould do as you do.) I am confident, Madam, added he, that you know how to make the Application; for if I ſhould ſay as much as you do, I ſhould preſently be branded with the name of a Maker of biting and ſatyrical Fables; but becauſe you are great Princeſſes, you are allowed to devour a poor Man alive, with more cruelty than the Shepherds devoured the Mutton. I think (ſaid Eumetis, and laughed as well as all the Company) that you intereſt your ſelf in this old Man's Buſineſs, becauſe you do intend to be in love your ſelf. Never queſtion it, Madam, replied he; but you do not conſider that I have a greater advantage than others have; for ſince I was an ugly Fellow at fifteen, and can be no worſe at a hundred, dred, I ſhall not be ſo ridiculous as another, though I were in love with one Leg in my Grave. Since you are perſwaded (and with reaſon) replied Cleobuline, that the pleaſingneſs of your Wit will get you more Love than your Perſon can, certainly you have more priviledg for being long in love than any other. But added Eumetis, ſince we talk of Love, and talk unto Eſope, I muſt needs ask, whether he be ſtill in love with the famous Rhodophe, whom they ſay is now in Egypt? No, Madam, ſaid he unto her, I am not in love, ſince the Brother of the famons Sapho is: And I wiſh that all the Beaſts I ever made ſpeak, may devour me, if ever I do love her again. If it be really true you do not love her, replied Cleobuline, you need not make ſuch cruel Imprecations againſt your ſelf; for I am fully perſwaded one cannot love one Perſon twice, and that it is eaſier to love twenty one after another, than to love one, with whom he was quite broken off. This Rule, replied I, is not ſo general, but will admit of an Exception in a Friend of mine, which loved one Woman twice, with equal Flames. But are you ſure, replied Cherſias, that your Friend does think ſo himſelf? for perhaps he never loved but once, whom he thought he loved twice, and happily never left loving her; for ſometimes Anger makes ſuch a bluſter in the Heart of a Lover, that Love lies lurking in it, though he know it not, and the truth is, he often thinks he hates, when he loves, and thinks he has forgotten her whom he always thinks upon: So that when I ſay it never happens that one loves one Perſon twice, I mean that he did really ceaſe to love her, and not leave the leaſt ſpark unextinguiſhed, which may revive again; for if it do, the Fire never went out. For my part, replied Cleobuline, I do not think there is any ſuch Impoſſibility for one to love the ſame Perſon twice, as you imagine: for though a Cinder be extinguiſhed, and hath been ſo long, certainly it will take fire ſooner than if it had never been lighted. And ſo I conclude, that the firſt Love makes a diſpoſition for a ſecond, and that it is more eaſy to love one whom he loved before, than another. For my particular, Madam, replied Cherſias, I know by experience it was the caſe of a Nephew unto the wiſe Bias, who was as bravely a qualified Man as any in the World, and as far from erecting ſhattered Altars as ever any was, or from Sacrificing one Heart twice unto one and the ſame Deity. This is ſo nice a Queſtion, replied the Princeſs Eumetis, that to imitate the reſt of the Company whom we dined withal, we muſt argue and examine as they do the higheſt and difficult Points in Philoſophy. If an example will make good my Opinion, replied I, I will eaſily prove that one may twice love one and the ſame Perſon: Nay, if an Example will do it, replied Cherſias, I ſhall get the better of you, and make it evident, That one cannot begin again to love a Lady, after he had once abſolutely given over loving her. As Cherſias ſaid ſo, Melliſſa riſing up to walk, and beckning to one whom ſhe would have follow her; the Princeſs, and all the reſt of the Ladies ſtayed ſtill with Cherſias, Eſope, ſome others, and my ſelf. So that the Princeſs of Lindes, who was pleaſed with this Queſtion which was worthy of her Curioſity, obliged Cherſias and me to relate the two Examples of which we ſpoke, and afterwards to make good our Opinions with the beſt Reaſons we could produce; adding afterwards, that the major Vote of the Company ſhould decide the Controverſy. With all my Heart, ſaid Cleobuline, but methinks it is requiſite, ſaid Eumetis, that Eſope have a double Voice: If ſo, ſaid he, I ſhall give them on his ſide, who holds that one cannot love one Perſon twice. Fie Eſope (replied Eumetis, and laughed) you give your Opinion too ſoon, ſince you will pronounce Judgment before the Cauſe be pleaded. I have been ſo frequently familiar with ſome certain babling Birds (replied he, and ſmiled) that you need not wonder if that be my fault. But truly, Madam, I am ſo fully perſwaded of what Meneſiphiles will ſay, and that one cannot love one Perſon twice, that I thought it not amiſs to declare at the beginning, what I knew I ſhould ſay at the end, maugre all the Reaſons of Meneſiphiles. However it be, ſaid Cleobuline, I pray lend your Audience, unleſs you will have me think you leſs wiſe than thoſe Birds, who carry Stones in their Throat to ſtop their Garrulity. After this, the two Princeſſes having commanded Cherſias and me to relate our Examples, and afterwards our Reaſons, it was reſolved that I ſhould firſt relate the Hiſtory of my Friend; which I did in theſe following terms, addreſſing my Speech unto the Princeſs of Lindes, by the command of Cleobuline, as I do addreſs it now unto you Madam, by the command of that great Prince that is preſent.

The Hiſtory of Philidas, and of Anaxandride.

SInce it is not convenient at this preſent, Madam, to make any long Relation, I will not mention who were the Fathers of thoſe whoſe Stories I am to relate, only aſſure you, that Philidas and Anaxandride, whoſe Adventures I ſhall relate in a few words, were both born at Megares, and were extracted from the moſt illuſtrious Families of that famous Town; and Fortune hath not only made them equal in their Births, but alſo in their Merits and Perſons; for Philidas is as handſom as Anaxandride is fair, and Anaxandride has as fine a Wit as Philidas, tho his be high and admirable. Moreover, there is a marvelous ſympathy in their Humours, and their Age alſo is proportionable, for Anaxandride is at this preſent not above nineteen Years of Age, and Philidas Twenty: Beſides all this, be pleaſed to know, that they have ſeen each other from their Cradles, their Houſes joined, and their Fathers were intimate Friends.

After all this, Madam, I aſſure my ſelf, that when I ſhall tell you how Philidas fell in Love with Anaxandride, as ſoon as he was capable of Love, and how ſhe did not reject his Affection, you will think him the happieſt Lover in the World; and I can aſſure you, that as long as his firſt Paſſion laſted, he met with Roſes, and no Prickles in them, but taſted all the Sweets of Love without any Bitterneſs, for he was as much eſteemed as he did eſteem, and I think no leſs loved than he did love: He ſaw her, and talked with her when he pleaſed; their Parents ſaw their Inclinations, and did not croſs them; and if any thing kept Philidas from motioning a Marriage with his Miſtreſs unto his Parents, it was only becauſe he would not think of Marriage as long as an Unkle, whoſe Heir he was to be, was abſent; and this Unkle being gone to travel, and not to return until the Year was over, Philidas thought upon nothing but how to divert his Miſtreſs.

In the mean time, this Condition of his was too happy and too tranquile; and this Hope, which never had any mixture of Fears, did ſo glut the Mind of Philidas, that he hoped for the enjoyment of his Miſtreſs without any delight; and he was ſo ſadded with her Sweetneſs and Civilities, that he became inſenſible of all her Favours; not but that he loved her ſtill, and ſaw her often; but thinking himſelf ſure of her Affection, and that he never needed to ask that queſtion, he therefore had nothing oftentimes to ſay unto her: And indeed he has told me, that he has been fain to talk of News, and of meer Indifferencies when he hath been alone with her, becauſe his Love gave him no new Subject of Diſcourſe. Indeed, Madam, this quiet Hope, and this Equality of Happineſs, together with the certainty of being loved, did by degrees infuſe ſuch a luke-warmneſs of Affection into Philidas; that being to go into the Country, he was more joyed at his going to ſee the Country dreſt in her freſh green Garment, then he was ſorry to part from his Miſtreſs. However, thongh there was a great ſympathy of Humour between Philidas and Anaxandride, yet there was a notable difference in their Hearts upon this occaſion; for as the love of Philidas leſſened, that of Anaxandride encreaſed; and to vex her more, when he came to take his leave, ſhe perceived he ſpoke with too much indifferency; yet ſince that was not a fit time to quarrel, ſhe ſhewed no ſign of diſcontent at the alteration of his Mind: So that he left her without any quarrelling, and without any vexation ever ſince he firſt fell in love with her; yet ſince he asked leave to write unto her, and obtained it, he did write accordingly to her, but his Letter was only a bare deſcription of the Country, and his delights in ſitting under a ſhade, and hearing the Birds ſing in a Wood; yet at the end of his Letter, he wiſhed her where he was, but it was in ſuch a faint manner, as made it evident, that he wiſhed her there, more to hear Nightingals, than to talk to her of any Love-Matters: Yet Anaxandride being perſwaded, that it was dangerous to quarrel with an abſent Lover, as long as ſhe had a mind to keep him, ſhe writ unto him, as if there were no alteration in her Heart: But all this her Goodneſs working its ordinary Effect in the Soul of Philidas, he waited without any impatience, for the day on which he was wont to hear from Alexandride, and I had it from his own Mouth, That his Love to her did ſo cool, that he received a Letter from this fair One in the Morning, and did not read it till Night when he went to Bed. Philidas being then thus coldly indifferent, after ſo much hot Affection, as Chance would have it, his Father writing to him, that he ſhould go unto Salamine about ſome Buſineſs, there he ſaw a great Beauty called Timoxenes; and the Father of this fair One being to go and dwell at Megeres, he was very glad to contract Friendſhip with a Man of his Quality: So that in a few days Philidas had all poſſible freedom in his Houſe. But, Madam, as the too much ſweetneſs of Anaxandride, and the too much happineſs of Philidas, had glutted and cooled his Affection, ſo the fantaſticalneſs of Timoxene cauſed his Inconſtancy to her. For, Madam, he found in her all things contrary to the other; certainly never any was of a more unequal and peeviſh Humour, nor who loved better to wrangle with her Lovers, and fall out with her Friends; for it was the common talk, Timoxene ſaid ſuch and ſuch a thing; Timoxene ſaid ſuch an one told her ſo; Timoxene complains againſt ſuch an One, or ſuch an One againſt her; Timoxene is fallen out with him, or he with her: And the truth is, Timoxene, out of her perverſe inequality of Humour, did ſo intangle things, and trouble both her ſelf and all the World, that ſhe baniſhed almoſt every one from the Place where ſhe was, for ſhe made every one to fall in Love with her, or elſe ſowed Seeds of Diviſion between thoſe who intended to contract moſt ſolid Friendſhip, & all this out of her unequality of Humour: For ſome days ſhe would tell whatſoever was told her for he greateſt Secret, and on others on the contrary; her beſt Friends could not get the leaſt Syllable out of her; and ſometimes ſhe would care ſo little what ſhe ſaid, that ſhe would ſpeak againſt her own Intereſt. However, Timoxene was amiable and lovely; but the truth is, ſhe had more Lovers than Friends; yet as fantaſtical as ſhe was, ſhe won many to love her; and though ſhe was moſt unequal in her Humours, yet it may be ſaid, ſhe did what ſhe could to anger Love, but not to ruin it, for her Phantaſms laſted not long: And when ſhe was in a good Humour, there was not a more charming, cheriſhing, and ſweeter Perſon in the World: Indeed, ſometimes one would ſwear, ſhe was ever all ſweetneſs and pleaſing; ſo that in this good Mood, a Man would give her more power over his Heart, than he was able to recal again.

Timoxene being as I have deſcribed her, ſhe was in one of thoſe pleaſing Fits, when Philidas firſt ſaw her. So that ſince his Love to Anaxandride was extinguiſhed by her too much Sweetneſs, and his too much Happineſs; her Idea did not hinder him from thinking Timoxene very Fair and infinitely Wity. Moreover, he learned that very firſt day, how ſhe had many Lovers; and he knew alſo, that ſhe was one whoſe Affection was the moſt difficult in the World to be gotten, and the hardeſt to be kept when it was gotten. But, Madam, without further Aggravations of this fantaſtical Adventure, let me tell you, that Philidas being weary of being happy; or to ſay better, not reſenting his good Fortune, becauſe he was too much accuſtomed unto it, he ſought to make himſelf miſerable in thinking to find Felicity, for he ſaw Timoxene ſo often, that he fell in Love with her, and by conſequence left loving Anaxandride: So as it cannot be ſaid he loved her ſtill, ſince the greateſt ſign of not loving a Perſon, is to love another. But to tell you truly, Philidas was no ſooner the Lover of Timoxene, but he was rouzed out of that amorous Lethargy, in which the ſweetneſs of Anaxandride had lulled him; for from the very firſt day he began to love this fantaſtical Perſon, he was as full of Jealouſy as Love, and as full of Anger as Jealouſy: However, that which in all reaſon ſhould have leſſened his Paſſion, did encreaſe it, and he became as faſt fettered in the Chains of Timoxene, as ever he was with Anaxandrides.

But as Fame commonly carries ſuch News, ſo that the fair One at Megares quickly heard that her Lover was perfidious, and that he was fallen in Love at Salamine: So that ſince ſhe really loved him, ſhe was incredibly ſad at the News, yet it was a very glorious Sorrow; for reſolving to ſlight him who ſlighted her, ſhe endeavoured all poſſible ways to quiet her own Mind: But to tell you truly, the Hatred which ſucceed her Love, did put her to as much pain as her Love had done.

In the mean time, ſince as I told you before, the Father of Timoxene intended to go and dwell at Megares; ſo he went thither with all his Family, and Philidas returned with him. And as it is the cuſtom of the Place, that when any ſtrange Lady came thither, all the Ladies of the Town uſe to viſit her: So Anaxandride went to Timoxene with her Mother; and to perform a piece of Civility unto a Perſon who had taken the Heart of her Lover from her, ſhe was ſo unfortunate as to find Philidas there: Yet I heard her ſay ſince, that ſhe took more pleaſure in this Viſit than ſhe expected; for ſince ſhe had no deſire to find Timoxene Fair, her Imagination did ſo flatter her Paſſion, that ſhe fancied Timoxene otherwiſe than ſhe was, for ſhe thought her Hair too Red, though it was the paleſt Fair in the World; ſhe thought her Colour too high, though it was well compoſed; her Eyes ſhe thought too ſharp, though they were rather languiſhing; her Lips pale, though Vermilion; and her Body ill-favoured, though it was very handſome: So that aſcribing doubtleſs as much unto her own Beauty, as ſhe detracted from her Rival, ſhe fancied her a thouſand times leſs fair than ſhe was, and believed her ſelf to be fairer than ever ſhe did; at leaſt, ſhe told me, that ſhe thought ſo. But the thing moſt obſervable was, her Joys, in being perſwaded that Philidas had no excuſe for his Inconſtancy, and that he was a loſer by his Change: And truly, (ſaid ſhe one day unto me) I verily believe I ſhould have died with ſpite, if I had not found Timoxene much inferior to me in every thing: Methinks (added ſhe) that Spite hath ſo altered my Heart, that Philidas is not ſo handſom as he was when he loved me; and I wonder that I ſhould be then ſo mad as to think him amiable: But now Philidas ſeems unto me to be another Man, methinks his Mind not ſo noble, his Wit duller, his Action more forced, his very Accent as changed, and me-thinks he hath gotten ſuch a kind of clowniſhneſs at Salamine, as it is a ſhame unto all Iſlands: The Truth is, added ſhe, I thought my old Lover ſo little pleaſing that day, his Miſtreſs ſo far from lovely, and my ſelf ſo far above them both, that I went away from this Viſit leſs troubled than ever I imagined. But after all this (purſued ſhe) tho I had no deſire that Philidas ſhould ſtill love me, yet ſtill I was vexed ſtrangely that he ſhould love Timoxene. In the mean time, Madam, out of a reſentment of Honour, Anaxandride reſolved never to twit Philidas with it, but contented her ſelf only with ſhunning to meet him, and to treat him very coldly in what place ſoever ſhe found him: And indeed ſo ſhe did for a long time. But, Madam, ſince Timoxene had not changed her Homours in changing Places; ſhe was the ſame at Megares, which ſhe was wont to be at Salamine; and made there much more diſorder, for being there unknown, all the Men and Women were ſooner trapped, and the half of her Life being very Amiable, they kept her company as a Perſom whom they all eſteemed; and doubtleſs they ſaw her in the good Vain, but were ignorant of her Fault, that ſome days ſhe could not conceal any thing: So that it being uſual in thoſe who would contract Friendſhip with any new Comer, to acquaint them with all the News of the Town, to the end ſhe may not be any longer a Stranger; there were ſome Men and Women who did her that Office, but were ill requited as well as Philidas; for in one of thoſe days, when ſhe could not conceal any thing ſhe knew, ſhe ſet all the Town ſo together by the Ears, that never the like was heard of, nor ſo many Jars in ſo ſhort a time: The worſt was, ſince ſhe uſed often to hear all things, without right application, ſhe confounded them by her repetition of them.

Thus ſhe cauſed to be told to Philidas what another did ſay;and to that other what Philidas did ſay of him : So that Quarrel upon Quarrel did ariſe; but the ſtrangeſt thing was, Timoxenes did no more care for any of thoſe Quarrels ſhe had cauſed, than if ſhe had no hand in them at all; and ſhe knew ſo well how to make her own Peace, that ſhe did eaſily reconcile her ſelf to all; but the worſt was, ſhe could not ſo eaſily reconcile others. Philidas being excellently accompliſhed, and a Man of a clear Spirit and Wit; as amorous as he was, he ſaw that Timoxene had ſome ill Qualities amongſt her good ones; but being of an humour to ſurmount all Difficulties,it may well be ſaid, that the Prickles made him think the Roſes ſweeter, ſince the unequality of Timoxenes did for a long time augment his Paſſion.

But at laſt this inequality produced a very vexatious Effect, for now her inequality had got into the Thoughts of her Heart; and ſhe was not only ſometimes merry, and ſometimes ſad, but thoſe whom ſhe loved to day, were not ſure to be ſo to morrow : So that ſhe did not look upon Philidas neither as her Lover, nor her Friend, but looked upon another more favourable than upon him. So that after Philidas had tried all ways to get again into her Favour, he would ſee whether Jealouſy would work upon her : ſo that making a ſhew, as if he would renew with Anaxandride, he endeavoured for an occaſion of ſeeing her, and went unto her Houſe, with one that was a Cozen unto that fair One, who was much her Friend. But, Madam, the ſtrangeneſs of this Adventure was, that when Philidas returned to Anaxandride's Houſe, he was extreamly in Love, and extreamly jealous of Timoxene, and had no tenderneſs at all to the firſt : The reaſon why he would ſeem to love Anaxandride rather than any other, was, becauſe ſhe was moſt lovely. Moreover, he always found her ſo ſweet, that he thought he could quit her when he pleaſed, and nothing would happen of it but as formerly ; yet he found it otherwiſe, for ſince Anaxandride was noble as well as ſweet, ſhe reſented the Inconſtancy of Philidas ſo bitterly, that had it not been more in love to her ſelf than him, ſhe would have made it appear. But when he came to her again, and would have ſpoke in private with her, he was amazed when he found her upon other terms than he expected, for he believed that Anaxandride would have received him with all joy, at any time he pleaſed; yet ſhe ſpoke ſo very ſharply unto him this firſt viſit, that he plainly ſaw himſelf abſolutely loſt, and that it was a harder matter for him to regain the Heart of Anaxandride, than the Heart of Timoxene: So that as his Love was cooled by the facility of her being happy, ſo ſhe began from that day to rekindle it, by the difficulty he found in being ſo again: The truth is, Madam, though I cannot underſtand the reaſon of it; yet it is moſt certain, that the ſharpneſs of Anaxandride began to work that in the Heart of Philidas, which her too much ſweetneſs had taken away: Yet he did not paſs from one Extream to another in an inſtant; but in a very few days he left loving Timoxene, and began to love Anaxandride again with more hot Flames than ever he did: Then did he remember his happy Condition formerly, and thought himſelf ſo much too blame for being inſenſible of his Happineſs, that it made him much the more miſerable.

On the other ſide, Anaxandride, though ſhe did not now love Philidas, yet, in point of Glory, ſhe could not chuſe but be glad to ſee him fettered in her Chains again: and finding that Rigour was the way to raiſe his Paſſion, ſhe ſhewed it in ſo high a manner, as was enough to make Love die in any Heart but his. In the mean time, the worſe Anaxandride treated him, the more was he in love with her, and more repented of his Inconſtancy. Pray, Sir, (ſaid I one day unto him, ſeeing him melancholy) why did you leave loving Anaxandride without any cauſe? And why did you renew it without Reaſon? For truly, when you quitted her, ſhe was as lovely as ever; and when you repented, ſhe was no more Amiable than when you caſt her off; and therefore I have good reaſon to ask you why you did leave loving her, or elſe why you began to love her again? I left loving her, replied he, becauſe I was ſo accuſtomed to be happy, that I did believe I could not be more; and I began to adore her again, becauſe I was weary of being miſerable, and knew that I could not be happy without her. But, Sir, replied I, ſhe is the very ſame ſhe was when you loved another, and the ſame ſhe was when you forſook her: Ah, Meneſiphiles, (ſaid he unto me) I would it were true that Anaxandride were the ſame ſhe was when I forſook her! No, no, ſhe was then Sweet, but now Cruel; ſhe did then love me, but now hates me. I muſt tell you, Sir, (ſaid I then unto him, and laughed) this Difference doth not ſeem to me very fit to cauſe Love, but it had been more reaſonable to have continued loving her when ſhe was kind, and when ſhe loved you, than to begin loving her again when ſhe is cruel, and hates you. I muſt ſadly confeſs all this, (ſaid he unto me) but alas, ſince I am not Maſter of my own Heart, what would you have me do? Yet I find it ſome ſweetneſs to think, that Anaxandride would not have hated me, but becauſe I did not love her, and muſt hope, that as ſhe paſſed from Love to Hatred, ſo ſhe may paſs from Hatred to Love again. Had you fallen in Love with any other, replied I, and that after you had loved Anaxandride and Timoxene, you had loved an hundred, I ſhould not have wondered ſo much as that you ſhould love Anaxandride again. I know, ſaid I, that one may fall out with a Miſtreſs, and renew again. I know that believing her perfidious, one may hate her; and afterwards finding her to be innocent, may begin to love anew; but I muſt confeſs, I cannot conceive, that having left Anaxandride without any Cauſe, it can be poſſible you ſhould ever love her again. Yet truly ſo it is, (replied he) that never any Man loved any Woman more than I do her, and I do now hate my ſelf as much as I do love her: When I conſider upon the happineſs I have fooliſhly loſt, and upon the uncertainty of ever regaining it again, I think my ſelf the moſt miſerable Lover that ever breathed; other Lovers do only deſire ſuch Favours as they never taſted, and therefore know not the ſweetneſs of them: But the caſe is much more miſerable with me, ſince I do deſire a happineſs which I have enjoyed, the greatneſs whereof I know. But, Sir, (ſaid I unto him) you found ſuch ſmall happineſs in the enjoying of it, is, that I know not why you ſhould ſo earneſtly deſire the fruition again. I deſire it, replied he, becauſe now I know better the price of what I have loſt, than I did when I enjoyed it.

To tell you, Madam, that Philidas loved Anaxandride twice, is not enough to prove that one may love one and the ſame Perſon twice, unleſs I tell you alſo, that Anaxandride did love Philidas twice alſo. But certain it is, that this revived Lover did ſtrive ſo violently to reconquer the Heart he loſt, that at laſt Anaxandride ceaſing to hate him, did begin again to love him; and at this very hour does love with ſo much tenderneſs, that they are to be married within a few days.

Thus, Madam, I have furniſhed you with an Example, that one may love the ſame Perſon twice; and certainly there is more probability, that one ſhould begin again to love her whom formerly he found amiable, than to love a freſh Miſtreſs. Though there be much delight to be taken in hearing you ſpeak, (ſaid the Princeſs of Corinth unto me) yet I muſt needs interrupt you; for I do conceive it fit, before you give your Reaſons, that Cherſias relate us an Example oppoſite to yours, to the end that arguing afterwards upon both, the Queſtion may be better cleared, and the Diſpute more pleaſing. Since what the Princeſs of Corinth ſaid was very reaſonable, Eumetis, and all the Company approving of it, ſilence was impoſed upon me; and Cherſias related his promiſed Adventure: So that after all the Company had renewed their Attention, Cherſias began in theſe terms.

The Hiſtory of Aglatonice, and of Iphicrates.

Madam,

BEfore I begin the Adventure which I am to relate, I conceive it not impertinent to our Purpoſe, that I acquaint you with the manner of living in our Court, leſt you not imagining the Town of Prienes to be ſuch a one as it is, you ſhould ſuſpect the truth, when you ſee me introduce ſo many gallant Perſons in my Relation: Therefore, Madam, be pleaſed to know, that the wiſe Bias, who governs our State as chief Head, hath made it ſo famous, as little as it is, that it is conſiderable unto all our Neighbour States; and I dare boldly ſay, that of ſo many famous Greek Colonies, which paſſed into Aſia, and there rendred themſelves Potent, there is not one which hath in ſuch purity preſerved the politeneſs of its Original, as ours. Moreover, the wiſe Bias having no Children, he hath looked upon a Nephew of his as his Succeſſor. This illuſtrious Nephew, whoſe Name is Iphicrates, being a moſt admirably accompliſhed Man, he hath rendred our Court full with Men of excellent Parts; for as the Unkle did attract many knowing Men, ſo the Nephew, by the example of his Valour, hath drawn brave Men thither, and by his Generoſity many Generous Men.

As for our Ladies, I can aſſure you confidently, that few Aſiatique Towns have more fairs Ones, or more Amiable; but that which makes the Court compleatly gallant is, Bias hath a Nice, who as rarely accompliſhed as Iphicrates, is yet not more than ſhe, though ſhe be not his Siſter, for ſhe is Daughter unto a Siſter of Bias, and he a Son unto his Brother; it is at her Houſe where all the Men of Quality rendezvous, both all the Ladies, and all the Wits and Gallants. Moreover, Madam, I can aſſure you, that the Court of Policrates is not more gallant than Ours, and one cannot find more Diverſions at Milete or Lesbos, than at Priene. Give me leave to tell you further, Madam, that Iphicrates is not only rarely accompliſhed in reſpect of his Valour and Spirit, but alſo becauſe he is the moſt ſincere Man alive. Moreover, his Perſon doth extreamly pleaſe, for he is of an handſom Stature, a good Behaviour, and his greateſt Enemies cannot charge him with any Fault: 'Tis true, that his Sincerity cauſes him ſometimes to ſpeak things a little drily; but for all that, he is eſteemed by all the World, and loved by all thoſe who know him, except of that Perſon, whom of all the World he moſt deſired to be.

After this, Madam, it is requiſite I tell you, who this fair and unjuſt Perſon is of whom I ſpeak; be pleaſed to know therefore, Madam, that Iphicrates after many ny Years abſence, returned unto Priene one Evening, when there was a Ball kept at the Princeſs of Lanthes Houſe, Niece unto Bias; and as one of his Age never uſes to ſlip ſuch an Occaſion, he made himſelf ready in all haſte to go unto this Meeting; which doubtleſs was worthy of his Curioſity; for I never ſaw all our Ladies more fair than they were that Night, ſince there was not one ill dreſſed; and indeed one amongſt them, who was moſt knowing in ſuch things, confeſſed, that they never had a more glorious Meeting than this, for it had not the preſſing croud of great Feaſts; nor was it one of thoſe petty Aſſemblies, where the Men have no choice of Ladies to dance withal. Moreover, the Hall was as light as Day, and the Muſique was in an excellent Humour.

Iphicrates then being entred into the place where they danced, with all the gladneſs of a Man who found ſuch diverſions, the firſt hour of his arrival: he went to the end of the Hall, where he ſaw three or four of his ancient Friends, talking with ſome Ladies who danced not at that time: So that being extreamly glad to ſee them, a thouſand civil Complements paſſed amongſt them: The Princeſs of Landes, for her particular ſeemed to be much joyed at his return, and all the Gallants who were dancing, made ſigns, either with Hand or Head, that they longed for the end of the Dance, purpoſely to tell him that they were glad of his Return. But after the firſt Civilities were over, Iphicrates had the liberty to view all the Beauties of the Ball, and found one amongſt the reſt very lovely, whom he could not remember he had ever ſeen at any meeting before he went from Priene; and the truth was, he was in the right, for ſhe was then ſo young when he went away, that ſhe never went to any Balls, and ſo chanced that he never ſaw her in her infancy; So that wondering to ſee her, he asked me, who ſhe was, I being one of thoſe who was next her? and certainly it was no wonder that this Lady, whoſe Name was Aglatonice, ſhould raiſe his Curioſity, ſhe being one of the moſt charming Beauties in the World: her Compoſure was ſo noble and handſom, her Air ſo gallant and free, that though ſhe was a brown Beauty, yet ſhe dimmed the Luſters of all the fair Beauties in Priene. Doubtleſs there were thoſe who had many Features, and as good as hers, and perhaps better; but there was not one who could be truly ſaid a more perfect Beauty, ſince none did comparably pleaſe ſo much as ſhe.

Aglatonice being as I tell you, Iphicrates asked me (as I told you before) who ſhe was? and whether I ever ſaw her at her own Houſe? I ſuppoſe (ſaid I unto him, after I had told her Name) that you would never ask this laſt Queſtion, but becauſe you intend to be acquainted with her; but let me tell you, Iphicrates, (added I) Aglatonice, is a moſt dangerous Perſon to be ſeen. I know very well, replied he, that ſuch a Beauty as ſhe cannot be ſeen without ſome danger. Though that be true, as you mean it is, replied I, yet that is not my meaning: What do you mean? replied he. I mean, ſaid I, that this Lady, who is ſo infinitely lovely, and born to be loved, is one of the leaſt loving Creatures that is in the whole Univerſe, as thoſe ſay who think they know her beſt; but for my part, I am perſwaded they do not very well know her, and that there are ſeveral ways to penetrate her Heart which they never found out. I pray, ſaid he unto me, do me the favour to give me the Character of this Lady. Should I give it without flattery (ſaid I, and ſmiled) you would never fall in Love with her, though I ſhould with all give her a thouſand Commendations. I pray do then (ſaid he, and ſmiled as well as I) for I am much miſtaken in my ſelf, if I have not already ſome light Inclination in my Heart to love her. I ſhall then tell you (ſaid I unto him) that though Aglatonice be a Lady of an infinite Wit and Spirit, yet, of all that come unto her, ſhe makes no diſtinction between Men of mean Parts, and Men of higheſt Accompliſhments, nor between them and ſuch as are of no Quality at all: ſo that I aſſure you, Aglatonice, as virtuous as ſhe is, yet never put back any Adorer. And yet the World cannot ſay ſhe is light; but ſhe has found out an Art of having a thouſand Lovers, and never denies any without being further taxed than to be a Lover of Pleaſures and Gallantry in general, and cannot to this hour be accuſed of loving any Gallant in particular: Alſo there is always ſo great a croud of Servants about her, as I cannot tell how to mention them; ſhe will allow all to look upon her, and to ſigh, nor will ſhe forbid any to love her; ſo that ſhe has always an infinite number of Rivals about her, who becauſe one is not favoured more than another, they live lovingly together without any quarrels, and almoſt without any hatred; and as long as the Eyes of Aglatonice does not put any difference between them, they do not envy one another. Since then I muſt be miſerable, if Aglatonice repulſe (replied Iphicrates, and laughed) you make me very glad, for it is ſome ſatisfaction to be ſure not to be treated ill at the firſt. 'Tis true, replied I, but it is a ſad Story, that after ten Years courtſhip, you cannot hope for any more favour from her, than you had the firſt day; and to be upon no better terms with her, than an hundred others, who have neither Merit nor Handſomeneſs in them. But is it poſſible (ſaid he) that ſuch an one as ſhe ſhould ſuffer her ſelf to be loved by ſuch as are altogether without Merit? I proteſt upon you, Sir, (ſaid I unto him) I know ſome who love her that have no Merit at all: and I do proteſt further, that ſhe has Lovers of all ſorts, even from the Philoſopher, to the Fool; and from the valiant Man even to the very Varlet. Though only out of curioſity, replied Iphicrates, yet I pray carry me unto her to morrow: unleſs by great chance (ſaid I unto him) this Curioſity will coſt you very dear; for though I have told you enough to keep you from loving her, yet I am confident, that unleſs you do love ſome other, you will love her; for ſhe will pleaſe you above any other, and more than any but her ſelf can. So that ſince you are of a temper quite oppoſite to hers, you will be, if I be not much miſtaken, the moſt miſerable Man alive, if you ſhould fall in love with her. You ſet her forth in ſuch a rigorous Character, replied he, that I cannot ſee any ſuch cauſes of fear. How, Sir, ſaid I unto him, do you not think it the moſt cruel thing in the World to love one who will confound you with a thouſand others? and from whom you can expect no more than what you find the firſt day, for ſhe will hearken unto all; but ſhe will anſwer none ſo kindly as to render them happy, nor ſo ſharply as to make them deſpair. However, ſaid he, ſee her I muſt, and you will do me a Favour if you will carry me unto her to morrow.

This, Sir, was the firſt Diſcourſe I had with Iphicrates concerning Aglatonice, unto whom he could not ſpeak that Night though he would; for he had no ſooner done dancing, but ten or twelve were at her Feet; and they no ſooner came off, but as many more took their Places. But, Madam, not to ſpend time in Trivials, I carried Iphicrates the next day unto Aglatonice, who received him with that gallant and univerſal Civility which ſhe ſhewed unto all her Viſitants: So that ſince ſhe had the beſt Grace in the World in every thing ſhe did, and ſince it was impoſſible but ſhe muſt pleaſe, he was charmed with the ſight of her, and he parted from her more in Love, than all they he left behind him: yet he did not then tell me as much, but I plainly perceived it; and fearing he ſhould be too far engaged, I uſed all my Arguments to diſſwade him, though I could ſay no worſe of Aglatonice than what I had before; for the truth is, ſhe is one of the moſt rarely accompliſhed Women in the World: yet, Madam, it was in vain for me to attempt hindring him from loving Aglatonice; for I underſtood ſince, that this Love had its cauſe from the Stars, againſt which all Reaſons were too weak. And indeed, had it not been ſo, Iphicrates had not loved Aglatonice ſo long; but would have left off as ſoon as he ſaw the horrible injuſtice ſhe did him; and that you may know it, it is requiſite I acquaint you with ſomething that preceded it. Be pleaſed to know then, that Iphicrates, after his firſt Viſit, went afterwards by himſelf to Aglatonice; and went ſo often, that at laſt he could go no where elſe: Yet it is not eaſy to underſtand why he ſhould; for this Lady, who never in all her Life refuſed any Adoration, or any Adorer, did not accept of that declaration of Love which Iphicrates made her; but on the contrary, he found ſo much ſcorn in her Eyes, and ſuch neutrality and faint indifference in her Anſwers, as ſurely had choaked his Paſſion, had he not been in that condition he was. But his Heart being already too far engaged to retreat upon the firſt Repulſe, in lieu of cooling his Love, became more hot; and as till then, he loved her only by Inclination, now he loved her with Reſolution, and determined to oppoſe all that oppoſed his Happineſs. At the firſt, he found ſome advantage in being worſe treated than a thouſand others; and he thought the reaſon was, becauſe he was more feared than any other: The truth was, he flattered himſelf as one that would continue loving her, and indeed as one who could not chuſe; yet ſometimes her harſhneſs to him did almoſt drive him into deſpair: And one day, being alone with her, becauſe he would needs be the laſt Man, he began to chide her, and complain of her Rigour towards him: for, truly Madam, (ſaid he unto her, after many other things) I muſt needs wonder how you can be ſo inhumane as to forbid me loving you, ſince you admit of ſo many Rivals as your Beauty hath made me. If amongſt this great number, you had made choice of one which was really worthy of your Choice, and had baniſhed all the reſt, doubtleſs I ſhould have much grieved that it was not my fate to be choſen; but yet I ſhould have made a retreat among the Multitude: and if I had complained, it ſhould have been in ſecret, and it ſhould have been more at my want of Merit, than at you. But, Madam, the caſe is otherwiſe, you have made choice of none, but admit of a thouſand; and amongſt this thouſand, you make choice of me, to treat me the worſt of them all; yet I do not ſee they are more ſubmiſſive nor reſpective than my ſelf. I beſeech you, Madam, do one of theſe two things; either forbid them to love you, as you have done me, or let me love you as they do. Yet this Propoſition was not accepted, though juſt, for Aglatonice, maugre all his Complaints, did ſuffer all to love her but him, and him ſhe did forbid: So that his own Heart not being able to hold all his Sorrows, he made choice of me for the Confident of his Paſſion. At firſt, I would not pitty him, but upbraided him for neglecting my advice; but at laſt, he moved me to ſo much compaſſion, as I became a Sharer in his Sorrows.

Is not my Story ſad (ſaid he unto me) and wonderful, that ſhe ſhould treat me the very worſt of all my Rivals, and yet I know no Remedy? Had I but one Rival or two, I could find out ways to be rid of them. But now, unleſs I will fight above a hundred Combats, and aſſemble ſo many Friends as Aglatonice has Lovers, I cannot ſee it poſſible to be rid of all my Rivals; and though I had rid my ſelf of them all, I believe that it would not have any more ingratiated me? Since its credible it would have vexed her to the Heart to loſe her croud of Adorers, and it would have troubled her more to have ſeen me alone with her, than when I was in the company of ſo many Men whom I loved not: But, Sir, ſaid I unto him, ſince you cannot overcome your Rivals, let me adviſe you to overcome your ſelf: Ah Cherſias (ſaid he unto me) I did not follow your counſel; but to tell you truly, I did ſtrive, but it was in vain; and Aglatonice for all her indulgence to others, and cruelty to me, has ſo great a power in my Heart, that I am out of all hopes to leave loving her: After this, Iphicrates paſſing from one Thought unto another: Yet this is ſome comfort (added he) that Aglatonice makes no choice of any whom ſhe ſuffers to be about her; for if ſhe ſhould do that unto one which ſhe does unto all, I ſhould think my ſelf a thouſand times more miſerable than I am; for then I ſhould believe ſhe did really love him with whom ſhe ſhould live in a particular and obliging manner, but ſince ſhe hearkens unto all, it is evident ſhe loves the Gallantry more than the Gallant, ſo that I am half ſatisfied. If ſhe did only love Gallantry in general, replied I, why does ſhe not admit of yours as well as of the reſt? Fie cruel Friend, ſaid he, why would you blaſt that little conſolation which I had in deluding my ſelf? Becauſe (ſaid I to him) I will not flatter up a diſeaſe which I deſire to cure. No, no, (ſaid he to me) never ver think of finding ways to make me leave loving Aglatonice, for I do profeſs and declare I cannot hate her, nor ever will. Then love her, ſaid I; But let me tell you, that to love, and not be loved, or without hopes of being ſo, is a thing which I will never adviſe you unto. This, Madam, was the mind of Iphicrates when his Miſery augmented, which I think I told you was like to drive him into extream diſpair. Be pleaſed to know, that as Aglatonice did almoſt every day make a new Conqueſt, ſo there was a Man of Rank, who yet was never in Love; but becauſe it was the mode to love Aglatonice, he would be in faſhion, and tell her he loved her, and encreaſe the number of ſuch as offered incenſe unto her: But, Madam, be pleaſed to know alſo, that this freſh Lover of Aglatonice, whoſe name was Chriſippus, was the very pooreſt parted Fellow of all her Lovers, his Wit had neither height, nor depth, nor conceipt, nor quickneſs, nor pleaſingneſs in it; it might truly be called a trifling Wit, which ſported it ſelf in ſuch pittiful poor things, and was ſo far from any Gallantry, that unleſs to very ill Taſts, it was intolerable to all accompliſhed Men. However, Chriſippus being as I have deſcribed, and Iphicrates alſo, yet there was a huge difference in their Deſtinies, as there was in their Deſerts: For Aglatonice as full of Excellencies as ſhe was, yet was moſt extreamly unjuſt, not only in denying her Affection unto Iphicrates, but alſo in accepting of Chriſippus much more favourably than any other. Thus out of an unparallell'd fantaſtical Fate, the moſt rarely accompliſhed Man of all her Lovers was only ſcorned, and the pittifulleſt poor parted Fellow of them all, was really preferred before all the reſt. The Injuſtice of Aglatonice was not at firſt perceived, for it was ſuch an unlikely thing that Chriſippus ſhould ever be preferred, that none could ſuſpect her of ſuch extream weakneſs. But as an ill-treated Lover uſeth to obſerve his Miſtreſs neerer than any other, ſo Iphicrates quickly ſaw that Chriſippus was not only permitted as others were, but preferred before them: For ſince Aglatonice had as great an inclination to him, as ſhe had an averſion unto Iphicrates, ſhe expreſſed more Symptoms tomes of her Affection to him ſhe really loved, than to him ſhe did only ſuffer: So that the unfortunate Iphicrates was grieved beyond all Expreſſion.

Then began he to do all he was able not to love her, but as there was ſome predominate Power which forced him to love her, and likewiſe the like power which forced Aglatonice to hate him, he was conſtrained to love her whether he would or no. In the mean time, ſince he ſaw this new Slave every day more like to raign Soveraignly in the Heart of Aglatonice, and that reports of it began already to fly abroad, he reſolved to talk with her, and once in his Life to tell her his Mind plainly, ſo that he watched an opportunity of Privacy, yet it was a long time before he could find it: For Chriſippus, who naturally made a buſineſs of every trifle, was perpetually about her; but at laſt Iphicrates having communicated his Deſign unto me, I promiſed to rid him from the Perſecution of Chriſippus for to morrow; and in order to that, I did engage him to be at a hunting Meeting, which kept him until it was very night: So that Iphicrates, who went betimes unto Aglatonice, had all the conveniency of talk with her he could wiſh.

When he firſt entred into her Chamber, ſhe was reading, but not daring to read on, ſhe laid the Book upon the Table negligently, but did not ſhut it, as if ſhe intended to read preſently again; and ſhe laid it down in ſuch a manner, as Iphicrates perceived that ſhe was diſpleaſed at his interrupting her, ſo that it confirmed him in his Reſolution of complaining againſt her: Yet ſince he would not begin his diſcourſe with Complaints, he ſaluted her very reſpectively: What Book ſoever that is you laid by, Madam, (ſaid he unto her) I am ſure my company does not pleaſe you ſo much as the reading of it did. Truly, Sir, ſaid ſhe, I was not weary with reading it, for it is not with a bad Book, as it is with a weariſome Friend, ſince one may when they will lay the Book aſide, but not ſo eaſily be rid of troubleſome Company: Since I am perſwaded that you have more Lovers than Friends (replied I and laughed) I think, Madam, you were never put to the tryal of that trouble:

Though I do agree to what you ſay, replied ſhe, yet this does not conclude but I may be troubled, ſince there are troubleſome Lovers, as well as troubleſome Friends. I know, Madam, replied he, how neerly I am concerned in what you ſay; but I know withal, that there is a Lover ſometimes with you, who ſhould not be thought troubleſome, and another alſo who ſhould, at leaſt is ſo to all that know him, except your ſelf. Iphicrates had no ſooner ſaid ſo, but Aglatonice bluſhed for Anger and Shame, for it was impoſſible, maugre her Averſion to Iphicrates, and Inclination to Chriſippus, but ſhe muſt needs know there was a vaſt difference between thoſe two Men. So that Iphicrates perceiving he had netled her, he grew more bold, though he was reſolved not to tranſgreſs the limits of Civility and Reſpect; ſo that not giving her ſo much time as to anſwer: I beſeech you, Madam, ſaid he unto her, pardon the exceſs of my Sincerity and Plainneſs, and as you know it is a Vertue which I neither can nor will leave off, ſo I beſeech you let me now tell you my Mind fully. So none hath any right to take more liberty than they ſhould give unto another (replied Aglatonice coldly) I ſuppoſe you will alſo let my Tongue take the like liberty of telling my mind if the fancy take me. You may well think, Madam, replied he, that a Man unto whom you deny every thing, cannot think he hath any right to impoſe any Laws upon you: Therefore, Madam, when I have uttered my Mind, you may freely tell me what you pleaſe, declaring unto you beforehand, that the worſt you can tell me ſhall not ſurprize me.

But not to loſe ſuch precious time, the thing I have to tell you is, that as violent as my Paſſion is unto you, I have taught it how to ſuit it ſelf unto my bad Fortune, and to ſubſiſt without any hope: Yes, Madam, purſued he, I can continue loving you, without any hopes of ever being loved again; and the exceſs of my Affection is able to do that, which no other Lover but my ſelf ever could: You know, Madam, there was a time when I deſired you to hearken unto me, as you did unto a hundred others, or elſe not to hearken unto thoſe others more than you did unto me: But now, being grown more reaſonable, and knowing it was not juſt to impoſe harſh Laws upon her from whom I was to receive them, I am contented, Madam, you ſhould hearken unto all thoſe whom before I deſired you would not hearken; and I am contented alſo you ſhould not hearken unto me: and to carry my Moderation a little higher, I do declare unto you, that all the Services which I have done you, and all thoſe I ſhall do, and all thoſe I have a deſire to do; all I ſay, will never as long as I live deſire any other Recompence, but only this, That you will never hearken unto Chriſippus; I conjure you unto it with all imaginable Reſpect, and all poſſible Affection; for truly, Madam, he does not merit your Ear: I leave you all the reſt of my Rivals, ſo you will but treat him ill; and I do proteſt, Madam, it concerns your Honour as much as it doth my Tranquillity, to do as I deſire. You think then (replied ſhe) that Chriſippus is much in my favour. Doubtleſs I do, replied he, and much better than he deſerves, ſince he is not ill-treated: of this truth I am confidently perſwaded. You have ſo little to do in any thing that concerns me, anſwered ſhe, that I adviſe you to ſave your labour of preſcribing Laws to me, for I conceive my ſelf to have right to hearken unto whom I pleaſe, and to impoſe ſilence upon whom I pleaſe, without any thing to any one; I am ſatisfied my ſelf, and I care not a ſtraw whether you be or no. But, Madam, ſaid he then unto her, is it poſſible you ſhould not be ſenſible of your Injuſtice, in hearkening unto Chriſippus more than unto me? What does it concern you, replied ſhe, whether I hearken unto him, or any elſe, ſince I am fully reſolved never to hearken unto you? And to ſpeak truly, the difference between thoſe you would have me hearken unto, and thoſe you would have me not hearken unto, is only in this, I can hear them without loving them, and I am ſo good as to ſave you the labour of telling me a hundred things to no purpoſe. Alas, Madam, cryed he out, all this might well have been ſaid unto one who did not love you, but to me, who adores you with infinite Devotion, and who can think of nothing but you, it is impoſſible you ſhould deceive me; for though you ſhould diſſemble your Thoughts, yet I could diſcover the Happineſs of Chriſippus in all your Actions; and to tell you truly, Madam, without Flattery, he has not comparably ſo much Wit as you have; therefore I beſeech you for your own Honour's ſake, make not choice of him, for I profeſs I cannot endure you ſhould endure him. Though I did not love Chriſippus more than any other, replied ſhe, yet I aſſure you, that you have done him a very good Office, in telling me that you hate him; for though it be only to ſpite you, I will treat him more civilly than ever I did: for the truth is, Iphicrates, I do intend to be free, and you ſhall have nothing to do with the carriage of my ſelf: I have as much right to make choice of my Acquaintance, as I have of the Colours I am to wear; and it concerns you as little whether I ſee Chriſippus, or ſee him not, as it doth whether I wear Carnation or Green. Since Carnation doth better become you, Madam, than Green (replied he, and ſmiled) the choice of what Colours you wear is not ſo indifferent to me as you imagine; for ſince I do intereſt my ſelf in the Glory of your Beauty as well as of your Wit, I ſhould be gladder to ſee you wear what doth become you, than what not: So, Madam, it does concern me whether you ſee Chriſippus, or ſee him not, ſince though I had no intereſt directly of my own, yet ſince I am extreamly concerned in your Honour, I ſhould be ſorry you ſhould blemiſh it in ſuffering ſuch a Lover. I pray, Iphicrates, ſaid ſhe unto him, put not my Patience to the utmoſt Teſt, for I am ſo fully reſolved that all your Sayings cannot perſwade me; and the truth is, if it be your Deſtiny never to be loved, you cannot alter your Fate; and if the Fate of Chriſippus be not to be hated, he ſhall not, ſay you what you can; therefore ſet your Mind at reſt concerning that matter: and to do you all the juſtice I am able, I will ingenuouſly confeſs, that I know there are ſome thoughts of you in my Heart, which are not altogether juſt, but ſince I am not juſt in it unto my ſelf as well as you, you have no cauſe to complain. How, Madam, ſaid he unto her, would you not have me complain of your preferring Chriſippus before me? Alas, Madam, that is not in my power, and not to lie unto you; my Mind is ſo incenſed at it, that I ſhould rejoyce with all my Heart, if you ſhould love any other of all my Rivals, and not him. Since it will do you no good to ſpeak ſeriouſly, (replied ſhe with half a ſmile) I ſhall confeſs more than you would have me; for I do aſſure you, There is not one of all thoſe whom you call your Rivals, which I do not love a thouſand times better than I do you; no, not excepting Chriſippus. Had you excepted him, replied he, I ſhould have lamented my Misfortune in ſecret; but ſince you do not, my Complaints ſhall cry aloud, ſo loud, that perhaps you will be forced to confeſs, that you did me wrong, in driving me to Deſpair.

As Aglatonice was going to anſwer, one of her deareſt Friends entred, who did her the greateſt courteſie that could be to break off this Conference; and ſhe no ſooner ſaw ſher, but ſhe went to meet her with extraordinary civility. Iphicrates being then in no humour to talk of things indifferent, retired, and with ſo many marks of vexation in his face, that the Lady who entred, whoſe name was Parthenopea, perceived it, and aske d Aglatonice the reaſon of his going out? For Heaven ſake (anſwered ſhe) preſs me not to tell you why I jarred with Iphicrates, for I cannot think upon it without anger. I do not uſe to ſcrew out the ſecrets of my friends (replied Parthenopea): But to teſtifie, that I am more really yours, than any elſe, and conſequently may challenge a more particular priviledg than any other of your Friends, I muſt give you ſome Advice, which perchance will diſpleaſe, and tell you, that there are ſome Reports flie abroad, which are diſadvantagious to you; yet, it is a thing only whiſpered, and not ſpoken as an abſolute Affirmative: But for all that, I would it were not ſpoken of at all, and I did even this day affirm confidently unto thoſe who told it unto me, That they were miſtaken, and that, what they told me, was abſolutely falſe; yet I muſt confeſs, I am a little afraid it was too true. Since I have not the Art of Divination (replied Aglatonice, and changed colour,) I know not what you mean, nor do well know whether I ſhould deſire to know it: But ſince I am armed againſt any thing the World can ſay, I beſeech you tell me what it ſays of me? Since you give me leave (replied Parthenopea,) I ſhall tell you, That ſuch reports go as you ought to diſavow; for it's ſaid, That out of the great number of Lovers which your Beauty hath made, you have made choice of two, to be the Objects of two different Paſſions; That you hate Iphicrates, who is the beſt accompliſhed Man of all your Lovers; and that you love Chriſippus, who is the worſt. Judge Aglatonice, whether I have not reaſon to ſay, That you ought to diſavow this for truth. Doubtleſs, replied ſhe, I ſhall not acknowledg, that I love Chriſippus, but I ſhall eaſily confeſs, that I do not love Iphicrates. Since you are ſo unjuſt (replied Parthenopea, and looked earneſtly upon her) as not to love the beſt accompliſhed of all your Lovers; I ſhall extreamly fear, that you do love him that is the leaſt worthy: For truely, whoſoever does Injuſtice unto true Merit, may as well be favourable unto him that hath more. You ſpeak ſo home, replied Aglatonice, that though you were the intimate friend of Iphicrates, you could not ſay more in his behalf. I am no intimate friend unto Iphicrates, (replied Parthenopea) but I am unto you, and under that notion, I conjure you to open your Heart unto me, that I may know whether I ſhould Juſtifie, or Accuſe you; but ſince we may chance to be interrupted here, if you pleaſe, we will go and walk in ſome ſolitary Garden.

So that Aglatonice taking her at her Word, they went both in Parthenopea's Coach to walk in a Garden which is by the Sea ſide: But though Aglatonice was naturally of a merry humour, yet now ſhe was very reſerved, and walked the length of that long Walk in the Garden without ſpeaking one word, and when ſhe came to the end of it, they ſate down upon Seats of Graſs; after which, Parthenopea ſpeaking firſt; Had we come hither only to look upon the Sea (ſaid ſhe unto her) and to hear the pleaſant murmur it makes againſt the Rocks, you are rightly fitted; for, you look and hear ſo attentively, that I believe you think upon nothing elſe. I aſſure you (replied Aglatonice) I think it better to hearken unto the noiſe of the Sea, than unto you. I think not ſo, (replied Parthenopea) for I had much rather you would hear me, than the Sea; therefore, I pray tell me truly, what are your thoughts, both of Iphicrates, and of Chriſippus? And to begin with the firſt of theſe, Tell me your reaſon if you can, why you hate him; or at leaſt, why you do not love him? Truly, anſwered Aglatonice, I cannot tell my ſelf. for I am forced to confeſs, That he hath a thouſand good qualities, and no bad ones; but for all that, as there is ſomething in it which makes me that I cannot love him; ſo alſo there is ſomething, though I know not what, which makes me hate him. Though I ſhould conſent to what you ſay, (anſwered Parthenopea) yet I cannot conſent, that there is any reaſon for your ſomething, and I know not what you mean, unto which you aſcribe ſuch power to regulate your Hatred or your Love: For my part, if Reaſon told me, that Iphicrates had a thouſand good qualities, and Chriſippus a thouſand bad ones, I ſhould ſooner believe it that all your ſomethings, and your I know not whats, which are of ſuch ſubtil natures, that none knows where to find them, or how to define them. You ſpeak ſo pleaſantly of theſe, I know not whats, replied Aglatonice, that it is to be believed, none was ever troubled with them but you, ſince you know not the power of them.

To ſhew you, that I am not ignorant (replied Parthenopea) I acknowledg, that there is, and I know not what kind of air in your Perſon, and I know not what kind of excellencie in your Spirits which doth pleaſe, and charm me; but for all that, I know very well, that you are in the wrong, and if I were in the place of Iphicrates, I am ſure, that this I know not what you ſpeak of, would make me leave loving you. But ſince he cannot hate me, replied ſhe, Can he think much that I cannot force my Affection to him? There is as much reaſon for the one, as for the other; and as one may love by Reaſon, ſo one may hate by Prudence. For my part, (replied Parthenopea,) I am perſwaded, one may and ought, but when Reaſon is not ſtrong enough to rule all the thoughts of your Heart, yet however it ought to be powerful enough to regulate all your Actions: And ſo, ſince all the World condemns your Rigour unto Iphicrates, doubtleſs you ought to force, and change your way of behaviour towards him. Then, replied ſhe, I muſt change my Heart, and my Mind, or elſe change Iphicrates; otherwiſe I aſſure you, I ſhall behave my ſelf towards him, as heretofore I have done. As for Ipihcrates, replied Parthenopea, what would you have changed in him? which of his Qualities would you have him leave? I aſſure you, replied Aglatonice, I ſhould be much puzled to tell you; for when I do well examine Iphicrates, and find him handſom, that he is a Man of Courage and Wit, that he ſpeaks elegantly, that he is ſincere and generous: I find alſo, that every one of theſe Qualities in particular doth pleaſe me; but I do find alſo, that being put all together, they do not pleaſe me; and that though Iphicrates be an excellently accompliſhed Man, yet, is not ſo as he ought to be, to make me love him. But, (replied Parthenopea) as you have ingenuouſly told me what you think of Iphicrates, ſo tell me, I beſeech you, what you think of Chriſippus? but by all means, tell me ſincerely. Since perhaps you would think more than is true, if I ſhould make a Myſterie of it, (replied Aglatonice) I will confeſs unto you, That as I do not well know what it is which cauſeth my averſion unto Iphicrates, ſo I know much leſs, the cauſe of my inclination not to hate Chriſippus. And to ſhew you, that I am not blind, (added ſhe, and bluſh'd) I know very well, That when I examine all that is good in Chriſippus, I cannot find one ſingle excellent Quality; but find, that there is many things in him which I wiſh were not: But for all that, when I look upon him without examination, I muſt confeſs, that he doth not diſpleaſe me ſo much, as many others, who are much more eſteemed in the World than he is. I do profeſs, Aglatonice (replied Parthenopea) this is intolerable; for, if you were not altogether prejudicated, and if you did not know the Good that is in Iphicrates, and the Ill that is in Chriſippus, I ſhould then pity you, in lieu of accuſing you: But to ſee that you ſhould ſlight that, which by your own confeſſion, you know to be worthy of eſteem; and to ſee you love that, which you know is not amiable; this is a thing ſo ſtrange, that I do hate you ſhould be capable of it. Yet endure it you muſt, replied ſhe, for I do proteſt I can do no otherwiſe. Then you do the greateſt piece of Injuſtice that ever was done, replied ſhe. Since I do what pleaſeth my ſelf, replied Aglatonice, I will never trouble my ſelf any further. But then, anſwered Parthenopea, I muſt not any more deny that which I did ſo earneſtly deny before; and you muſt dictate unto me, how you would have me Anſwer thoſe who accuſe you for hating of Iphicrates, and loving Chriſippus. As for Chriſippus, replied Aglatonice ſharply, I will not acknowledg that I love him, for you know I do not uſe to avow any ſuch things; all I would have you do for me is, to keep me from being blamed for my averſion unto Iphicrates. To avoid that blame, replied Parthenopea, you muſt treat Chriſippus leſs favourable than you do, and muſt not hearken any more unto that croud of Lovers which preſs about you, for then the World will ſay, you have changed your humour, and have baniſhed all Gallants in general, becauſe you affect not Gallantry. But, that you ſhould ſuffer a hundred to love you, and out of this hundred, you ſhould chuſe the leaſt deſerving Man, and not endure Iphicrates the moſt Meritorious; this is the moſt unreaſonable thing that ever any did. However it be, anſwered Aglatonice, I ſhall not follow your Counſel, for I do love the World, and hate Solitude; and ſince thoſe who throng about me, do only make a noiſe, it is a diverſion to me, and to tell you truly, I delight not in Silence, unleſs in a Foreſt; and yet, I had rather hear the croaking of Crows, as harſh as the noiſe is, than hear nothing at all; and therefore I will continue ſeeing thoſe I uſe to do; and I aſſure you, I will not abſolutely thwart my ſelf; and I am fully perſwaded, that ever ſince there were any Men, there hath been continually ſome, who have loved, more out of Fancie than Reaſon; and therefore, though I did love Chriſippus more than I do, yet I were not ſo blameable as you make me. Alſo, ſince I will never do any thing for Chriſippus againſt what I owe unto my ſelf; ſurely it were unjuſt I ſhould go and trouble the Tranquillity of my Life, only for the ſatisfaction of Iphicrates; and therefore my dear Parthenopea, let not this piece of Injuſtice wherewith you upbraid me, make me loſe your Eſteem, or Friendſhip. As for my Friendſhip, replied ſhe, I ſhall leave it with you; but as for my Eſteem, I muſt confeſs, you have a leſs ſhare in it, than you had when I came to you: For truly, when I conſider, that you ſhould ſlight the moſt deſerving of your Lovers, and prefer the very worſt, I ſhall think you capable of being unjuſt in matters of Friendſhip, as well as in matters of Gallantry, and to prefer the worſt Woman in all the Court before me; ſince there can be no greater a difference between her, and me, than between Iphicrates and Chriſippus. That which doth moſt comfort me in your Anger, is, (replied Aglatonice, and ſmiled, though out of ſpite) becauſe I perceive, you do not think I love Chriſippus very well, for if you did think ſo, you would not ſpeak ſo ſcornfully of me. On the contrary, replied Parthenopea, I ſpeak as I do, becauſe I think you do love him; for if I did not think ſo, I ſhould not ſpeak at all. But I muſt needs confeſs, That ſeeing you ſo Amiable as you are, I cannot endure you ſhould love below your ſelf, and ſcorn a Lover, who indeed is worthy of you; and therefore, that I may no more upbraid you with theſe two things, I beſeech you ſtrive with your ſelf, either to leave ſcorning Iphicrates, or to leave loving Chriſippus. Truly Parthenopea, (ſaid ſhe, and bluſhed) I ſhould be very much puzled ſhould I offer it, to make choice of one of the two, for they ſeem unto me both equally difficult; and ſince I cannot endure any Difficulties, I beſeech you pardon, if I do not attempt either.

This, Madam, was the Conference between Aglatonice and Parthenopea, which yet did not end thus: For be pleaſed to know, that the Garden wherein they were, having three Doors, Iphicrates, to entertain his own melancholy Thoughts, did enter in at one, where Parthenopea's Coach was not; and not ſuſpecting Aglatonice to be there, he began to muſe upon the oddneſs of his Fate, and ſo went on in his ſtudy, until he came to the place where Aglatonice and Parthenopea did ſit. But to render this Accident more extraordinary, Chriſippus returning from Hunting ſooner then I wiſhed, I made the motion, when we came to the Gate of this Garden, to light from our Horſes, and take a turn in it; for, ſaid I, hunting Habits are not fit for the viſit of Ladies. So that Chriſippus not dreaming of my Deſign, (which was to keep him from interrupting my Friend) and being unwilling to diſpleaſe a Man who had diverted him all that day, he lighted from his Horſe, and went firſt into the Garden. We had not gone thirty paces, but we ſaw Aglatonice, Parthenopea, and Iphicrates all together, and yet they ſaw not us. I ſeeing this, though I could not do my Friend a greater pleaſure, than to ſtave off his Rival all the reſt of the day: So as I perſwaded Chriſippus, that ſince theſe Ladies ſaw us not, our beſt way was to retreat, ſince it was not handſom to ſhew our ſelves in ſuch rude Habits. But Chriſippus being in Love, and of a haſty Spirit to execute what e're he had a fancy to, in lieu of anſwering me, he went ſtraight to Aglatonice, caring no more for me, than if I had been none of his Company. But, Madam, in his Addreſs to her, he uſed ſuch trivial Expreſſions, which had neither Seriouſneſs, or Gallantry, or Delight in them, that Parthenopea looking ſlily upon Aglatonice, ſhe made her bluſh: But on the contrary, Iphicrates ſpoke ſo exactly, and played ſo handſomly upon his Rival, that Aglatonice, in her averſion to him, was no leſs vexed, that Iphicrates did ſpeak well, than ſhe was aſhamed Chriſippus ſpoke ill: So that not to be forced to commend Iphicrates in ſecret, nor blame Chriſippus, ſhe talked on continually.

Parthenopea having a ſubtil Wit, and perceiving that Aglatonice talked only to make others ſilent, did whiſper her in the Ear, and chide her: All will not do, (ſaid ſhe unto her) for though you hinder Chriſippus from talking of Trifles, and Iphicrates from ſpeaking excellently, yet you cannot hinder, but that there will be ſtill a vaſt difference between them; for indeed you need only to obſerve, how they hearken to you, and how they underſtand you, to make the diſtinction. I profeſs, Parthenopea, (ſaid ſhe as loud as ſhe could) you are this day one of my cruel Perſecutors. Have I not good reaſon?

(replied Parthenopea)? For my part (ſaid Iphicrates, to contradict Aglatonice, though he knew not of whom they ſpoke) I am perſwaded, that Parthenopea is in the right. For my part (ſaid Chriſippus, to contradict Iphicrates) I think Aglatonice is in the right. I aſſure you, (replied Parthenopea, and ſmiled) you do her the greateſt wrong in the World to think ſo, and there were never any thoughts more unjuſt than hers. Then I am very happy in taking your part, replied Iphicrates; for ſince I cannot be of Aglatonice's, I muſt be on Reaſon's ſide. Though Parthenopea's ſide be the moſt juſt that can be, replied Aglatonice, yet you are very unjuſt, becauſe you take her part, and know not why. After this, Chriſippus would have ſaid ſomething, as if he would have given the moſt convincing Reaſons in the World to prove, that he was more juſt then Iphicrates, but all his Arguments were as light as Air, Parthenopea could not forbear laughing; And Aglatonice not being able to ſtay any longer, ſaid, That ſhe feared it would Rain, and ſo retired. But to the grief of Iphicrates, this inhumane Perſon, notwithſtanding the great difference which ſhe ſaw between him and Chriſippus, ſhe turned very obligingly towards the laſt of theſe, and giving him her hand; Since you took my part, ſaid ſhe unto him, it is but juſt I carry you to the Garden-Door, and let Parthenopea do that Office if ſhe pleaſe for her Champion Iphicrates. I aſſure you, replied Parthenopea, and laughed, ſince Iphicrates was with you before Chriſippus came in, he ſhall not loſe the pleaſure he would have had if Chriſippus had not come; therefore he ſhall lead you as well as Chriſippus, and for me, I hope Cherſias will do me the favour to conduct me; and indeed, Madam, ſo it was, Iphicrates and Chriſippus both of them did lead Aglatonice, and I preſented my Hand unto Parthenopea, who, as long as we were in the walk which led us to the Gate where her Coach was, ſhe did very handſomly twit Chriſippus with his Follies, and applaud Iphicrates, but at laſt we parted.

Parthenopea carried Aglatonice to her Houſe; Chriſippus went Home, and I went with Iphicrates, who as ſoon as we were in his Chamber, related unto me all his Diſcourſe with Aglatonice. Well, ſaid I unto him, after I had heard him out, What do you now reſolve upon? To be (replied he) the moſt miſerable Man alive. For my part, ſaid I unto him, Me-thinks you ſhould take a more generous courſe; and it is much better to ceaſe loving Aglatonice, than thus eternally to ſerve her. I do confeſs it, ſaid he, but I muſt do as I can. It is ſo natural, replied I, not to love thoſe who love not us, and to hate thoſe who hate us, that I wonder you ſhould ſtill love Aglatonice, who you know can never love you. O cruel Friend, (ſaid he then unto me) be contented to tell me that ſhe does not love me, and do not ſay ſhe never will. Since I know no better way to extinguiſh Love than to extinquiſh Hope, replied I, I ſhould be ſorry to give you any falſe grounds for it, but would gladly cure you at once of a Diſeaſe, which none can adminiſter any Remedy unto but only your ſelf. All you ſay, replied he, is full of Reaſon; But for all that, there is ſuch a ſtrong inclination in my Heart towards Aglatonice, that I am perſwaded I ſhould love her, though in the Arms of my Rival, and muſt love her, though ſhe drive me to Abyſs of Diſpair: Indeed I do not love that Aglatonice ſhould have ſuch an umeaſurable love unto all that can be called Pleaſures and Diverſions, nor do I affect ſhe ſhould have ſuch a croud always about her; and leſs, that ſhe ſhould receive Incenſe from all that offer it; I am alſo vexed to the Soul, that ſhe ſhould never refuſe any Heart but mine, eſpecially that ſhe ſhould treat Chriſippus with a thouſand Favours above others; but for all this I love her, and if I be not much miſtaken, ſhall love her as long as I live. But I am ſo baffled in my Adventure this day, that I am reſolved to try all Remedies which are uſed to adviſe ſuch as are in Love: And ſince I have heard ſay, that Abſence is a moſt excellent one, I will get me further off Aglatonice, and will depart without bidding her adieu.

Iphicrates had no ſooner ſaid ſo, but to incourage him in his Deſign, I uſed all my Arguments to perſwade him to leave Priene for a time; and accordingly, within three days after, he did depart, and departed without taking his leave of Aglatonice. Yet I am ſure that he repented a hundred times of his Reſolution; but for all that, he did put it into execution in ſpite of his Love, and went to paſs away his Exile in Samos, to the end that being in a Court of high Gallantry, he might the better cure himſelf of his Paſſion. Moreover, during his abſence, I did write unto him all that I thought expedient to chaſe Love out of his Heart, for Aglatonice entertained no freſh Lover, but I ſent him word of it; nor ſhe conferred no new Favour upon Chriſippus, but he had it in a Letter from me: ſhe ſpoke alſo many bitter Invectives againſt him, which I did let him know; and indeed I omitted nothing which might conduce to his Cure. For all this, Madam, my Remedies were in in vain, and abſence, as powerful as it is, could not change the Heart of Iphicrates. So that finding himſelf as deep in Love as ever, and ſince abſence did but make him more miſerable at Samos than he was at Priene, he writ me a Letter, which I will relate, becauſe it is not long.

Iphicrates unto Cherſias.

Truth is, my dear Cherſias, I know, to my ſhame, that I am the baſeſt Man alive, ſince I do plainly ſee, I am not able to leave loving Aglatonice, and ſince ſo, I muſt content my ſelf with the miſery of loving her without hopes of being loved, and not be ſo miſerable, as to love her and be abſent too; therefore within theſe three days I ſhall imbarque, and come to ſeek ſome comfort in doing ſome ill Office unto Chriſippus, and in acquainting you with the Miſeries of your Friend

Iphicrates.

I muſt confeſs, Madam, that as well as I loved Iphicrates, I received his Letter without any joy, and heard of his Return with much ſorrow; for I having contracted an intimacy with Parthenopea, and ſhe being extreamly vexed at the Injuſtice of Aglatonice, I underſtood ſtood by her that Chriſippus was daily more and more happy; not that there was any thing in him to ſtave off other Lovers from his Miſtreſs, but it was becauſe he was incomparably better in her Fancy and Opinion than any other, though ſhe had no reaſon in the Earth for it. So that when Iphicrates returned unto Priene, he found things in a worſe condition than when he left it: And certainly he found it ſo, for when he went upon his firſt Viſit unto Aglatonice, ſhe received him with a ſtrange coldneſs, and returned ſuch faint Anſwers to all he ſaid, and turned matters ſo to other Subjects, that Iphicrates could not underſtand her. But he having an excellent Wit, he preſently perceived the Malice of this unjuſt Woman, and having no mind to be baffled into ſilence before ſo many Rivals, as ſoon as he ſaw his opportunity, he began to ſpeak, and talked as faſt upon things which paſſed at Samos whilſt he was in the Court of Policrite, as Aglatonice talked of paſſages in Priene, during his abſence; but the difference was, he told all his Stories in a pleaſant merry manner: for being deſirous to let her ſee he underſtood her Deſign, he talked for an hour together the moſt pleaſantly that is imaginable, but all was of things ſo far out of the knowledg of Aglatonice, that ſhe had no greater ſhare in his Diſcourſe, than he had in hers before; and the better to facilitate his Deſign, there was one at that time with Aglatonice, who had been in Samos: And ſince there happen'd a moſt ſtrange Accident concerning a Ring which Policrite let fall into the Sea, at a Feaſt with Ladies upon the Water, and which was found again a few days after, he addreſſed his Diſcourſe continually unto this Man, and intermixing in his Diſcourſe, the Names of Alcidamia, Meneclides, and Acaſta, who were Ladies of that Court; he talked of ſtately Edifices, and compoſed Things, and his Talk into ſuch an ingenious miſcellany, that Aglatonice could not catch an opportunity of handſomly interrupting him, as he had interrupted her. But at laſt, ſhe being put beyond her patience, and not being able to endure that Iphicrates ſhould return Malice for Malice, ſhe cut him off ſhort. I have often heard ſay (ſaid ſhe unto him) that the firſt Viſits of a Man returned from Travel are very dangerous, but I never tryed it till now: For (added ſhe, in a twitting raillary) here is Iphicrates, who hath been no further then Samos, yet he is as greedy to tell all he has ſeen, as if he had been in Perſia, Ægypt, Babylon, Ecbatan, and Scythia; and he talks, as if he had ſeen ſuch ſtrange things as never were talked of before. Being perſwaded, Madam, that you know moſt exactly all Rules of Civility, (replied he, half ſmiling) and never uſe to fail in the leaſt Circumſtance, I did believe, that ſince you thought good to talk a whole hour of things which I underſtood not, ſo you will not take it ill, if I talk of things which you do not underſtand; and the rather, becauſe thoſe who return from travel, have a peculiar priviledg for being heard. For my part, replied Chriſippus, I know not why they ſhould have that priviledg, for I do not care for knowing things which happen not in the place where I live. Dubtleſs, Sir, (replied Iphicrates) it is an argument of great Moderation of Mind, to confine ones Curioſity to the place where he dwells; and it is the only way to get good Information. Though it ſeem you are not of opinion with Chriſippus, anſwered Aglatonice, yet I muſt tell you, that I fear nothing in the World more, than to meet with theſe makers of Journeys, and tellers of ſtrange Prodigies, who will make it a whole days Work in telling you, that in ſuch a place is a River which empties it ſelf into a Gulf, and riſes again a hundred Furlongs off; and in another place he found Mountains higher then the Clouds; that in Egypt the High-Prieſts Surpliſſes are with Fringe and Taſſels upon it; that the King of Medes Throne is all of Gold; that in Phrygia the Gordian Knot is the ſtrangeſt thing that ever was ſeen; and a hundred ſuch: But I pray, ſaid ſhe, in the prettieſt rapture of Wit that ever was ſeen, What have I to do with this River, that Mountain, the High-Prieſt, the Throne of Gold, and that Knot which none can unty? Is it not better to tell of things within the compaſs of our knowledg, and of ſuch things as concerns us, than of ſuch things of which we have no need? Yet there are a ſort of Men who are extreamly ignorant in any thing that concerns them, and knowing enough in things which concerns them not: For my particular, purſued ſhe, I know a Man who can number up all the Monſters about the River Nilus; and knows, as he ſays, how the Phœnix is produced, and the Halcions; who for all that does not know half the Creatures of his own Country.

Though the Mind of Iphicrates was netled at the diſcourſe of Aglatonice, yet he could not chuſe but think it pleaſant: Yet I being preſent at the Conference, and was deſirous to turn all into Raillary, I began to ſpeak, and told Aglatonice, that if ever I travelled, I would be ſure of never ſeeing her, until I was weary of relating unto others all that I had ſeen abroad. Truly, ſaid ſhe, you would do me a pleaſure in it: Yet truly, ſaid I unto her, what you ſay is not ſo full of Reaſon as you think it; for I am perſwaded, that to confine ones Knowledg only unto the things of ones own Country, is the way to limit our Knowledg into too narrow a compaſs; and there is much pleaſure to be taken in being acquainted with things that are excellent in all other Countrys. I confeſs it, replied ſhe, and I believe that thoſe who travel, have very much ſatisfaction; but yet I would not have them, at their return, tire thoſe they meet withal with continual Relations of it, but tarry till fit Opportunities to talk of what they have ſeen, does naturally offer themſelves, and not to catch at all Opportunities of talking thereupon. For my part, ſaid Chriſippus, I wonder how any one can find any ſatisfaction in being in a ſtrange Country where they do not underſtand the Language, to be put to the inconveniency of changing their Lodgings every Night, and often put to many a hard ſhift. Since you did never travel, Sir, (replied Iphicrates, coldly) doubtleſs you are ignorant of the Pains and the Pleaſures of thoſe who have; yet you may think your ſelf happy that can ſit at eaſe with Aglatonice, and hear what others have learned, with ſo much wearineſs and fears. For my part (ſaid Aglatonice, purpoſely to hinder Chriſippus from ſpeaking impertinently) I am not at all ſorry to know how they live in other Courts: But to tell you truly, it is an Argument of great defect in Judgment, to be always relating what one hath ſeen. Since I am juſt, Madam, replied Iphicrates, I do concur with you; for it is very true, one ought to chuſe the Perſons unto whom he ſpeaks of ſuch things, and never to be long and tedious in his Relations, unleſs he be ingaged by the particular Curioſity of thoſe unto whom he ſpeaks, for in ſuch a caſe one may deſcribe a whole Country without any abſurdity: But my meaning is, Madam, that the moſt pleaſing ſtudy one can follow, is Travels; and the faireſt diverſion in the World, is, to be acquainted (eſpecially from a Man of Ingenuity) with what is rare, and worthy of obſervation in all places he hath been, provided it be told without affectation, and without inſiſting upon ſuch things, as are neither diverting nor neceſſary; for I muſt confeſs, when Men will trouble themſelves, and the company with telling a thouſand impertinent Circumſtances, which relate nothing to the purpoſe, but are tedious, it were to be wiſhed, that ſuch had never ſtirred from Home; for ſuch, if they had known leſs, they had ſpoken leſs.

Moreover, there are another ſort of Men, who uſe to obſerve nothing but what they ſhould forget, and never mind ſuch things as are moſt worthy of conſideration. But however, though I deſire to know nothing but what is worthy to be known, yet I had rather one ſhould tell me ſome frivolous things, provided there be any diverſion in them, than that they ſhould tell me nothing at all; and beſides all this, it is oftentimes more agreeable to Company to talk of what is far off us, than what is near; for there is ſuch ſtrange News abroad here at this time, that it is better to talk of any thing elſe. Since I do as much deſire to know the Paſſages of Priene, replied Chriſippus, as I do hate to know what happens any where elſe, I would you would tell me what this ſtrange News is? Another time I ſhall, Sir, anſwered Iphicrates, but now I will not tell it unto any but Aglatonice, if ſhe pleaſe to hear it.

Chriſippus hearing Iphicrates ſay ſo, was very importunate with Aglatonice to know it, in hopes to know it himſelf afterwards: But ſhe having as much Wit as he had little, did know very well, that ſhe was concerned in what he would tell her; ſo as ſhe told Chriſippus, that ſhe was not ſo full of Curioſity as he was, and therefore would not deſire of Iphicrates any thing he would not tell unto others. But the more ſhe denied Chriſippus, the more he importun'd her; and was ſo earneſt with Iphicrates to impart this ſtrange News, that ſhe, to ſtop the fooliſh Importunity of Chriſippus, did ſuffer Iphicrates to tell it her in a low Voice; and the beſt Jeſt was, whilſt he talked with her, his Rival was the gladdeſt Man in the World, imagining, that whatſoever was told unto Aglatonice, he ſhould know it before Night; but he was miſtaken, for the Buſineſs was of another Nature than to be imparted unto Chriſippus. And indeed, Madam, as ſoon as this Lover had obtained leave to ſpeak low, he whiſpered Aglatonice in the Ear; The ſtrange News I heard as I came hither, was, (ſaid he unto her) that you do ſtill continue unjuſt; and that Chriſippus, though an Aſs, is more in your favour than ever he was, but that I on the other ſide am far worſe.

Iphicrates had no ſooner ſaid this, but Aglatonice, with a ſtrange inhumanity, and incredible boldneſs, began to ſpeak, and told Iphicrates aloud, that all this he told her was no News at all, and that ſhe knew all he ſaid long ſince, and that nothing in the World was more true than it. I leave you to judg, Madam, whether or no this cruel Anſwer did incenſe Iphicrates, yet it did not much move him, but he contented himſelf with telling Aglatonice, that he was very ſorry ſhe knew it, and ſhould have been very glad if ſhe had not: after which, not being able to ſtay any longer there, he went out, and I with him; and ſo we left Chriſippus importuning Aglatonice, to tell him what Iphicrates had ſaid. But, Sir, this unfortunate Lover had a Mind ſo unquiet, that I never in all my Life ſaw ſuch ſigns of Fury in the Face of Man; and as ſoon as he came into his Chamber, he talked to me, as if he would run out of his Wits: But, ſaid I unto him, Why do you not make uſe of all theſe Paſſages to hate Aglatonice? I do proteſt, ſaid he unto me, my Heart begins to reſent that which it never did before; for till now, I thought that I ſhould love Aglatonice, even in the very Arms of my Rival: But now I begin to think, that if ſhe ſhould marry him, I ſhould hate her. If you be very certain of what you ſay, replied I, I would do your Rival Service, in lieu of hindering him; for ſince you cannot be loved, it is better to hate, than love her who cannot love you; and to cure your ſelf by hatred, than to be eternally miſerable, in ſuffering for one that will neither care nor comfort you. Though I make no queſtion (replied he) but that Remedy would cure me; yet I do proteſt I will not ſeek it, but on the contrary, will hinder my ſelf from uſing it as much as I can; not but that my Mind deſires a Cure, but yet my Heart reſiſts it; and the truth is, I am the moſt miſerable Lover that ever was. After this, Madam, I uſed an hundred ſharp Invectives againſt Aglatonice; and I perceived ſo well, that if Chriſippus married her, he would not love her, as I reſolved to uſe my utmoſt endeavours in haſtning the Happineſs of Chriſippus.

Thus to ſerve my Friend, I ſerved his Rival, and did as much for his Enemy as I could have done for him. But in concluſion, Madam, not to be over-tedious, let me tell you, that to ſatisfy his Paſſion by his Revenge, he fought with Chriſippus, and diſarmed him: But vanquiſhed as he was, Aglatonice ſtill preferred him before Iphicrates, whom ſhe hated much more than before the Combat: So that I reſolved to negotiate the Buſineſs with one that was Couſin unto Aglatonice, whom I was well acquainted with, and was ſo happy in my Tranſaction, that the Marriage between Chriſippus and her was made up; yet I underſtood ſince from Parthenopea, that though Aglatonice loved Chriſippus, yet ſhe could hardly reſolve to marry him: But at laſt, Madam, ſhe did marry him without any ſeeming repugnancy. In the mean time it was no ſooner reported that Chriſippus was to marry Aglatonice; but it was again reported, that he had already married her, for the Marriage was not above four days in compleating: So that Iphicrates, who was gone a day's Journey out of Priene, knew nothing of all this: But, Madam, he received the News of it in ſo ſtrange a manner, as I think you never heard the like; and I being accidentally at his Gate when he returned, as ſoon as he lighted from his Horſe, and both of us come into his Chamber, he told me how he paſſed by the Lodging of Chriſippus; and there was ſuch a croud of People, that he believed there had been ſome quarrel, asking me if knew between whom? I know not (ſaid I unto him) whether Chriſippus has been quarrelling or no; but I know very well that he married Aglatonice yeſterday, and that there are a croud of People at his Houſe. How (cried out Iphicrates) Aglatonice married to Chriſippus! Yes, replied I, and I muſt ſummon you to be as good as your word, and ask you if you will hate her? Yes, yes, (replied he very ſharply) I will, I will hate her, and hate her ſo heartily, that if I do not hate her, I will hate my ſelf: For, truly, Cherſias, (ſaid he unto me) I muſt not by any means continue loving a fooliſh Woman; that hath wholly beſtowed her ſelf upon the pooreſt-parted Fellow that lives amongſt Men: Had ſhe only treated me ill, ſaid he, I proteſt I ſhould ſtill have loved her as long as I lived; or had ſhe only preferred Chriſippus before me without Marriage, I ſhould have ſuffered her Injuſtice without hatred: But to caſt away her ſelf, to ſatisfy the Paſſion of ſuch a Man as Chriſippus, this is a Sin ſo ſimple, that I can never pardon it. Yes, yes, Cherſias, ſaid he, hold me for the baſeſt of Men, if ever I be either an Adorer or Lover of her that is Wife unto Chriſippus.

At theſe words Iphicrates ſtopped, as if he would ask himſelf whether all this were true. Then ſaid he upon a ſudden, No, no, I ſhall quickly leave loving Aglatonice, for I find in my ſelf a great diſpoſition to ſcorn her. You may well imagine, Madam, that I confirmed him in this Mind as much as I could; and indeed he was ſo fully reſolved to drive Aglatonice out of his Heart, that in a few days he found his Anger to be higher than his Love: And as a great help to his Cure, he never came in any place where Aglatonice was not much condemned; ſo that curing himſelf by a reſentment of Spite, he paſſed from Anger to Hatred, and a while after from Hatred to Indifferency, and at laſt not to endure the very ſight of her.

In the mean time, this unjuſt Perſon was juſtly puniſhed for her Injuſtice, for the ſhallow Capacity of Chriſippus reaching no higher than a terreſtrial and groſs Love, and being of as light a Spirit as ever was known, as ſoon as Aglatonice was his Wife, he was no more her Lover. So that ſince ſhe could not ſee this without Sorrow, and that a Perſon who was uſed to receive Offers of Incenſe, now to receive Slights and Scorn; ſhe was not only angry and grieved at this, but ſhe was aſhamed alſo of being the Wife unto ſuch a Husband; yet ſtanding upon her Honour, ſhe would not expreſs her Reſentments, but carried it very fair to the World, as before. All her Lovers, except Iphicrates, continued their Viſits to her; and though now under the Notion of Friends, yet ſtill were her Lovers.

But Chriſippus, though a Man of a very narrow Soul, and not capable of any deep diſcernment, yet he began to be jealous: The truth is, it was no Jealouſy of Love, which amidſt of all its Fantaſms, preſerves ſome reſpect to the Perſon of whom he is jealous, and may truly be called the Jealouſy of a Lover; but it was a Jealouſy of Honour which commonly cauſes all thoſe who are capable of it, to be extravagant with a Noiſe. So that the unjuſt Aglatonice did ſee her ſelf expoſed unto all manner of Miſeries. I alſo underſtood from Parthenopea, that ſhe began to be ſo ſenſible of her Injuſtice in preferring Chriſippus before Iphicrates, that according as ſhe did drive the firſt of theſe out of her Heart, ſhe received in the ſecond, and repented her ſelf for treating him as ſhe had done; yet ſhe being indeed vertuous, all this paſſed in her Mind without being perceived; yet ſhe was not altogether ſo miſerable as another might have been in her caſe, for being a lover of Pleaſures, for all the fantaſtical Humours of Chriſippus, ſhe did divert her ſelf. But now every one of her Lovers began to fall off, and to do what they could to diſpleaſe her; and at laſt did hate her, as much as before they loved her: So that, Madam, Iphicrates had the ſatisfaction to ſee his Rivals revenged upon his Miſtreſs, and his Miſtreſs revenged upon his Rivals; and he had this advantage, to guſt his Revenge with Tranquillity, and to find his Heart ſo freely diſingaged, from that Paſſion that did before tyrannize over it, that he could not poſſibly be freer than now he was. But, Madam, to come unto that which will prove, that it is not an eaſy matter to love the ſame Perſon twice, be pleaſed to know, That Chriſippus did engage himſelf in a Quarrel, did fight, and was killed; ſo that Aglatonice was rid of an odd Husband, and in a capacity to do Juſtice unto Iphicrates, if Iphicrates was in the ſame mind as before: And indeed, Madam, after ſhe had left off Mourning, ſhe changed her Lodging; and chance did ſo fall out, that her Lodging was directly over againſt that of her ancient Lover. So that Civility obliging him to ſee her, he did viſit her, and the rather, becauſe he found his Heart ſo abſolutely diſingaged, that it was all Indifferency, and had neither Hatred nor Affection to her. In this tranquile Mind, Iphicrates did venture to ſee Aglatonice again, and ſaw her, without the leaſt diſturbance of his Tranquillity; yet Aglatonice was as fair as ever, and he knew very well, that if he would he could ſucceed in the Place of Chriſippus; yet he did not find the leaſt motion of Love, but was ſo far from it, as I have heard him ſay, he would rather marry an ugly old Witch, than begin again to love Aglatonice; and his Soul was ſo ſettled in inſenſibility, that he would often talk to her of old Paſſages between them, and rally at them. In the mean time, I muſt confeſs unto you, that I was nothing pleaſed at theſe Viſits, but was afraid leſt he ſhould re-ingage himſelf; for he being a Man of ſtrong and violent Paſſions, I wiſhed, for his own reſts-ſake, that he ſhould never fall in love again with her. So that one Evening, preſſing him to go no more unto Aglatonice: I pray, Cherſias, (ſaid he) never trouble your ſelf, nor fear that I ſhall ever re-ingage my ſelf. But yet ſhe is ſo fair, (ſaid I unto him) and as ſweet as ever ſhe was before, that I muſt needs fear it. 'Tis true, ſaid he, but Cherſias knows, that my Love of her being once extinguiſhed, all her Art can never kindle it again. Since I hate her now, I ſhall never love her again; it is a thing abſolutely impoſſible, for Hatred is a Paſſion as violent as Love; Love may change it ſelf into Hatred when Love precedes; but when Love paſſes into Hatred, from Hatred to Scorn, and from Scorn to dead Neutrality, be aſſured one can never love again: And indeed, Madam, the Event ſhewed, that Iphicrates was not miſtaken, for he could never love Aglatonice again, though he ſaw her a thouſand times after the Death of Chriſippus: But on the contrary, I have ſeen him become a Confident unto one of her Lovers; and I have ſeen him marry another, though he was certain he might have married Aglatonice if he would. After this, Madam, I aſſure my ſelf you will think this Example ſufficient to prove, that one cannot love one and the ſame Perſon twice, and is as ſtrong an Example, as that which Meneſiphiles related to prove, that one may be twice inſpired with Love of the ſame Perſon.

When I had ended my Relation, the Princeſs of Corinth, and the Princeſs of Lindes, both confeſſed, that theſe two Examples were extreamly contrary: But Reaſons being always more prevalent than Examples, (ſaid Eumetis to the Company) it were good to examine and know, whether thoſe of Cherſias have more ſolidity in them, than thoſe of Meneſiphiles.

But, Madam, as I was going to anſwer, all the Sages were ſeen to come in, accompanied with Niloxenus, Diocles, and Cleodemes, who after they had argued upon high and excellent Queſtions, came out of the Hall where the Princeſſes left them, and came to take the Air where they were: However, ſince the Princeſſes had a deſire to hear the Reaſons of Meneſiphiles and my ſelf, Eumetis addreſſed her ſelf unto Periander, and told him, that he came very opportunely to be Judg of a Queſtion of Gallantry, unto which all the Company were to give their Opinions: For, Sir, (added ſhe) though it be no Queſtion concerning Government of Kingdoms, or Ruling of Common-wealths, yet I think it not unworthy the curioſity of the Sages, ſince it is concerning all the odd Effects of ſo powerful and general a Paſſion. Periander then being acquainted with the Queſtion, Solon, whom it concerned, did think it ſo nice, that he ſaid he was ready to give his Opinion; and turning towards the reſt, one out of Inclination, another out of Complacency, and all diſpoſed themſelves to give their Votes: So that Meliſſa being come, and every one taking their places except Eſope, who left his, Cleobuline commanded me to give my Reaſons, permitting Meneſiphiles to interrupt me when he pleaſed: So that after I had a little thought upon what to ſay, I addreſſed my ſelf unto Meneſiphiles, as againſt whom I was to diſpute: Me-thinks (ſaid I unto him) to judg rightly upon the Queſtion in hand, and to know truly whether it be not a thing extreamly rare (if not impoſſible) to love one Lady twice, it muſt be conſidered what cauſes Love, to the end it may be ſeen whether it be found in a Perſon whom one loved before. Since it is the ſame Perſon, replied Meneſiphiles, it muſt of neceſſity follow, that the ſame is to be found in her the ſecond time, which was in her the firſt; to wit, the ſame Beauty, the ſame Spirit, and the ſame Agreeableneſs; and therefore ſince theſe did invite the firſt time, they may alſo the ſecond. Not at all, replied I, for though all theſe be the ſame, yet they may want one particular Charm which highly ſets them off, and that is Novelty; for that Luſtre which at the firſt did dazle the Eyes, and beget admiration, by being well acquainted with them, they become but ordinary, uſe and cuſtom does glut the Senſes; and it is with Beauty as with Perfumes, which after the firſt time, loſe their Smells, and conſequently cannot beget a ſecond liking, or make a new Conqueſt. Moreover, as there is a neceſſity of Hopes growing up with Love, ſo I hold it a moſt difficult thing for Hope to revive, when one leaves off loving, out of Reaſon, or Deſpair; or when Love of it ſelf doth extinguiſh: and I am perſwaded, that when one leaves off deſiring a Thing, becauſe he doth think it not worthy to be deſired, it is not an eaſy matter to renew that Deſire again: However, it is impoſſible that Hope ſhould grow without Deſires, and that Love can ſubſiſt without Hope. I do very well grant, there may be ſome quarrelling, during which, one may imagine that he does not love, though ſtill he does; but I cannot conceive that when one doth really ceaſe to love, one ſhould ever begin again to love the ſame Perſon. Yet it is moſt commonly ſeen, replied Meneſiphiles, that a Candle extinguiſhed will be more eaſily lighted again, than if it had never been lighted; and though there be no heat at all left in it, yet there doth remain a kind of diſpoſition, which makes it more capable of taking Fire; and I am verily perſwaded, that when one hath vehemently loved a Perſon, there does ſtill reſide ſome light touch of heat in the Heart of that Lover, which makes him more diſpoſed to be moved at the Charms of her he loved before, than at the Charms of any other: for it muſt be granted, that ſhe has ſuch Charms as will pleaſe him, becauſe they pleaſed him before; and therefore is more fit and likely to engage him the ſecond time, than any other Perſon. For my part, replied I, I muſt confeſs I cannot underſtand how a Perſon, whoſe Charms had not power enough to keep a Man from ceaſing to love her, ſhould have power to make the ſame Lover love her the ſecond time: For I am perſwaded, that as it is eaſier to keep the Fire from extinguiſhing, than it is to light it; ſo it is more eaſy to preſerve Love, than to recreate it: So that in my Opinion, as ſoon as a Lady ſees that her Beauty cannot hold her Lover, ſhe never need to think of ever fettering him again, if once he really broke her Chains: But, commonly thoſe who are ſaid to begin to love the ſame Perſon again, did never really leave loving her, though they thought they did; and queſtionleſs ſome Sparks of the old Fire lay hid in the Embers, and ſeeming dead, did deceive their own Thoughts. Indeed there are ſome jealous Lovers, who are ſo bold in their Raptures, as to ſay they do not love, though all the World knows there can be no real Jealouſy without Love. There are others alſo, who becauſe they have ſome ſparks or effects of Hatred in their Mind, preſently they think they do hate; for ſometimes one ſhall ſee them in an angry Mood, make cruel Imprecations againſt thoſe they adored, yet it often happens that they would not curſe them, becauſe they love them.

But beſides theſe two ſorts of Lovers, who love and know it not, and who think they begin to love upon a new ſcore, when as they do only continue the old; there is a third kind, who think as the reſt, that they are not in Love, becauſe their Love cools, and ſlacks a little for a time, and they are not ſenſible of it, either in point of Joys, or point of Sorrows; but for all that, their Affections are but aſleep, not dead: And when this kind of Love begins to quicken by any Accident, it muſt be ſaid only to waken, not revive. So that I do not wonder, many are perſwaded one may love the ſame Perſon twice, ſince the very ſame Perſons, who have theſe kinds of Paſſion whereof I ſpeak, are deceived themſelves firſt, and then they deceive others, and yet it holds moſt conſtantly true, that (without a prodigy) one cannot love one Beauty twice, yet I muſt confeſs, that when Love ceaſes by reaſon of any ſtrange or unjuſt cauſe, one may ceaſe and begin again to love: For example, if a Man in love thinks he is betrayed, and in the heat of his Reſentment he paſſes from Love to Hatred, and a while after he finds that he was miſtaken, I believe it will be an eaſy matter to revive that Paſſion in his Heart which he baniſhed, becauſe he finds her to be the ſame ſhe was when he loved her; this is rather a continuance, than a recommencement of Love: but for any other manner, for which a Man may break off with his Miſtreſs, I hold it impoſſible he ſhould ever love her twice. Since it hath happened ſo in Philidas, replied Meneſiphiles, it may again happen ſo in another. And ſince it did not happen ſo in Iphicrates (replied I) it is not likely it ſhould happen ſo again, for every thing did invite him as much as poſſible to begin again to love Aglatonice. The intereſt of his Fortune did ſuit with that of his Love, if he could have loved; ſhe was fairer than ever, ſhe was nothing ſo cruel, Iphicrates was ingaged no where elſe, he ſaw her every day, he talked with her every hour, his Soul was naturally amorous, and he had loved as violently as ever any did, and yet for all this, he could not love her the ſecond time; and doubtleſs the rule holds true in Love as in all things elſe, that when they are once deſtroyed and gone, they never return to be the ſame they were again. But Cherſias, replied Meneſiphiles, I have many Reaſons more ſtrong againſt you; for I believe that the moſt eſſential cauſe of Love, is that inviſible Band that ties Hearts ſo faſt together, and is called Sympathy; and I do believe alſo, that this Sympathy can never end: Since we ſee all natural Inclinations never change, either amongſt Inanimates, Animals, or Men; for the Loadſtone will love to draw Iron to it as long as it is a Loadſtone; the Lion will fear that Bird which is called the Herauld of the day, as long as he is a Lion; Men do keep the firſt Inclinations which Nature gave them, even unto Death; and indeed a covetous Man will never be liberal, without a ſtrange Violence upon himſelf, the envious Man never commends any without Regret, and an ambitious Man will never ſubmit without Sorrow; and in my opinion, all theſe ſeveral Inclinations are not more ſtrong in our Hearts, than that Sympathy is, which makes us love one Perſon more than another: So that as all theſe Inclinations do ſubſiſt, as long as we ſubſiſt our ſelves, it follows of abſolute Neceſſity, that the Sympathy which makes us love, doth ſubſiſt alſo: 'Tis true, our Inclinations are ſometimes forced by reaſon, though we ſtill have them; and the effects of this Sympathy whereof I ſpeak, may be ſuſpended by ſome Accident; but for all that, it cannot ceaſe being, and conſequently I conclude, that there is ſtill a great diſpoſition to love what formerly one loved, ſince the cauſe never ceaſed: And as there are ſome certain things which hinder the effects of the Loadſtone, ſo there may be which hinder the effects of Sympathy, but removing thoſe Obſtacles, the Sympathy begins again to operate; and I am ſo verily perſwaded of what I ſay, that I do much more wonder to ſee one leave loving what he loved before, than to ſee one love one and the ſame Perſon twice.

Cuſtom and Habitude which is ſo ſtrong in all things, makes alſo the Mind to have a natural Propenſity of loving again that Perſon whom it loved long: The Boughs of Trees tacked to a Wall, are ſo accuſtomed to that poſture they are put unto, that of themſelves they ply unto it, though untacked, ſo powerful is Habit and Cuſtom in every thing. So that it is no wonder at all, if there be a great Facility of loving the ſecond time that Perſon whom one loved before, ſince they do no more than what before they had done: And indeed the example of Philidas and Anaxandride, makes it apparent, that the Reaſons I have given are good; for had there not been a powerful Sympathy between them, they had never renewed their Love: Philidas had too much wronged Anaxandride ever to think of becoming her Lover again, had he not been forced unto it, and Anaxandride had too unjuſtly forſaken him, ever to truſt his Affection; yet they loved more zealouſly the ſecond time, than they did the firſt; and whether Sympathy or Habilitude, or both together, were the cauſe, they ſtill do love with as much Zeal as Fidelity, and in all likelihood will continue ſo eternally.

After this, Meneſiphiles being ſilent, the Princeſs of Lindes who was the cauſe of this Diſpute, deſired all this illuſtrious Company they would be pleaſed to give their Opinions in the Matter; and there being Men too much knowing to give their Opinions without their Reaſons, theſe wiſe Men did make the moſt pleaſing Definition of Love that ever was. But in concluſion, the Plurality of Votes was on the ſide of Meneſiphiles, for they did not only conclude, that one might love one and the ſame Perſon twice, but alſo, that it was much more eaſy for a Man to return unto his firſt Miſtreſs, than to love a new one; yet they acknowledged that it does not happen ſo often as it ought, adding, that moſt of thoſe who ceaſe to love, did doubtleſs never love very much: For my part (ſaid Eſope, who was of a contrary opinion to theirs) I am ſure that I loved Rhodope as well, or better than ever any did or could love, and I am as ſure that now I do not love her, nor ever ſhall, I fortify the ſide of Meneſiphiles by my Example, nor do I like that Men ſhould be leſs rational than the Turtles, who never love but once. After ter this, paſſing from one Subject to another, the Queſtion was asked, Why Beauty did not neceſſarily produce Love in the Souls of all thoſe who beheld it alike? Why ſome Women who were not at all fair, yet raiſed great and violent Paſſions, inſtancing alſo many Examples of its odd effects. Solon ſaid, that as Hope nouriſhed Love, ſo Jealouſy did augment it, provided it was not over violent, and ill-grounded. Periander on the contrary maintained, that this Paſſion was an Enemy to Love, though it was an inſeparable Companion. Bias taking a third ſide ſaid, That a Lover might be capable of Jealouſy, yet never jealous. Pittacus affirmed, that one was never jealous, but when the Party loved did give ſome cauſe of it, and if that cauſe was given, he ought to hate her. Cleobulus and Thales on the contrary ſaid, That Love without Jealouſy was but faint and cold. And Chilon according to his natural Severity ſaid, That one ſhould not be jealous of any thing but his own Glory. As for Anacharſis he ſaid, that one ought to be jealous of every thing he loved; affirming, that one cannot love any thing dearly, but they will fear to loſe the Enjoyment of it, and that one cannot fear the loſs of it without ſome ſparks of Jealouſy. As for Eſope, he uſing his Beaſts and Birds to ſet forth his Philoſophy, he ſaid, that as the Pelican gives Life unto thoſe who give her Death, ſo Jealouſy is a Paſſion that murders the Love which gave it being. As for the Princeſſes, they confined themſelves to the modeſty of their Sex, and ſubmitted to the Opinions of the Sages.

As they were thus diſcourſing, one came and acquainted Periander with the Accident that befel Arion, and Periander cauſing the Man to relate it unto all the Company, this wonderful Adventure was an admirable Diverſion to them: For he deſcribed how the Dolphin ſaved Arion ſo admirably well, and how he brought him to the Port of Tenarus, that it was as pleaſing as if they had ſeen it. But this Accident being known to all the World, I ſhall not trouble you, Madam, with the relation of it, only tell you, how Periander remembring he had heard Thales ſay, That Men ought only to tell Probabilities, but never any thing which is not, though it be true; therefore he asked him pardon, for cauſing a Relation to be made which ſeemed almoſt impoſſible: 'Tis very true, ſaid the wiſe Bias, that was one of Thales his Maximes; and I have heard him alſo ſay, that one ſhould never believe their Enemies in things which ſeemed moſt credible: But to believe their Friends in things incredible: And thereſore you need not fear that he will accuſe you. After this, divers Examples were related of the Love of Dolphins towards Men: Solon related that of Heſiode, whoſe Body a Dolphin carried to Land near the Town of Molicry, and which was a cauſe that they who murdered that famous Poet, were puniſhed. Pittacus alſo related an Example of the goodneſs in Dolphins to one whoſe name was Enalus, Son unto the Founder of Mytilene, whoſe Life the Dolphins ſaved. Well then (ſaid Eſope, and laughed) ſince Dolphins do ſuch Wonders, why do you mock at my Jays and my Crows for ſpeaking? For my part (ſaid Cleobuline) I do not mock, for they ſpeak ſo well, that it is hard for any to ſpeak better: Though you do not, Madam, replied he, yet there are Men who judg of things according to Appearances, and who becauſe they ſee they are but Beaſts, which I introduce, do never think that it was a Man that made them ſpeak; not that they are much in the wrong (added he) for one cannot know the truth by Appearances. Then you have forgot your Fox (replied Anacharſis very pleaſantly) for when you made him enter into conteſt with the Leopard, to know which of them two had the moſt Spots, he deſired his Judg not ſo much to conſider the exteriour Spots which the Leopard had upon his Skin, as thoſe he had in his Head, aſſuring him, that if he did well conſider his, he would find greater Variety than in his who diſputed ſo much which was beſt ſpotted. 'Tis true (ſaid Eſope) I did contradict my ſelf: But to tell you truly, added he, and laughed, I have made ſo many Beaſts to ſpeak, that I fear by teaching them my Language, I ſhall at laſt learn theirs, and by making them become what I am, I ſhall my ſelf become what they are. Ah Eſope, ſaid Eumetis, what Spirit ſoever you have inſpired into your Beaſts and Birds, you have yet much more than you have infuſed into them.

After this, every one according to their Inclinations, parted into ſeveral Companies in that pleaſant Grove: Chilon he went walking with Anacharſis, Periander with Thales, Niloxenus, Bias, Pittacus, Cleobulus and Cleodema: But Solon having a natural inclination unto Gallantry, he ſtaid with the Ladies, and made the converſation more pleaſant than ever any I knew in all my life: Indeed this Man, ſo wiſe, and ſo highly prudent, did know ſo well how to comply with the Times, and Perſons unto whom he ſpoke, that he could ſpeak upon every Subject: The truth is, it argued no baſeneſs of Spirit in him, for being with the Princeſs of Corinth, and the Princeſs of Lindes, he might well talk of the moſt ſublime Matters without any fear of being not underſtood, and he related all that was ſaid amongſt the Sages, ſince the Princeſſes came out of the Hall, and did it with ſo much, and in ſo few words, that he did epitomize all their excellent Diſcourſe, to wit, all that Morality or Policy could teach. Afterwards Solon told the two Princeſſes, that they ought to think themſelves infinitely happy in being ſo much above all the reſt of their Sex, and yet to have ſo much moderation, as to keep within ſuch limits as Modeſty required all Ladies ſhould in matters of Sciences, and not to ſhew any ſuch weakneſs as Women are commonly charged with: For truly, ſaid he, and ſmiled, there are but a very few who are not ſo weak as to wiſh themſelves loved by more Men than they would love. For my part, ſaid Cleobuline, I believe one may, without a Crime, wiſh to be eſteemed by all the World; but I cannot allow any ſhould make more Men in love with them than they would love. Yet I aſſure you, Madam, replied Solon, it is the general mind of moſt Beauties, and a Mind more dangerous than they imagine. Yet there are many, replied Eumetis, who do love only out of vanity, and do not wiſh to be loved, but becauſe they think that the eſteem of Beauty is Love. 'Tis true (replied Solon) it is often ſo; but yet for all that, few Ladies would love, if they were never loved, and when they wiſh that Men ſhould love them, they then begin to love alſo.

For my part, ſaid Eſope, I cannot think it neceſſary to love a Lady before ſhe loves me; and as there are an infinite number of Men who love firſt, ſo I believe there are an infinite number of Women who love firſt alſo; and though all the Sages ſhould ſay the contrary, I ſhould hardly believe them. Ah, Eſope, (ſaid Eumetis) What injuſtice do you unto our Sex? Believe it, Madam, (replied he) I am not ſo unjuſt as you imagine: For I beſeech you, what reaſon have we to love before we be loved, more than you have? Have Ladies Hearts different from the Hearts of Men? Is not Love a Paſſion in their Souls, as well as in all Mens? Is it an Act of their Will to love, or not to love? The reaſon why it is not ſo often ſaid that Women love not, and are not beloved more than Men, is, becauſe only decency has eſtabliſhed ſo a Law, that it is leſs ſhame for a Man than a Woman to love, and not be beloved: But the truth is, all the difference betwixt us is, when Women love, and are not loved, they ſay not a word of it, nor make any complaints, and Men do tell it, and complain aloud; for ſince they have Eyes, and Wit, and Hearts capable of being moved, it muſt be concluded, that they can love before they be loved, as well as Men; and to prove it, there need only be conſidered, that Love alone, be it as zealous as it will, does not oblige them to love, but the Lover muſt alſo pleaſe them, for if he do not, all his Love will not be worth a Straw.

As Eſope ſaid ſo, and Solon was ready to anſwer, all the ſeveral Companies which were parted, did accidentally meet in a place which ſix Walks joined, that the Company rejoined again. And Solon finding the Queſtion which Eſope put to be worthy of curioſity, did propound it unto the illuſtrious Company, who prepared themſelves to give their Opinions. For my part, ſaid the Princeſs of Lindes, I think it ſo ſtrange to love before I be loved, that I cannot endure to hear our Sex accuſed of any ſuch Weakneſs. But, Madam, ſaid Eſope, it muſt be one of the two that muſt begin to love, and if ſo, why not the Woman as well as the Man-lover. Becauſe (replied Eumetis) Decency will not permit it. But, Madam, ſaid Eſope, ſince the Law of Nature is more ancient than the Law of Decency, that Argument is but weak. It is certain, ſaid Solon, that to ſpeak truly, a Woman may love before ſhe be loved as well as a Man; yet it is certain, that it is not ſo very often; and the beſt Reaſon that can be given for it is, becauſe Women are fairer, and all the Ornaments, both of Body and Mind, more attractive, and more engaging than Mens, and conſequently their Merits do produce a more quick effect than ours, ſo that commonly Men do love them before they have leiſure to be loved again. Moreover, Women are born with more Vanity, and ſo have leſs diſpoſition to be firſt in love; and as they are brought up, they are not permitted to follow the pure courſe of Nature, becauſe, from the very Cradle, they are ſo told and taught, not to love before they are loved, and that they keep a continual Guard upon themſelves; yet for all that, I am perſwaded it is not impoſſible but it may be ſo ſometimes. I aſſure my ſelf, replied Eſope, that Chilon with his Auſterity would think himſelf diſhonoured, if he ſhould read ſuch a Lecture upon Love as Solon hath done. Truly, replied he, I find him to be very knowing in Matters of Gallantry, to be a maker of ſuch excellent Laws, at leaſt I know there is none in Lacedemonia who knows ſo much as he. Since the Athenians, replied Solon, are nothing ſo wiſe as the Lacedemonians, I can confeſs, without ſhame, that I do underſtand what Love is, as well as the reſt of the Paſſions.

But to return to the queſtion in hand, What is the Opinion of the Company? For my part (ſaid Thales) I think a Woman may love the firſt; but I think withal, that few Women can love long unleſs they be loved, and not paſs from Love to Hatred. For my particular, replied Periander, I think it may be ſo, but I think alſo, that a Lady is not very amiable, if in loving ſhe does not ſoon make her ſelf loved. I am ſo fully perſwaded, id Cleobulus, and ſmiled, that Ladies are more fit to be loved than to love; that I am ſo far from thinking they ſhould love firſt, that I can hardly think they will love when they are loved. I am not of that Opinion, (ſaid Bias) for I do think, that when they are loved, they will love more earneſtly and firmly than Men; but I muſt confeſs, I can hardly think they can love firſt, becauſe there is not one of a thouſand Women who does not love thoſe Teſtimonies which Love uſeth to produce, better than the Lover who gives them; and ſince theſe Teſtimonies cannot be met with, if ſhe love firſt, I am perſwaded they are not capable of it. For my part, ſaid Pittacus, I think that Love, not being an Act of the Will, it grows in the Heart of a Woman before ſhe be loved, as well as in the Heart of a Man. For my part, ſaid Anacharſis, I know not what the Power of Love is in Greece, but in Scythia neither Men or Women do love before they be loved, or at leaſt before they find a diſpoſition, and hopes of being loved 'ere long; for I do not think it poſſible Love ſhould ſubſiſt without thoſe Conditions, not but that there may be ſome Exceptions, but to ſpeak in general, it is as I ſay. Though Egypt, replied Niloxenus, be far different from Scythia in all things, yet they think as you ſay. Well, ſaid Solon, it muſt be granted, that it is not impoſſible but Ladies may love before they be loved. Truly, ſaid the Princeſs of Lindes, it is not impoſſible, but yet it is very difficult. Yes, Madam, ſaid Solon, to ſuch as have ſuch Souls as you have: But that would be too great a Favour unto your Sex, and to ſet you too much above us, if we ſhould attribute ſuch thoughts as yours unto all Women.

As Eumetis was going to anſwer the Civility of Solon, a ſweet Conſort of Muſique was heard in the midſt of the Grove, which impoſed Silence unto all the Company, unto which after they had hearkened a while, they parted again into ſeveral Companies; but as the the Sun was ready to ſet, and Thales uſing to obſerve the Heavens, he ſtaid to look upon that glorious Planet, which having ſpread his golden Rayes upon the Sea, did ſeem to communicate a part of his Light unto it. As for Solon, he ſtaying to hear the Muſique with the Ladies, by chance he ſpied, at the Root of a Tree, cloſe by a long File of Ants, which with wonderful Earneſtneſs, Order, and Affection, did work for their publique Utility: So as admiring the Order which they kept in their Works, he contemplated upon them very ſeriouſly: but Eſope, who was next him, knew well enough what he thought, and what it was which invited his ſerious looks: Confeſs the truth, Sir, (ſaid he unto him, and ſmiled) would you not be glad the Athenians would obſerve your Laws, ſo well as theſe obſerve theirs? I muſt needs confeſs it (replied Solon, and laughed, as well as all that heard him) and I confeſs it, to the ſhame of my Country. Since your Country hath a Man who gives them ſuch juſt Laws (replied Cleobuline) it muſt needs be very glorious. It would be much more, if they would obſerve them, replied he, than in giving birth unto a Man, who perhaps keeps them not himſelf.

After this Solon entring into diſcourſe of the Government of People, he was full of rare Expreſſions; and all the Company aſſembling the third time, the Diſcourſe grew all ſerious, each of them reporting the moſt commendable Cuſtoms of his City. Thales ſpoke of the Mileſian Piety. Pittacus of the Martial inclination of the Militenian Inhabitants. Bias of their Politeneſs which dwelt in Priene. Cleobuline of the Lindean Honeſty. Periander of the ambitious People in Corinth. Solon of the ſtirring and ſeditious Humour of the Athenians; and Chilon of the auſtere and virtuous Inclination of the Lacedemonians. After which, examining the Vertues and Vices of all theſe ſeveral different People, they diſcourſed ſo long upon it, that it was full time to return to Corinth: And indeed, the Diſcourſe of theſe great Wits, did ſo much win upon the Spirits of all who heard them, that if Æſop had not obſerved abundance of Birds, which came to take up their lodgings in the Woods, and had not ſhewed by them unto all the Company, what time of the Night it was, it had been too late for them to have returned: And he came to all the Sages, telling them very pleaſantly, That theſe Birds were wiſer than they, and better knew the time of the Night than they did. In Concluſion, Madam, All the Company concurred with Æſop, That it would be Night before they reached Corinth, if they tarried any longer; and ſo all departed fully ſatisfied with the daies Diſcourſe: Yet, Madam, do not judg of it by my imperfect Relation, for I muſt confeſs, my unworthineſs to be a relator of all the Paſſages at this Banquet of the Sages.

Cherſias having ended, he received a thouſand Thanks from Cyrus, and as many Civilities from Oneſile; the like did Meneſiphiles. After which, ſaying, ſhe would make uſe of that Advice which Æſope gave unto the Sages, ſhe did riſe up to depart, leſt it ſhould be dark before ſhe came to that little Town where ſhe lodged. But, Cyrus deſiring her to take part of a Collation before ſhe went, ſhe ſtayed; and during all that time, nothing was talked on, but on what Meneſiphiles and Cherſias had related; and I cannot tell whether the Diſcourſe of Cyrus and Oneſile during the Collation, was not as admirable, as that of the Sages during theirs: Teligenes alſo had a thouſand quirks of a pleaſant Wit. After which, Oneſile taking Coach, ſhe departed with a Convoy, and left Cyrus in a ſtrange Impatience, to hear ſomthing of the happy Succeſs of Anacharſis. In the mean time, though he would willingly have taken ſome hours to talk with himſelf, yet he ſpent it all, in keeping up that Noble Heat in the Hearts of his Commanders and Soldiers, which had gotten him ſo many glorious Victories. So that talking ſometimes to one, and ſomtimes to another, he Inſpired them all with that Heroick Heat which was in his own Heart: Mazares alſo did much help him, in diſpoſing the Soldiers to Fight gallantly, when time ſhould call them to it; Though the ſmall Intereſt he had in all theſe Victories, did procure him many a ſad hour; and truly his Vertue ſtood in need of all its Strength to reſiſt his Love. Myrſiles for his particular, was not leſs zealous then Mazares, though he had no ſurety of Doraliſa's Affection; yet, he had this ſatisfaction to know, that though he was not loved, yet no other was; and that, Andramites was hated. In the mean time, after he had with much impatience, long looked for the return of Anacharſis, that Famous Scythian returned, without obtaining any thing from Thomiris, and without Ortalques his being able to get a ſight of Mandana, becauſe ſhe was then more ſtrictly guarded than at the beginning; yet, ſince he ſaw Gelonide, the Princeſs received his Letter, and returned an Anſwer, but the Anſwer was in ſuch a moving ſtrain, as it did more grieve, than comfort him. Ariminta alſo anſwered in a way ſo fit to incite ſadneſs, that Cyrus was much more miſerable after the return of Anacharſis, than he was before. But I pray, (ſaid this grieved Prince, unto that Noble Scythian, after he ſaid he could obtain nothing) what can Thomiris ſay, to colour the War which ſhe brings upon her ſelf, by detaining the Princeſs Mandana? She ſaies, Sir, (replied he,) as much as any can ſay, that will not tell the true Reaſon, why ſhe acts with ſo much Injuſtice. Indeed, ſhe hath publiſhed a Maniſeſto to the People, and in the Courts of both the Scythians, by which ſhe declares, That you Aſpire unto Univerſal Monarchy; and that the Princeſs Mandana is but the pretence to colour your Ambition: And when this fails you, then you will find another; and that's her Reaſon, ſhe will not Reſtore her unto you, ſince it is ſome Security to her ſelf, to have her in her power. After this, She conveens all the People and all the Princes who are ignorant of your Authority, to unite themſelves couragiouſly, and to give a ſtop to your Victories.

Thus Sir, your great Conqueſts giving ſome colour to her Reaſons, this Maniſeſto is doubtleſs very well taken by the People, who ſeeing She is reſolved to make War with you, do begin to think out of their dull Capacities, that now it is not in her Paſſion, which incites her unto theſe Undertakings; ſo that the Maſſagettans ſeem, as if reſolved, to defend her to the very laſt Man. The reſt of the Scythian Kings do Combine againſt you, and not one of them but makes Levies, and joyns with Thomiris againſt you. But, Sir, The worſt I have to tell you is, Ariantes having been in your Army, and being moſt knowing in all paſſages, he conceives, that when you have paſſed over the River Araxes, you cannot get to the Tents Royal, but by ſuch a way, where one File can but paſs at once: So that to give a ſtop to your Paſſage, he hath built a Fort, which is now almoſt finiſhed, purpoſely to defend that Paſs; knowing, that if your Army do take that way of the Plains, it will periſh, by reaſon of the abundance of Waters: So that conceiving you muſt come by that place, which he hath Fortified, he thinks you are not in a condition to do any good; and indeed, Thomiris cares ſo little for Guarding the Paſs over Araxes, that ſhe charged me to tell you, That ſhe will have no Peace, but what Victory will give her; and to make it appear, She has no mind to protract the War; She conſents if you pleaſe, That you ſhall enter into her Country; and in order to that, her Troops ſhall Retreat three daies journey from Araxes: Yes, wiſe Anacharſis (replied Cyrus,) ſince the Maſſagettan Queen will have it ſo, I will enter into her Country; and though the Fort ſhe has erected, be more difficult to take than Babylon was, it ſhall not ſtop my Deſigns. Sir, (replied this Sage Scythian,) Though Thomiris ſeemed to be very high and obſtinate in her Reſolutions, yet I deſpair not but to ſee her change her mind, if the firſt Accidents of this War ſhould ſucceed ill: and, therefore, Sir, diſpair not.

After this, Sir, Ortalques told Cyrus, That one of Mandana's Guard, (who ſaid, He had ſeen Feraulas on the Banks of Phaſes, and had promiſed to acquaint him, with all he knew) had charged him, to tell him, That Thomiris would never have offered to let him paſs over the River Araxes, but to engage him in a Battel, upon an advantagious place; That, ſhe would never have offered it, but in a belief he would not accept it; and that, unleſs he could take that Fort which Ariantes had built, it would be a hard matter to overcome her, or come near the Tents-Royal. But, to take this Fort, ſaid Cyrus, I muſt paſs over the River Araxes, and be perfectly acquainted with the Scituation. Moreover, Sir, replied Artalques, Gelanide charged me to tell you, That Ariantes did what he could, to hinder Thomiris from ſending you word by Anacharſis, That ſhe would let you paſs over the River Araxes, becauſe he ſaid, That it was the worſt that could befal him : But, this Princeſs deſiring no more, but to engage you, Sir, in her Country ; intends, (as Gelonide ſaies) that when you are entred into her Country, to break, or burn your Bridg of Boats, by which you paſſed over the River ; to the end, ſhe might be ſure to have you in her power, if ſhe got the Victory , as ſhe hoped ſhe ſhould, by reaſon of thoſe difficult Paſſes you would be engaged to take ; and that's the reaſon, (as ſhe told me,) why Thomeris does not Advance with her Army, but will ſuffer you to paſs over, and come to ſeek her : She told me further, That Aripites, who is ſtill in Love with that Princeſs, does bring her great Aid : But never was the like Reports heard, as of their unequalled pains which built the Fort, which Ariantes Erected ; and which is called the Fort of Sauromates, becauſe it was the Sauromates which made it ; for, that People being uſed to work in the Mines in their own Country, they can carry, and remove the Earth with ſuch eaſe and haſte, that they will do more work in one Moneth, than others can do in four. Moreover , Gelonide told me, how ſhe had diſcovered, That not long ſince, Arſamones had ſent ſecretly unto Thomiris , and was negotiating ſome buſineſs of great Importance with her. And, Sir, She had told me further, if one had not told her, that Thomiris ſent for her ; and doubtleſs, there had been ſome Combat between ſome Perſons of Note ; for, the Meſſenger from Thomiris to her, ſaid, That there had been ſome diſorder about a Quarrel ; but, ſince he did no further explain himſelf, and ſince I was to leave him, and depart the ſame hour with Anacharſis, I could know no further. But ſince Adonacris doth ſtay a day or two longer, in hopes to work upon Ariantes, you may happily at his return know, whether this great Diſorder will any thing advantage you, Sir, or no : And Anabaris can alſo by him ſend you word, what he can gather from his Friends , for he hath conferred with them, and will ſend their Anſwers by him.

After this, Cyrus deſiring the Advice of all the able Men about him, upon a Buſineſs of ſuch Importance; he held a Council of War, at which he entreated Anacharſis to be preſent: but the Sage Scythian told him, That he would be very ready to execute his Orders, but deſired excuſe from medling in Myſteries of ſo high a Nature. So then, Cyrus Aſſembling Crœſus, Artamas, Mazares, Myrſiles, Intaphernes, Gadates, Gobrias, Indatherſes, and all the reſt who uſed to ſit in Council, he propounded the State of Things unto them. At the firſt, The Plurality of Voices was, That Cyrus ſhould ſend unto Thomiris, to tell her, He was ready to Retreat three days Journey from Araxes, ſo ſhe would her ſelf in Perſon come over in the Head of her Army to meet him, ſo ſhe would bring the Princeſs Mandana with her; and ſo ſhe would promiſe to Reſtore her, if She was Overcome; and ſo ſhe would engage her ſelf to give Battel within three daies after ſhe had paſſed over the River. But, Cyrus not being accuſtomed to go back, and not being able to ſtir a foot further from the place where he was to deliver Mandana, it was evident, that this Propoſition did not pleaſe him; and, he was very glad to ſee, that Crœſus and Mazares were not of that opinion, but of his. And the Truth is, (ſaid he to all the Aſſembly) to go back before a Queen, after our Vanquiſhing ſo many Valiant Kings, were to diſhonour our Army. Moreover, who knows, whether after we have overcome them, they will yield unto us the Fruits of our Victory, though they ſhould promiſe it? And, whether in coming over the River whereof they are Maſters, they will not defend it with the Remnant of their broken Army, and hinder us from delivering Mandana? So that to act prudently, and with Glory both, I conclude it beſt, to accept of the offer which Thomiris makes of letting us paſs over the River Araxes, for paſs we muſt, though ſhe ſhould defend it: But, Sir, (ſaid Indatherſes to him,) The Advice which was given you, does merit very good Conſideration: For, your Army cannot Advance towards Thomiris by the Plains, by reaſon of Water; and to paſs through the Woods where ſhe hath Built a Fort, the Paſs is ſo narrow, that I dare not anſwer for the Event, if you paſs that way with your Army. When we are on the other ſide of the River, replied Cyrus, then will we find out which Paſs is beſt; for, indeed it is to no purpoſe to Capitulate with Thomiris, and to tell her, That if ſhe be Overcome, then ſhe ſhall reſtore Mandana; but if ſhe be, that will follow of it ſelf, and therefore it need not be demanded: And, though I ſhould be beaten, and my Army ſhattered, I would fetch another, and renew the War; and as long as there is a Man left in all the Countries I have Conquer'd, or in the Countries of Ciaxares, or my Fathers, I will ſtill fight for Mandana's Delivery; and, therefore over the River Araxes we muſt paſs ſome way or other. I underſtand this Morning, that Boats, and all things neceſſary to make a Bridg, are ready; and, without ſtaying for any Anſwer from Thomiris, they ſhall begin the Bridg this very day; in the mean time, I will ſend Chriſantes to tell Thomiris, That I will ere long come, and bring my Anſwer my Self, in the Head of my Army.

Cyrus ſpoke this with ſuch a Reſolute Voice, that none durſt oppoſe his Will: So that every one conforming themſelves thereunto; this Prince aſſured them, That his Reſolution would ſucceed happily; and indeed, he made his words good, for he beſtirred himſelf with ſo much diligence, and gave out Orders, with ſo much Judgment, and they were executed, with ſo much quickneſs, that the Bridg over Araxes, ſeemed to be made by Enchantment; for the Boats were brought ſo ſuddenly, and tyed unto one another in ſo ſhort a time, that the Troops of Thomiris did not know the Bridg was made, before the Van-guard of Cyrus his Army was over. 'Tis true, to deceive them, this Prince cauſed ſome Boats to be brought unto a place over againſt them, and began to Work, as if the Bridg was to be made in that place. And whilſt they were amuſing themſelves about this feigned Bridg, Cyrus was making another, much below the other, in a place where on the other ſide there were no Houſes. So that this Bridg being made without any obſtacle, there were two Brigades drawn up in Battalia by break of day on the other ſide of the River, to facilitate the Paſs of the Army, if any oppoſition came: But Cyrus needed not to fear that, for there was ſuch a Terror amongſt the Men of Thomiris, when they knew of certainty that the Army of Cyrus had paſſed the River, as they knew not what to do; yet the Commanders, after they had a little heartened their Men, they forced them to march towards the place where this Army paſſed over: But when they came there, they would not permit them to attempt any thing, for the whole Vanguard of Cyrus being all over, and drawn into Battalia, they were in a good poſture of defence: Yet the Maſſagettans made ſome Skirmiſhes, but they ſucceeded ſo ill, that they were forced to retreat, and ſend Poſt-haſte unthe Tents Royal to acquaint Thomiris with the paſſage of Cyrus over the River.

In the mean while, this Prince having ſpent all the Night and all the Day in paſſing over the reſt of his Army, and had given orders for their Incampment, he reſolved, without giving ſo much time unto Thomiris, as to be acquainted with his Paſſage, to ſend ſome Troops towards her, and himſelf to go in Perſon and view thoſe narrow Paſſes which were ſo much talked of; for knowing that this Princeſs intended to guard the Paſſes, and not advance with her Army, he would ſee whether there were any poſſibility of ſurprizing the Fort of Sauromates, before ſhe had ſtopped the Avenues in the Wood, and before the Fort was finiſhed. So that taking ſome Guides, he went with Mazares, Indatherſes, Araſpes, Aglatidas, Ligdamis, and twelve or fifteen others, to view theſe Paſſes. So that ſetting out at Midnight, and making towards the Fort of Sauromates, he got to the entrance into the Wood by break of day, without any Obſtacle, or fear of any; for conceiving Thomiris to be ſtill at the Tents Royal, where Anacharſis left her, ſhe could not ſo ſoon hear of his Paſſage, or guard the narrow Paſſes which he went to view, ſince ſhe thought him to be on the other ſide of the River.

Thus truſting to his own Prudence and good Fortune, he entred into the Wood, by the conduct of his Guides.

But he was no ſooner got a hundred paces within it, than he heard, upon his left Hand, a noiſe of Horſes. Preſently after, he eſpied the Queen of Maſſagettes on Horſeback in the head of thirty Cavaliers, coming towards him. This ſight ſo ſurprized Cyrus, that in lieu of advancing towards her, his firſt thought was to check his Horſe from going ſo faſt; yet indeed he could not well tell what his Thoughts were at that time. As for Thomiris, as ſoon as ſhe ſpied Cyrus, fury did ſo raiſe her Heart, that ſhe turned fiercely towards thoſe who followed her. Valiant Maſſagettans (ſaid ſhe,and ſhewed them Cyrus with her hand) you would this day end the War, and revenge your Queen, if you could bring into my Fetters that terrible Enemy which I ſhew unto you.

Upon theſe words, thoſe who followed Thomiris, advanced towards Cyrus; and this fair incenſed Queen having that day a Sword hanging in a Chain of Gold, whoſe Buckles were ſet with Diamonds, ſhe drew it fiercely out of the Scabbard, and by a menacing Action made a ſign unto Cyrus, that ſhe thought her ſelf now able to be revenged upon him for his Scorn. On the other ſide this Prince, who out of an Heroique Shame to draw his Sword againſt a Woman, and a Woman who hetofore had loved him, and ſtill did, as angry as ſhe was, he ſeeing her Men coming to aſſault him, and conſidering that if he could get Thomiris into his Power, the War would not be ſo long, ſince Ariantes had not ſo much Power over the People, and ſo conſequently Mandana would be ſooner delivered, he turned towards thoſe who followed him, and after many Incouragements, and charging them not to kill Thomiris, but endeavour to take her, he advanced towards them alſo, and fell on ſo ſharply, that though they were more in number, ſtrenger, yet the firſt ſhock made them believe they had the worſt of the Bargain; and Thomiris ſent one of her Men in all haſte unto Ariantes, who was viewing on the other ſide, to come and help as ſoon as he could. In the mean time, the Fight was fierce, and Cyrus made his way through the firſt rank of his Enemies, and breaking through the reſt, but getting near Thomiris, Fury and Jealouſy together obliged her to draw her Sword. Cyrus, no ſooner ſaw this, but letting the point of his Sword fall, and ſuſpending his Valour: For Heaven's ſake, Madam, (cried he) force me not to uſe my Sword againſt a Queen, whom I would have ſerved were ſhe not unjuſt. Thomiris no ſooner heard theſe words, but ſhe commanded her Men to ceaſe fighting. Cyrus did the like; and both being obeyed, an Object both terrible and glorious was to be ſeen in the Wood, for eight or ten Men might be ſeen dead upon the ſpot, and thoſe who were alive, had ſuch a fierce grimneſs in their Looks, as expreſſed abundance of Terror. As for Cyrus, though there was fierceneſs in his Eyes, and Anger and Fury in his Soul, and had a Sword all bloody in his Hand, yet his Action was ſo full of reſpect, and it was ſo apparent, that his deſire was to deliver Mandana without Ruin unto Thomiris, that there was none but planily ſaw it, and the Generoſity of his Heart. As for Thomiris, ſhe was ſo fair that day, as none but Mandana in the World could come in compariſon with her. This Princeſs was mounted upon a goodly black Horſe, whoſe trapping was pure Gold; the habit of Thomiris was Cloth of Gold, with borders of Green, mixed with Carnation, and it was made after the mode of Pallas when painted armed; her Gown being tacked with Buckles of Diamonds, made her Buskins to be ſeen, which was ſuitable to reſt of her Habit: The Dreſs upon her Head was adorned with precious Stones, and a Carnation white and green Plume did hover over her fair Hair; which waving at the pleaſure of the Wind, did confuſedly mix with the Feathers as ſhe turned her Head, and a thouſand negligent, but lovely Curls, gave a rare luſtre unto her Beauty. Moreover, her Sleeves being turned up, and tacked higher than her Elbows, and ſhe holding the Bridle of her Horſe in one Hand, and her Sword in the other, the faireſt Arms in the World were to be ſeen quite bare. Fury alſo had put ſuch a freſh Carnation upon her Cheeks, that ſhe was now far fairer than ordinary. Alſo her joy to ſee Cyrus, and to find him in ſuch a reſpective poſture towards her, had ſo quelled that Fury which was a little before in her Aſpect, as ſhe ſeemed infinitely amiable and charming. Alſo her hopes of taking him, if Ariantes came ſoon enough to aid her, did fill her full of delight, and moved her to ſpeak leſs ſharply unto him, purpoſely to ſtay him the longer: So that after the Combat was ceaſed, and Cyrus had let fall the point of his Sword, and deſired her not to force him to ruin a Queen whom he deſired to ſerve: This fair Souldier, anſwered him, that ſince it was he who began the War, ſhe might continue it without Injuſtice. The War, Madam, (ſaid he unto her) ſhall quickly end, if you will be pleaſed to deliver the Princeſs Mandana. Doubtleſs (replied ſhe) Mandana will be quickly delivered, if you pleaſe; for provided you will become a Priſoner in her room, I will ingage my ſelf to make Ariantes to deliver her, or elſe I will do it without him. When you have ſent her back into my Camp (replied Cyrus) I do ingage my ſelf to come into yours, Madam, provided Mandana conſent unto it: For I do proteſt, Madam, I would do any thing in the World to procure her Liberty and your Favour. To procure my Favour (anſwered ſhe, and leſſened her Tone) you know that the way is not to be Mandana's Lover: For as long as you are, (added ſhe, and raiſed her Voice again) ſhe ſhall be my Priſoner, and I will be revenged upon her for all the Injuries you did me, in departing out of my Dominions without my Permiſſion. Oh, Madam, (cried out Cyrus) if you keep Mandana Priſoner only to be revenged upon me, I beſeech you deliver her, and I will promiſe you to puniſh my ſelf for the Crime whereof you accuſe me, and of which I cannot repent. At theſe words, Ariantes accidentally appeared with his Troop, though he had no Orders from Thomiris.

This Princeſs ſeeing him before Cyrus did, and not doubting but now Cyrus would be in her Fetters as well as Mandana, ſhe told him, That it was not now a time to talk of Mandana's liberty, but to ſurrender his Sword, and become her Slave. She had no ſooner ſaid theſe words, but Cyrus and all his company ſeeing Ariantes and Andramites coming in the head of fifteen or twenty horſe, then they gave themſelves for loſt. In the mean time, Cyrus ſeeing no delay was expedient, and that he was ſo far from taking Thomiris, that he was himſelf in danger to be taken, he took upon the right hand for fear of being compaſſed about; one paſſage at this Incounter was excellently remarkable, for Cyrus as he parted in an inſtant from Thomiris, it was in his power to have killed her, and he ſaw the thing ſo eaſy to be done, that it was his Vertue only which reſtrained his Arm; he was ſo abſolutely Maſter of her, and himſelf, at this time, that imagining it would be a ſhame for him to kill a Queen, he uſed not the leaſt Action which might raiſe ſuſpicion he had any ſuch thought; but on the contrary, as he left her, Learn, Madam, (ſaid he unto her) by the reſpect I bear unto you, to reſpect the Princeſs Mandana, and do to her what is fit, ſince I do not to you what I could. On the rather ſide, Thomiris, who ſaw that Cyrus, by his reſpect, gave her an opportunity to give him a Blow, did, upon the firſt brunt of her Fury lift up her Arm; but a ſecond thought reſtraining the firſt, ſhe negligently let fall her Sword, and looked whether Ariantes was coming. In the mean time, this Rival unto Cyrus, ſeeing that this Prince, by reaſon of his quickneſs, could not be compaſſed about, he joined his Troop unto that of Thomiris; ſo that now he overnumbered his Enemy by more than half. 'Tis true, his repugnancy to fight againſt a Prince unto whom he was obliged, did ſomthing leſſen his ordinary Valour, and made him fall on more faintly. But Thomiris charging her Men not to kill Cyrus, but to take him, and promiſing great Rewards if they did take him, ſhe did ſo incourage them, that the Conquerour of all Aſia was never ſo neer taking Priſoner ſince he was at the Caſtle of Hermes, as now. But his great Heart being bravely ſeconded by Mazares, Indatherſes, Aglatidas, Ligdamis, Araſpes, Feraulas, and others which followed him, they did ſo cloſely unite themſelves, and kept a Paſs in the Wood where they could not be compaſſed about ſo well, that they ſtood the firſt Charge of Ariantes ſo vigorouſly, ly, as thoſe who would have broken them, were broken themſelves. So that Cyrus falling violently into the Body of his Enemies, he met with Ariantes. As for Thomiris, ſhe only gave Orders, and fought not, ſtill charging her Men continually not to kill Cyrus, but to take him. In the mean time, when this Prince was near enough Ariantes to be heard: O thou perfidious Anaxaris (ſaid he, and fell upon him) reſtore me that Princeſs whom I truſted thee withal. I cannot tell whether Anaxaris will reſtore her unto you (replied that Prince, and warded the Blow which Cyrus made at him) but I am ſure Ariantes will not, though he knows he does you wrong, and is ungrateful. After this, theſe two fierce Enemies talking only with their Hands, the Combat became hot, and if their numbers had been a little more equal than it was, Cyrus had certainly defeated his Rival, as brave as he was. But ſince he ſtill retained his Judgment, he perceived, that if he ſtrive only to vanquiſh Ariantes, himſelf would be overcome by his Men, and fall into the Power of Thomiris: So that after he had very dangerouſly wounded Ariantes in the left Shouldier, and ſeeing there was no way but to retreat, he diſingaged himſelf from amidſt his Enemies, and rallying his Men together, he ſtill retreated fighting, and ſo bravely, that his Followers began to faint upon it: For ſince Ariantes, by reaſon of his Wound, did not follow, and ſince Thomiris would not follow any further for fear of an Ambuſcado, Cyrus, by his Wiſdom and rare Valour, made good his Retreat, with the loſs only of three Cavaliers. In his return he perceived that he had received a ſlight wound in his right Side. So that ſeeing no more Enemies to fight with, he haſted his March that he might be dreſſed, and came very happily to his Camp, where he was expected with much impatience, and ſo he left Thomiris in moſt inſufferable deſpair.

ARTAMENES, OR THE
GRAND CYRUS.

Part IX. Book III.

AS ſoon as Cyrus was come unto his Tent, he altered the Orders which he had given Chriſantes of going to Thomiris; and he took a ſhort account of the ſtate of things whilſt his Chirurgeons were ſent for, and gave his Orders for every thing in ſo ſhort a time, that he had nothing to do when they came, but to ſearch his Wound; which they found to be very ſlight, and without any danger: But yet they told Cyrus, that it was abſolutely neceſſary for him to keep his Bed two days, and to be ſeven or eight before he ventured on Horſe-back, becauſe his Wound being near his Hip, it could not cloſe in a ſhort time, unleſs he gave it reſt; adding, that if he did not take that courſe, it would be in danger of a Gangreen, and make him much worſe. At the firſt, Cyrus would not obey them, thinking ſeven or eight Days, as ſo many Ages; for he knew, that as long as he could not ſtir, his Army could not attempt any thing. Yet at laſt, conſidering that their Advice in ſuch things was to be followed, he obeyed them; yet he had ſcarce reſted himſelf two hours, but Adonacris, who ſtaid in the Tents-Royal after Anacharſis returned, and came to give an accompt of his Voyage: Truth is, Cyrus was not hugely haſty to ask him News, conſidering the Tempers he had left Thomiris and Ariantes in: However, he had a deſire to know what made him ſo ſoon quit the Tents-Royal, and what moved Thomiris and Ariantes to go into the Woods where he met them, for he knew they could not have any intelligence of his paſſing over Araxes. So that as ſoon as Adonacris came to him; I do not ask you generous Adonacris (ſaid he unto him) how you have prevailed with Ariantes; for having talked with him when he had a Sword in his Hand, I know what anſwer he made you: But I ask you, what moved Thomiris to come into the Wood on this ſide the Fort of Sauromates? Sir, (replied Adonacris) to ſatisfy your Curioſity, I muſt tell you of many important Paſſages; and therefore though my Negotiation proved ineffectual, yet I beſeech you give me leave to acquaint you with what I have done, to the end you may better underſtand what I have to acquaint you withal: I ſhall tell you then, Sir, ſince your ſilence ſeems to give conſent, that true it is, I have not prevailed with Ariantes; yet moſt certain it is, that once I ſaw his Mind ſtagger, and when I remembred him of all his Obligations to you, I found in him as much Shame as Love. Yes, my dear Adonacris (ſaid he then unto me, when I preſſed him very earneſtly) all that you tell me is moſt true, and I muſt confeſs that Anaxaris is a baſe ungrateful and perfidious Man, ſuch a one as Cyrus has reaſon to hate, and that he is equally unworthy, both of the Friendſhip of Cyrus, and of Mandana's Love. But Adonacris, though Ariantes had a deſire to repair the Fault of Anaxaris, that it would be in vain if he ſhould attempt it; for Mandana is ſo little in his diſpoſe, that Thomiris will hardly ſuffer him to ſee her, and therefore he is far from any Ability of rendring her unto Cyrus: Therefore, ſince I ſhould repent in vain, becauſe I cannot releaſe her if I would, I had better not repent at all: Alſo I am perſwaded, that I ſhould ere long repent that ever I repented: And therefore, I beſeech you do what you can to make my Rival hate me without Scorn, and endeavour to leſſen the Greatneſs of my Crime, by inſtancing the Greatneſs of my Love.

After this, Sir, I redoubled my Reaſons and my Prayers, and I dare aſſure you my Affection at that time made me ſay much more than a more able Man than my ſelf could have imagined at that time, and upon this Occaſion. But as I was with this Prince, one came from Thomiris, to acquaint him, that the Prince Phraartes going to ſee the Works at the Fort of Sauromates, did meet with a Stranger and fought with him, and that he was mortally Wounded as well as his Enemy: So that Phraartes being high in the eſteem of Thomiris, ſhe no ſooner heard in what condition he was, but ſhe went from the Tents-Royal unto the Fort of Sauromates, where they had carried him, becauſe he fought neer that place: So that ſetting out about two hours after Anacharſis, and carrying the Prince Ariantes and Andramites with her, I followed them, hoping that my Importunity might happily work with Ariantes.

Thus I came with them as far as the Fort of Sauromates, where we were no ſooner arrived, but Thomiris and Ariantes went to viſit Phraartes, whom they found at the laſt Gaſp, yet having his Intellects perfect, he deſired to ſpeak with them in private, and ſo he did for half an hour: After which, he growing Speechleſs, they left him; but it was very obſervable, that as ſoon as they had talked with Phraartes, they conſulted a long time together, the Mind of Ariantes ſeeming to be diſpleaſed at ſomething. After this, Thomiris left him, and went to ſee him whom Phraartes had fought with, whom they brought into the ſame place. So that it is to be imagined this unknown Man was ſome very conſiderable Perſon: However, I could not know any more of him; all I can tell you is, they are both dead, and the ſame Honours were done unto them. But, Sir, to end my Relation, Ariantes and Thomiris having a Deſign to ingage you amongſt thoſe narrow Paſſes which are in the Woods about the Fort of the Sauromates, went to view them, and to ſee where they ſhould place their Men, in caſe you came over Araxes. But ſince it would be too much to view them all in one day, if they went together, Thomiris and Ariantes took ſeveral Ways into the Woods to view theſe Paſſes, not knowing that you had paſſed the River; and thoſe who watched the River, thinking her to be at the Tents-Royal, it's probable they ſent their intelligence thither; and I can aſſure you they knew nothing of it at the Fort of Sauromates, until the return of Thomiris and Ariantes. In the mean time, though Ariantes was wounded, he would needs ſend News of it unto the Tents-Royal, where the Body of the Army lay, but he would not let me ſpeak with him: So that I returned to you, Sir, very ſorry I was not able to do you any better ſervice, no more then the Friends of Anabaris, who have all promiſed me to let ſlip no opportunity which Fortune ſhall preſent unto them, to endeavour the Liberty of Mandana. When Adonacris had pronounced theſe Words, one came and told Cyrus, that the Man to whom he ſpake unto near Araxes, when he returned from ſeeing Oneſile, asked very earneſtly to ſpeak with him. So that Cyrus thinking it to be the ſame Man whom he ſent to the King of Pontus, to tell him it was better fighting on his ſide, than for the Raviſher of Mandana, he commanded him to enter. So Adonacris being retired, and this Man entred, Cyrus asked him, What he had to ſay from the King his Maſter? Sir (anſwered he, and ſighed) I beſeech you pardon me that I cannot conceal my Sorrows for the Death of a Prince who was your Rival; but what he hath commanded me to tell you, will perhaps render me excuſeable, and oblige you to lament the Misfortune of ſo great a Prince. How (cryed out Cyrus) Is the King of Pontus dead? Yes, Sir, replied he, and died with Thoughts very contrary to the Prince who gave him his Death. This is ſuch a wonder to me (replied Cyrus) that you muſt relate the Accident with all its Circumſtances before you can make me believe it. Which to do, Sir (anſwered the Man) I muſt tell you, that after I left you, I went over the River at the next paſſage, and I was ſo happy, that the next Morning I met with the King my Maſter, who ſtayed at the firſt Houſe to get a Horſe. But, Sir, though I told him all that you charged me withal, and though he was much moved at it, yet he continued his Journey three days after; and being told, that the way through the Wood was the neareſt way to go unto the place where the Army was, he took it, and went unto the Fort of the Sauromates, where enquiring of news in general, he underſtood that Phraartes (whom he knew at Cumes) was in the Tents-Royal; and he heard further, that he was to come that very ſame day unto the place where we were. I cannot tell you, Sir, the Thoughts of this much to be lamented Prince upon this occaſion: Ah, Fortune, Fortune, cried he out, thou art too fully reſolved to perſecute me, and my conſtancy muſt ſubmit, muſt I be overwhelmed with ſo many Diſgraces all at once? I love, Heavens knows, and I am not beloved; I have loſt two Kingdoms, and my Enemies poſſeſs them; I am obliged unto the Rival who is preferred before me; I do infinitely eſteem that Princeſs who prefers him, and him alſo as much as ſhe doth: I do hate Ariantes, both as my Rival, as the Raviſher of Mandana, and as my Vanquiſher; yet for all this, I am reſolved to fight for him, rather than for Cyrus, and to compleat all my Miſeries, I do find the Raviſher of Ariminta in this Court: Will Honour ſuffer thee to ſee a Prince that ſtole away thy Siſter, and not be revenged for that Affront? No, no, ſince thou art not capable of any ill, but what Love forced thee to commit, thou canſt never be excuſed if thou doſt.

After this, Sir, this great Prince was ſilent, and making Signs unto me that he would be alone, I retired. But as chance would have it, next to the Tent where I was, there happened to be two Strangers, whoſe Language was not unknown unto me, for I had been ſo long in Pontus and Bythinia, that I very well underſtood the Language which they ſpoke, it being the ſame. I heard theſe two then ſpeak aloud, becauſe they did not think I did underſtand them; and one of them told the other, that Arſamones would be extreamly glad to get Ariminta into his Power, and that he doubted not but that the Princeſſes which he would give as Hoſtages, would ſhortly bring it to paſs. 'Tis true, replied the other, Arſamones would perhaps be glad, but Spitridates would be ſorry if he knew it; and I cannot tell whether it be Wiſdom or no in us thus blindly to ſerve Arſamones in all his Violences, and when the Prince his Son comes to raign, he will make us repent it. After this, Sir, theſe two Men changing place, I could not hear any more what they ſaid: However, I thought it fit to let my Maſter know what I heard, and therefore went to tell him, and he having a longing deſire to know more, and not doubting but thoſe I heard talk were his Subjects, he reſolved to ſhew himſelf unto them: And indeed without more conſulting with himſelf, he went out of his Tent, and went to the place where theſe Men were, who were ſo amazed at the ſight of him, that though they ſaw him in a condition far different from what they had formerly ſeen him, yet now they trembled, and were infinitely reſpective to him: He knowing their Thoughts by their Actions, took advantage of the diſorder in their Spirits, and ſpoke with ſuch Majeſty, that he obliged them to tell him what they did in that place: So as he underſtood by them that Arſamones (who heard Phraartes went towards the Maſſagettes) had ſent unto Thomiris, and offered her a very conſiderabe diverſion of Ciaxares by a powerful aſſaulting him, and by raiſing a Party in Aſſyria, provided ſhe would put Ariminta into her Power, ingaging himſelf alſo to let her marry Phraartes, and offered her for Security of this Treaty, to put the Princeſs his Daughter, and the Princeſs his Neice into his Power, upon condition ſhe would promiſe alſo, that if ever Spitridates came into her power, during the Wars ſhe had with Cyrus, ſhe would put him unto his. After this, theſe two Men who were of Heraclea, told him, that Thomiris accepted of the offer, and Phraartes accepted and conſented unto it alſo, thinking he was more ſure to marry Ariminta in the Court of Arſamones, than in the Court of Thomiris: Theſe Men alſo added, That they came into that Country and ſtayed in it, to keep things in the ſame condition they are, and that ere long the Princeſs of Bithynia, and the Princeſs Iſtrina would arrive. Then they ſaid that they came to ſee this Fort out of Curioſity only, and they underſtood that Phraartes would be there alſo that day. And indeed, Sir, theſe Subjects unto the King of Pontus told him as much as he deſired to know, and when they told him that Phraartes was gone to view the Works without, the King of Pontus charged theſe two Men not to tell what he was, and charged them with as much Authority as if he were upon the Throne: Afterwards he took Horſe, none knowing his Deſign. But, Sir, not to trouble you with too many Impertinencies, he went to the place where they ſaid Phraartes was, yet he did not ſhew himſelf at firſt unto him; but as ſoon as he ſpied him, he galloped a little into the Wood, and gave me a Letter in which he had written ſomething, which he charged me to give Phraartes who was looking upon the Workmen; but not to tell him whom he was: I in obedience to my Maſter carried the Letter, Phraartes read it, then asked me in a low Voice who ſent it, and where he was? Sir, (ſaid I unto him) he is within two hundred Paces of this place, but as for his name he hath charged me not to tell it, and I dare not diſobey him.

After this, Phraartes being brave, and his Valour a little queſtioned, he ſtood no longer in asking the name of him who deſired to ſee him with a Sword in his Hand, but thought of contenting this unknown Man who demanded Satisfaction for a Wrong; and imagining (as he ſaid afterwards) that perhaps it was Spitridates, he would not any longer defer the giving him his deſired Satisfaction: So that ſending away all his Men upon ſeveral Pretences, and after he had ſent me back to tell my Maſter that he would be with him preſently; he followed me within a quarter of an hour after, and came to the place where I appointed, without any other Company but one Page only, and without other Arms than a Sword: For my Maſter, as I underſtood ſince, did ſend him word, that a Sword only ſhould decide their Difference. But, Sir, he wondred much when he came to the place where his Enemy was, and knew him not: but this wonder was quickly vaniſhed by the entrance of another; for as ſoon as the King of Pontus ſaw him, he drew his Sword, and advancing towards him: 'Tis now a fit time to tell you (ſaid he unto him) that I am the Princeſs Ariminta's Brother, and am able to hinder you from putting her into the Hands of the Uſurper of my Kingdoms. If you be the ſame you ſay (replied Phraartes, and drew his Sword) you need not complain againſt a Prince who would take Ariminta from Spitridates, whom you love not. 'Tis true, I love him not (replied he) but I do eſteem him, which is more than you do. To be a Raviſher away of Mandana, as you are, (replied Phraartes in a ſurley manner) you are very ſenſible of her carrying away. At theſe words, the King of Pontus, without any anſwer, advanced towards him with incredible Fury and Valour: Phraartes on his ſide he fought like a Man that was ſorry to fight againſt the Brother of his Miſtreſs; yet his Valour being a little clowniſh, as they who knew him ſaid, he fought with the King of Pontus with as much Animoſity, as if he had been his Rival: For my part, I was forced to be a Spectator of the Combate, for Phraartes having but one Page with him, I could do no otherwiſe. But, Sir, after a long and ſharp Diſpute, and both mortally wounded in ſeveral places, the King of Pontus ran Phraartes through the Body, ſo that he fell from his Horſe, and let his Sword fall, which the King of Pontus lighting in an inſtant, ſeized upon.

Thus was he the Vanquiſher of Phraartes; but he no ſooner ſaw himſelf victorious, but he fell alſo within four Paces of his Enemy: So that I being forced to make uſe of the Conquered's Page to help the Conqueror, I ſent him to acquaint them in the Fort with this Accident. So that many People coming in, they carried theſe two wounded Perſons into the Fort of the Sauromates, and ſent to acquaint Thomiris and Ariantes with the paſſage. In the mean time, though a Chyrurgion ſaid my Maſters Wounds were mortal as well as Phraartes, yet I told not who he was, leſt they ſhould arreſt me, and haſten his Death by that Violence. But when Thomiris and Ariantes came, I underſtood that Phraartes told them, and deſi red them to promiſe they would hold on the Treaty with Arſamones, to the end that Ariminta being once in his Power, ſhe might never marry Spitridates. But, Sir, as ſoon as Phraartes had made this unjuſt deſire unto Thomiris and Ariantes, he loſt his Speech, and a little after his Life. In the mean time, Thomiris knowing from Phraartes the Quality of my Maſter, ſhe came to ſee him, followed only by one Man of Quality, called Andramites: As for Ariantes, it is to be imagined, that he would not viſit his Rival: But, Sir, this miſerable Prince, into whoſe Mind the Approaches of Death had infuſed more juſt Thoughts both of you, Sir, and Mandana, he uſed ſuch moving Arguments to oblige that Queen to reſtore the Princeſs unto you, Sir, and to perſwade Ariantes unto a Repentance of his Violence, that ſhould I relate them to you, Sir, you would be charmed with his Vertue: yet for all this, I plainly ſee, Sir, that Thomiris will not be perſwaded; nor ſtayed ſhe long with him, but though an Enemy, yet ſhe promiſed to have a care of him. I have ſo ſmall a ſhare in Life (ſaid he unto her) that I will not ask you, Madam, any thing for my ſelf; no not ſo much as a Tomb, for I do not deſire to eternize the Memory of my Miſeries. But, Madam, (ſaid he, and ſighed) I beg all things of you for Mandana: After this, Thomiris going out, without any direct anſwer, and this miſerable King perceiving he could not live long, commanded me to let the Princeſs Mandana know, as ſoon as I could, that he repented of his Violence to her, though he could never repent of loving her, and conjured her, not to hate his Memory. As for you, Sir, he charged me to tell you, that he was extreamly ſorry he died ungrateful, and that he could not chuſe but die your Rival; and deſired you to have a care of the Princeſs Ariminta; alſo to tell you, that he would die the Friend of Spitridates, and commanded me to tell him as much. After this, Sir, his reaſon beginning to rove, he ſpent the whole Night in talking continually of Mandana, but without any cauſe or moving thereunto; afterwards growing weak upon a ſudden, he died about break of Day; and thus both Conquered and Con queror died almoſt at one minuit: and after their Deaths they received the ſame Honours by order from Thomiris.

In the mean time, that Princeſs being upon the place, ſhe would needs go and view the Woods about the Fort, before ſhe returned: And in the mean time, and whilſt you, Sir, was fighting with Ariantes, a Servant unto Andramites, whom he had left there upon ſome buſineſs, came and addreſſed himſelf unto me out of Curioſity to know who it was I ſo much grieved for his Death: For, Sir, I forgot to tell you, that Thomiris did not publiſh his Quality after his Death, and I imagine her reaſon for it was, becauſe the news of the King of Pontus his Death ſhould not be carried unto the Princeſs his Siſter, before ſhe returned to the Tents-Royal: But, Sir, as ſoon as this Servant unto Andramites had accoſted me, we knew each other, and remembred that we bore Arms together at the Siege of Epheſus, when the Prince Artamas, went under the name of Cleander: So that embracing each other with Joy, we began to relate our Adventures, and to renew our old Friendſhip which formerly was very great: But to tie the knot more faſt between us; he imparted unto me his Intentions of ſerving you, Sir, and I told him alſo who was my Maſter, and what he had charged me to tell you, upon his Death-Bed: So that encouraging each other in our Intentions of repairing the Faults he had committed againſt you, and of doing you ſome conſiderable Service, we walked together about the Fort; and obſerved that at the place which is not yet finiſhed, it is ſo eaſily to be ſurprized, that with five hundred Men only, one may become Maſter of it: So then wiſhing earneſtly that you had paſſed over the River Araxes, to attempt this Enterprize, we thought our Wiſhes had been in vain, becauſe we then knew not that you had already paſſed it. But, Sir, when Thomiris and Ariantes returned wounded, we quickly underſtood that you were nearer than we imagined. So that now this Servant of Andramites and I, looking upon this buſineſs as a thing very feaſable, we carefully examined the matter again; and to facilitate our Deſign, Thomiris and Ari- nates departing, Andramites, as good luck was, did leave this Servant in the Fort, by orders from Ariantes, with Orders to come and acquaint them when it was finiſhed: and he left him there alſo as a Surveyor over the Workmen; for this Man the better to further his Deſign, had ſo inſinuated with his Maſter, that he made him believe he had ſerved the Prince of Cumes, in the Fortifications of his Town, and that he underſtood the Art of it as well as any Man: Then, Sir, after the departure of Thomiris and Ariantes, this Man and I conſidering the Scituation and preſent Condition of the Place; we reſolved, that I ſhould come, and acquaint you, how, if you would be pleaſed to ſend five hundred Men ſpeedily, by ſuch a way as a Guide I have provided will ſhew you, you may preſently become Maſter of it: But, Sir, this muſt be done preſently; for, it is reported, that as ſoon as Thomiris is returned to the Tents Royal, and hath taken all Orders for the Security of the Princeſs Mandana, and for the departure of Ariminta, whom ſhe will ſend unto Arſamones, as ſoon as the two Hoſtage-Princes are come, ſhe will then return with her whole Army, to make good the Paſſes which he hath viewed, and to ingage you to Fight in a place which will be very diſadvantagious to you. Therefore, Sir, haſte muſt be made, and no greater Number muſt be imployed, than I mentioned, leſt the Fort ſhould have Intelligence. You tell me ſo many ſtrange things at once, (ſaid Cyrus) that I know not which to anſwer firſt; yet, I muſt tell you, that I do much lament the pittiful Fate of the Pontean King; I do commend your Fidelity to him, and I will recompence your Zeal to me.

After this, Cyrus enquiring of him the true State of the Place; he found him talk ſo pertinently, that he ſaw, there was great probability of doing ſome good in the Deſign, ſo it were ſpeedily executed; and, he ſent for Mazares and Indatherſes, only to confer with them about it, having no mind to impart it unto a Council of War, leſt it ſhould be known. So having broke it unto them, and told them, That he thought it worth the hazard of five hundred Men, they concurred with him in Opinion: So that Cyrus making choice of Feraulas for this bold Attempt, he ſent for him; and afterwards, he called out the Troops which he was to Command, and giving him all neceſſary Inſtructions, it was reſolved, He ſhould ſet out in the beginning of the Night, and when he was near the Fort, to make a Sign by Fire, which would Advertiſe the Servant of Andramites of their being there; and he, according to agreement, would anſwer them by another, and let them preciſely know the place, where they were to Surprize the Fort; and in order to all theſe Reſolutions, thoſe Troops which Cyrus made choice of to be under the Command of Feraulas, departed in the beginning of the Night, guided by the Man whom the King of Pontus his Servant had provided. But, after they were gone, Cyrus began with leaſure to conſider, the lamantable Death of the Pontean King; and to deplore the Misfortune of a Prince, whom Fate had ſtrangely perſecuted all his Life long. Afterwards, calling to memory the Death of the Aſſyrian King; he was full of Compaſſion for theſe two Illuſtrious Rivals, as he was of Amity to Mazares. So that contracting all the hatred he ever bore unto them againſt Ariantes, he hated him alone, as much as ever he did them all together; yet, it was ſuch a hatred as was accompanied with eſteem, for all the High Acts he had done at Sardis, and at Cumes: But, the greateſt grief of Cyrus was, That he was not to ſtir yet, for ſome certain days; but in the mean time, he gave Orders for every thing, and ſaw all thoſe who had any thing to ſay unto him: 'Tis true, the deſire he had to hear the ſucceſs of this Enterprize, did take up much of his Mind, ſo as it was not entirely at liberty; yet, he talked unto all his Friends, as if his Soul had no extraordinary Cares upon it; and to inquire very obligingly of all their Intereſts: He asked Artamas how Palmis did; Aglatidas of Ameſtris; and Ligdamis of Cleonice: But as for Intaphernes, he would never acquaint him with the Treaty between Arſamones and Thomiris, becauſe it ſhould not grieve him: And, he Commanded all the Officers whoſe Quarters were near Araxes, that if they met with any Cavalry conducting ducting Ladies, that they ſhould uſe them reſpectfully, and bring them to his Camp: Truth is, Intaphernes was not long in this Ignoranae; for being one Morning at that Bridg of Boats which Cyrus had made over Araxes, to view ſome Troops paſs which were newly come, and which Ciaxaras had ſent unto Cyrus; he eſpied the Prince Atergatis, and as ſoon as ever he ſaw him, he went to him; and, without lighting from his Horſe, becauſe the place would not permit it, they ſhaked hands, and confirmed their Friendſhip: But having many queſtions to ask each other, they went further from the Preſs; and Intaphernes finding much Melancholy in the Eyes of his Friend, his Heart began to fear, and, he had a great mind to ask, how the Princeſs of Bithynia did, but he durſt not; yet, being able to hold no longer: Well my dear Atergatis (ſaid he unto him,) Are you Baniſhed from Arſamones, for doing me any good Offices unto the Princeſs his Danghter? Alas, alas, (replied Atergatis and ſighed,) You would much wonder, did you know the cauſe of my Journey; and you would both wonder and grieve, if you knew that the Princeſs of Bithynia, and the Princeſs Iſtrina, are either now in the power of Thomiris, or will be very ſhortly; and that the Princeſs Ariminta will be ſhortly in the power of Arſamones. How's this, (cried out Intaphernes,) Can there be any truth in this you tell me? For Heavens ſake tell me, How comes this ſad Adventure to paſs? After this, Atergatis told him, as much as Cyrus knew concerniug it; to wit, the Treaty between Thomiris and Arſamones. But, (ſaid Intaphernes unto him,) How could you ſuffer ſuch an unjuſt thing without oppoſition? Had I known it, I ſhould have thwarted it, replied Atergatis, but Arſamones did negotiate the Buſineſs ſo ſecretly, as all was concluded, before I knew any thing; and, to prevent any obſtacle in the departure of the Princeſſes, he ſent me to Heraclea, whilſt he ſhipped them for Chriſipalis, to ſend them unto Thomiris. But, as ſoon, as the Princeſſes knew their Deſign, they were ſo ſad at it, that moving the Heart of one in the Ship to pity them, he promiſed to come and acquaint me, as ſoon as the Ship came to Land; and, the next Morning the Ship came aſhore, becauſe the Princeſs of Bithynia deſired to ſend, and offer a Sacrifice at a Temple which was by the Sea ſide; and, this Man came then out of the Ship, and never returned, but came immediatly to me, and acquainted me in few words, with all the paſſages: So, that conceiving I could not poſſibly overtake the Princeſſes, nor ought to return unto Arſamones, nor ſtay about that buſineſs he had imployed me; I came in all haſte unto you, and about three days March ſince, I met theſe Troops with whom I came: But in my way, I underſtood, that the Princeſſes are carried by a way far off, to the end they might ſhun the Camp of Cyrus, when they paſſed over Araxes.

Intaphernes hearing this ſad News, was all ſorrow: But at laſt, he told Atergatis, That hoping well in the Valour of Cyrus, who in delivering Mandana, would deliver theſe Princeſſes alſo; he prepared to carry him into his Tent, after he had ſent to advertiſe him of his Intentions. So, as Cyrus not being ignorant of his Name and Quality, nor of his Merit and Adventures, nor of the Friendſhip which was between Intaphernes and him, he received him with all poſſible civility: But, when Intaphernes would have acquainted him with the Treaty which Arſamones had made, he ſtopped him, and ſaid, He was not ignorant of, but kept it ſecret, becauſe he deſired to ſave him ſome Sighs; adding, That as ſoon as ever he heard of it, he gave order to all his Officers, That if they met with any Ladies, to reſpect them, and bring them to his Camp. After which, theſe two Lovers being both ſatisfied with rhe Cares of Cyrus, they thanked him with equal civility: Atergatis for his particular, did it with ſo good a grace, that Cyrus ſaw, he merited that excellent Character, which he who related his Hiſtory had given of him. But, to begin their Friendſhip by a confidence, they condoled their Miſfortunes together; and, Cyrus made ſuch a pathetical Abridgment of all his Miſeries unto theſe two Lovers, that he ſuſpended their ſorrows for his own, becauſe they found his caſe worſe than their own. For, truly, (ſaid he unto them,) You have no Rivals, who hold your Miſtreſſes Captive; and, Thomiris hath no Intereſt to treat them Ill: But, as for Mandana, ſhe is under the power of a Lover, and under the power of a Queen, who thinks ſhe has reaſon to hold her from me. In the mean time, Cyrus underſtanding more preciſely the way which theſe two Princeſſes would take, in coming from Bithynia, he commanded ſeveral Parties to ſcout about the River Araxes, as far as there was any hopes of meeting with them; or at leaſt, the Princeſs Ariminta, whom Thomiris was to ſend unto Arſamones, when the other Princeſſes came unto her; and he imagined, that ſhe would ſend her with the ſame Convoy, and by the ſame way. So that, Intaphernes and Atergatis having a great deſire to go themſelves in Perſon, Cyrus conſidering their Intereſt, permitted them, telling them moſt obligingly, That he was very ſorry he could not go himſelf, and help them to deliver their Princeſs, as he hoped they would help him to Deliver Mandana. In the mean time, Anarcharſis being Charmed with the Vertue of Cyrus, did viſit him very often, telling every one he ſpoke unto, that hitherto he had learned to talk of Wiſdom, but by the Actions of Cyrus, he would learn to practiſe it. This Prince alſo for his part did find ſuch a real ſincerity in the Converſation of this Sage Scythian, as did infinitely pleaſe him; and ſuch a Grandure of thought, as did much move his inclination. Alſo, the Diſcourſe of Anacharſis did much help to drive away his Melancholy and Sorrows, that he was not able to act, and made him expect with much leſs impatiency the ſucceſs of his Enterprize. But at laſt, better News came, than he durſt hope for; and that Guard of Mandana's, who was become Andramites Servant alſo, who had plotted the buſineſs, came to beg his Pardon, and told Cyrus, that his Enterprize was effected, and that he was Maſter of the Fort; and to particularize this great Attempt, he told him, that Feraulas conducted by the King of Pontus's man, did march ſo faſt, and happily, that thoſe within the Fort had not the leaſt knowledg of his coming, and that the Sign by Fire was ſo well given, and taken, and the Aſſault ſo ſurprized the Garriſon, that they were damped with Fear, and cut in Pieces.

Moreover, that Feraulas after he was Maſter of the Place, had ſo encouraged the Workmen, and promiſed ſuch great Recompences unto them, if they finiſhed the Work, that thoſe Men having heard of Cyrus, and his liberality, did fall on Work, and promiſed to finiſh it within two days. This great and good News, infuſed as much Joy into this Prince, as if he had been in a condition to Advance with all his Army. But, beſides that his Wounds would not give him leave, another Accident fell out, which hindred him from thinking of it; which was, That the River Araxes, by reaſon of great Winds which toſſed the Water, had broken his Bridg, and the Current of the River was ſo impetuous, that moſt of the Boats were broken, and ſhattered in pieces one againſt another. So, that ſince the Army of Cyrus could get no ſubſiſtance but from the other ſide of the River; his whole care was to repair the Bridg, that he might ſend over Victual and Ammunition to his Army: All they could do, the Bridg being broken, was to ſend over every day, as much as thoſe Boats which remained could carry, to make them ſubſiſt. Thus Cyeus was of neceſſity forced to wait, and attempt nothing till he could get on Horſeback, and until the Bridg was made up again; and alſo, till Victual and Ammunition neceſſary for his March was paſſed over. In the mean time, he took incredible pains to repair the Bridg; and ſent him, who brought the News of the Fort being taken, to tell Feraulas, that if he were aſſaulted, to defend himſelf, in hopes of a ſpeedy Relief: But after he had kept his Bed four days, the Chyrurgions permitted him to riſe, ſo he would not go out of his Tent for four or five days more. So that being one Morning with Mazares, Artamas, and Myrſiles, one came to tell him, That the Prince Intaphernes, and the Prince Atergatis were coming, and that they brought ſome Ladies with them. This News did extreamly ſurprize Cyrus, yet, upon better thoughts, he imagined, that perhaps they had met with their Princeſſes, and got them out of the hands of thoſe, who would have carried them unto Thomiris: So, that hearing thoſe two Princeſſes, deſired leave to bring thoſe two Ladies unto him, he was well contented. But this Prince was much ſurprized when Intaphernes and Atergates brought in the Princeſſes, Ariminta and Heſionide, in lieu of the Princeſs of Bithynia and Iſtrina, whom he expected. 'Tis true, he ſaw her ſo ſad, that thinking ſhe knew of the King her Brother's Death, he durſt not expreſs any Joys, nor begin to treat her as Queen; and, beginning to think that Mandana had loſt a great Comfort, in loſing the company of this Princeſs, he could not retain his firſt Joys of ſeeing her, but, he let her ſee by his Eyes, that he would perform all he had promiſed: Yet, this Princeſs having as much judgment as Spirit, did think Cyrus would be much troubled to tell her of the King her Brother's Death, ſhe reſolved to ſpeak unto him firſt; and indeed, ſhe was no ſooner come into his Tent, at the entrance into which he received her, but, beginning to ſpeak firſt: Give me leave to tell you, Sir, (ſaid ſhe unto him) in juſtification of that ſorrow which ſits upon my Cheeks, that though I have reaſon to rejoice in my Liberty, and at the honour of ſeeing you, yet my Brother's Death is the cauſe of my Sorrow; and to juſtifie his Memory, I muſt acquaint you, how I underſtand from Thomiris, that he repented of all his Violences unto the Princeſs Mandana; and though he have perhaps merited no pity from you, yet, he has merited your permiſſion to let me lament him. I have done it my ſelf, Madam, (replied Cyrus) and have extreamly pitied the ſad deſtiny of ſo great a Prince; and I thank the Gods with all my Heart, that though he hath been my Rival and my Enemy, yet that you, Madam, cannot charge me with his Death: And I aſſure you, Madam, that if I could revive him, though with the ſame Love unto the Princeſs Mandana, yet I ſhould joyfully do it to ceaſe your Sorrows, and ſtop your Tears. But, Madam, (ſaid he, being forced by the violence of his Love) Why did you not bring the Princeſs Mandana with you? That I might have been obliged unto the Prince Intaphernes, and the Prince Atergatis for delivering her, as I am for ſetting you at liberty. Alas, Sir, (replied ſhe) I need not anſwer this Queſtion; but after I have commended your Generoſity in lamenting the Death of your Enemy, I muſt tell you, that the Princeſs Mandana is now guarded with ſo much exactneſs, that there is no delivering her but by the overthrow of Thomiris; yet ſhe is waited upon with much reſpect, and ſhe knows ſo well how to make her Raviſhers fear her, that the Prince Ariantes trembles as oft as he comes near her, and ſpeaks unto her as humbly as if ſhe were not in his Power. But, Sir, (purſued ſhe) the news of taking the Fort of Sauromates hath extreamly amazed the Queen of Maſſagittes, and if the Prince Ariantes had not been wounded, it had been ere now beſieged; but that Prince being unable to act, by reaſon of his Wounds, I believe the Deſign is deferred for ſome certain days: After this, Sir, I muſt needs (maugre my Sorrow) tell you of the Prince Intaphernes, and the Prince Atergatis their Generoſity, who knowing that thoſe who conducted me were carrying me unto Arſamones (a mortal Enemy unto the King my Brother) did fight them, and brought me unto you, Sir. When you know them well, replied Cyrus, you will find that you are more obliged unto them, then you imagine; for as you are a Debtor unto them for your Liberty, ſo are you unto the Prince Atergatis, for the liberty of Spitridates. When one hath done no more than what was their Duty to be done (replied that Prince) there is no Obligations owing; and by the ſame reaſon (added Intaphernes) I do declare, that ſince I have done no more than what I ought to have done, I cannot pretend unto any right of Obligation. However it be (ſaid Cyrus) you will give us leave to think what we pleaſe. But, Madam, (added he) I can ſtay no longer before I tell you, that we expect the Prince Spitridates his being here very ſhortly. Do you know, Sir, replied Ariminta, (and both bluſh'd and ſigh'd) where that unfortunate Prince is? I do not directly know in what place he is, Madam (replied Cyrus) I know he will arrive here ere long, and that he was at a Port in Cholcides, when the Prince Tigranes did write unto the Princeſs Oneſile, and ſo I know he will ere long have the happineſs of ſeeing you. After this, Sir, Cyrus asked Intaphernes and Atergatis, in what place they met this Princeſs? And after they anſwered, that they found her as ſhe was paſſing over the River, he asked Ariminta whether the two Princeſſes which Arſamones gave as Hoſtages unto Thomiris, were come or no? To which ſhe anſwered, as ſhe had before Intaphernes and Atergatis, that they arrived the day before ſhe came away, and that ſhe was extreamly ſorry ſhe could not obtain ſo much leave as to ſee the Princeſs of Bithynia, whom ſhe had long loved. After this, Cyrus told her, that though the unfortunate King her Brother had only left her the Title of a Queen, yet he would treat her as Queen in poſſeſſion of thoſe two Kingdoms which he had loſt: For, Madam, (ſaid he unto her) I know that the Prince Spitridates will reſtore them to you, and I am ſure he will never enjoy the Uſurpation of Arſamones; but as ſoon as he comes here, will treat you as Queen of Pontus, though his Father poſſeſs the Kingdom. And, Madam, if it be the pleaſure of Fortune that I ſhall deliver Mandana, Arſamones ſhall render Juſtice unto ſuch as it is due unto. Ariminta charmed with the civility of Cyrus, did anſwer him with as much Generoſity and Spirit, and with as much Sorrow as Generoſity.

After which, Cyrus ordered that ſhe ſhould be waited upon unto a ſtately Tent, and to ſtay there until Boats were ready to convey her unto the Town where Oneſile was, where ſhe might be more conveniently and ſafe. At the firſt, though Ariminta did infinitely eſteem that Princeſs, yet when it was propoſed to be with her, ſhe could hardly conſent unto it, becauſe ſhe was Siſter-in-Law unto Phraartes; but Cyrus ſatisfying her that this Princeſs did highly condemn the violence of Phraartes, and that Tigranes was a dear Friend unto Spitridates, and a great Enemy unto his Brother for carrying her away, ſhe was well contented to be with her: Alſo ſhe ſeeing but two ways to chuſe, either to ſtay in an Army, or to ſtay with a moſt virtuous Princeſs, ſhe quickly reſolved with her ſelf, and was conducted by Chriſantes unto her the day following: Cyrus firſt ſending to acquaint Oneſile with the King of Pontus his Death, and with the Death of Phraartes, alſo with the arrival of Ariminta, to the end ſhe might know how ſhe ought to receive her.

The meeting of theſe two Princeſſes was very tender, and they ſpoke ſo excellently unto each other, as it was moſt evident they had both of them as much Judgment as Spirit, and as much Virtue as Judgment. In the mean time, the Bridg being repaired, and Cyrus being ready to go out of his Tent, he reſolved to paſs over with all poſſible ſpeed all ſuch Proviſions as were requiſite during his march, and to diſencamp as ſoon as they were over, giving ſeveral orders for a continual ſupply of ſubſiſtance for his Army. So that being to depart within two days, he reſolved to employ one of them upon a viſit unto the Queen of Pontus, and to bid adieu unto the Princeſs of Armenia. Since Cyrus loved the company of Anacharſis very well, he obliged him unto this viſit with him. So that Cyrus ſetting out betimes in the Morning, accompanied with that renowned Scythian, Indatherſes, Araſpes, Ligdamis, Aglatidas, Meneſiphilss, and Cherſias, it was early when he arrived. Since Ariminta was in Mourning, and moreover ſince he would treat her as a Queen, he went firſt unto her, and afterwards unto the Princeſs Oneſile. But he took no notice at his entrance, that Anacharſis did not follow him, but ſtayed at the bottom of the Stairs with a Stranger : 'Tis true, as ſoon as he was in Ariminta's Chamber, he miſſed him, and and asked for him : But Cherſias telling him that he ſtayed with a Man who ſeemed to have much Buſineſs with him, he went on with his Viſit, and did ingage himſelf ſo deep in talk of Mandana with Ariminta, that he forgot Anacharſis ; for ſince ſhe had ſo lately ſeen his Princeſs, he could talk of nothing elſe ; and it was ſo great a Pleaſure to him to talk with one who had ſo lately ſeen and ſpoke with her, that he never thought of his going unto Oneſile : yet at laſt he left her, and went unto the Princeſs of Armenia, and in paſſing from one Chamber to another, he ſaw a Man of a handſom Preſence who ſeemed to be a Grecian, walking in the outer Camber with Anacharſis, and who no ſooner ſaw Meneſiphiles, but he came unto him ; yet Cyrus being near Oneſile's Chamber, he entred without ſtaying, his Mind being ſo full of Mandana, that he would not interrupt his own Thoughts by asking Anacharſis why he did not follow him: But when he was in the midſt of Oneſiles outer Chamber, Anacharſis overtook him, and beſeeched him to let a Friend of Solons, of Meneſiphiles, and his (whoſe name was Silamis) have the honour to kiſs his Hand: So that Cyrus ſtaying, and the Grecian being near him, he ſaluted him very civilly, and told him, That ſince it was impoſſible to be a Friend unto ſo many rare Men, unleſs himſelf were excellently accompliſhed, he was very deſirous to be acquainted with him. After which asking him what was the cauſe of his Voyage? Silamis anſwered, That having ſeveral Reaſons to be abſent from Athens, he reſolved for Aſia, and to come unto Artaxates to ſee Oneſile, unto whom he had the honour to be allied: And Solon having obliged him to ſee Anacharſis, who he knew came unto Aſia with Meneſiphiles, Diocles, and Cherſias, and to tell him from Solon, that he had good reaſon to ſay, as heretofore he did, when he compoſed his Laws; and he was very glad to hear from the Princeſs of Armenia, that this Sage Scythian was in the Army. Did I not fear, ſaid Cyrus, that I make this Princeſs ſtay too long, I ſhould entreat you to tell me what it was which Anacharſis ſaid unto Solon; for certainly ſince he thinks it worthy of his Memory ſo long, it is ſomething that is worthy the knowing. It is ſo, Sir, (replied Silamis) And ſince he ſaid it, all the World makes uſe of it, when they talk upon the ſame ſubject. What I then ſaid was yet ſo ſimple, replied Anacharſis, that it does not deſerve the honour of remembrance. Since the Princeſs of Armenia is a Lady of an admirable Wit, replied Cyrus, and began to walk, ſhe ſhall be Judg, and I will entreat Salamis to tell it in her Preſence: And indeed after Cyrus had ſaluted that Princeſs, after he had preſented Anacharſis unto her, and told her of Silamis, whom ſhe ſaid came the day before, he beſeeched her to judg whether Solon and all the accompliſhed Men of Athens, had reaſon to remember ſome words which Anacharſis had ſpoken unto that wiſe Legiſlator when he was at that famous City. The Athenians (replied One- ſile) have a Reputation of ſuch excellent Wit, as it is to be believed, that whatſoever they think worthy of remembrance, certainly does merit to be ſo by all the World.

After this, Cyrus turning towards Anacharſis, preſſed him to tell what it was he ſaid to Solon. Truly, Sir, ſaid he unto him, what I then ſaid unto him, ſeemed then ſo unreaſonable, that there muſt needs happen ſome great change before he could change his Opinion. Such a change hath happened at Athens, replied Silamis, that you need not wonder he ſhould change his Opinion, and that he ſhould ſee that you knew better than he did the Nature of the People, whom he pretended to govern by the ſole Authority of his Laws. Truth is, Sir, replied Anacharſis then, that ſeeing what the Manners of the Athenians were, and alſo conſidering all the Men in general, I thought it ſtrange, that a Man ſo wiſe as Solon, who well enough knew the Impetuoſity of all Paſſions which diſorder the Lives of Men, and who alſo knew how audacious and ſtupid the Multitude is, that he ſhould pretend to eſtabliſh Order amongſt ſo great a People, and to make Concord and Virtue raign amonſt them only by his Laws: So that when he alledged unto me his Laws, as Remedies againſt all the Evils of his Countrey. Ah Solon (ſaid I, and looked earneſtly upon him) Laws are but ingenious Nets which catch the little Flies, and let the great ones eſcape, being eaſily broken by force: So that I do foreſee by all the certain Conjectures that Science can give, that weak ones only obſerve Laws, and ſtrong ones break them, and at laſt bring them unto ſuch a contemptible condition as they are kept by none, unleſs the Law of Arms, and Fear compel them to be obſerved more than Juſtice can. I wonder not at all, ſaid Cyrus, that theſe words ſhould be remembred, and as for my part I ſhall never forget them. Doubtleſs, ſaid the Princeſs Oneſile, they are moſt worthy to be remembred, and the more, replied Silamis, becauſe the event doth ſhew that Anacharſis was in the right: For truely the Laws of Solon were very ill obſerved in his Abſence, and ſince his return, things are grown into ſuch diſorder, that Piſiſtrates, who was only a Citizen of Athens, is at this day the Maſter of it. Then is he not the Friend of Solon (replied Anacharſis?) Pardon me, Sir, (replied Silamis) But I cannot tell whether Solon be his or no, though he ſee him ſometimes, and give him counſel. This ſeems to me, replied Oneſile, very ſtrange News, that Athens ſhould not be free. And to me more ſtrange (replied Cyrus) that Piſiſtrates ſhould ſubject it: For when I knew him at Athens, he was of ſuch an Humour, that I could not think him a Man ſo much applied unto Buſineſs, as to bring about ſo great a Deſign; for when I ſaw him, he was wholly devoted unto Pleaſures. 'Tis true, I ſtayed but a while at Athens, and ſo am not able to judg rightly of him. Sir (replied Silamis) Piſiſtrates cannot be ſo eaſily known as another Man may, for certainly it may moſt truly be ſaid of him, that he is three or four ſeveral different Men. However, though thoſe who are moſt zealous for Liberty do call him the Tyrant of Athens, yet I muſt needs affirm him to be a Man of as much merit as any in the World; and ſince the Commonwealth hath loſt her Liberty, it is advantagious unto it, to be ſubject unto Piſiſtrates, whoſe Life is ſuch a miſcellaneous Myſtery, that one may make ſeveral Relations of him, all true, and yet not reſemble one another: For he who will relate only the Actions of his Valour, will give an Idea of Valour it ſelf: To report all his Intrigues and Factions he hath been in, is to make a diſcription of a turbulent, unquiet, and ambitious Man: To relate his Sweetneſs, his Sincerity, his Generoſity, his Liberality, and his Magnificence, is to make the Picture of a true Man of Honour; and to tell of his Loves and Gallantries, is to make a model of a moſt pleaſing Lover, and great Gallant.

This Character of Piſiſtrates, replied Oneſile, fills me full of Curioſity to know all his Adventures. Silamis is ſo well acquainted with them, replied Meneſiphiles, that he knows them as well as Piſiſtrates himſelf. Since ſo (ſaid Cyrus) I ſhall entreat him, as he deſires me to be his Friend, ſo that he will relate it unto the Princeſs of Armenia:

mnia. Sir, ſince Fame long ſince did wholly devote me yours, replied Silamis, you may command me any thing. Since I uſe only Entreaties to my Friends, anſwered Cyrus, I ſhall not command you, but I ſhall entreat you in the name of the Armenian Princeſs, to relate the Life of Piſiſtrates. But ſince it is likely that the wiſe Anacharſis would think his time ill ſpent, in hearing a Hiſtory of Love, I will adviſe him to go and viſit the Queen of Pontus.

At firſt Anacharſis would not go, ſaying, That whatſoever was worthy the ear of Cyrus, was worthy to be hearkened unto by all the World. But Silamis having given him a Letter from Solon which he longed to read again, becauſe he read it haſtily before, he was not ſorry for having that pretence of going out. So that obeying Cyrus, he retired. And as ſoon as he was gone, Oneſile ſolicited Silamis to keep his Word, and Cyrus preſſing him alſo, he prepared himſelf to ſatisfy their Curioſities: And after he had a while recollected his Memory, and digeſted into a method what he was to ſay, he began his Relation in this manner, ſpeaking unto Oneſile by the order of Cyrus.

The Hiſtory of Piſiſtrates.

SInce I know, Madam, that I ſpeak unto one who does not only know the paſſages of that Countrey where ſhe lives, but alſo knows as much as is requiſite for any great Princeſs, I ſhall omit many things in my relation which I ſhould have inſerted, had I ſpoken unto a Perſon ignorant in the Affairs of Greece. Alſo ſince it is the Hiſtory of Piſiſtrates which I am to relate, and not the Hiſtory of Athens, I need not inſiſt long upon the General Affairs of our Commonwealth, but ſhall only ſay what is pertinent unto Piſiſtrates. But, Madam, ſince Noble Birth is a great advantage when Virtue adorns it with its Luſtre, I muſt tell you, that his is as worthy of him, as he is of them from whom he is deſcended, for he comes from the right Line of one of the Sons of Ajax called Philaeus, who was a Citizen of Athens

thens with his Brother named Euriſaces, who gave the Iſle of Salamine unto the Athenians. And I can aſſure you, that his Heart is higher than his Birth, and there are few Men in all Greece of greater Qualities than he. As for his Perſon, it did infinitely pleaſe, and he had all the Features of a ſweet Face : 'Tis true, his Noſe was a little of the biggeſt, and raiſed in the middle, but no more than was an Ornament ; and certain it is, one could not have a more Noble and finer Ayr than Piſiſtrates had, eſpecially when he was not in his negligent Garb, or on one of thoſe days when he was ſo different from himſelf, that one could hardly know him ; and then, when he was in one of thoſe melancholy and ſluggiſh Humours, he would not be only negligent in his Habit, but alſo ſeemed to be another Man, his Hair which was fair ſeemed brown, and not curled ; his Making which was handſom, was leſs pleaſing, and there was ſuch a ſtrange Careleſneſs in every part of his Perſon, as one would have ſaid his Spirit was no more in his Body, than he was Piſiſtrates. But on one of thoſe days when he was himſelf, a Man of a more high Carriage, and more noble and ſweet Ayr, could not be ſeen. Moreover, Madam, he was not only wont to be different from himſelf, at ſome certain Times and Days, but alſo his very Heart was full of Contrarieties, and oppoſite Inclinations ; for he would be merry, and he would be melancholy, and he was of a hot Temper, though he loved Idleneſs. Moreover, it muſt needs be ſaid in his Commendations, that he had Wit in abundance, a Wit in faſhion, a cultivated Wit ; but it muſt be ſaid alſo, that though he was of a ſluggiſh Humour, yet he was the moſt active Man alive, when the Fancy took him, for he was able to turn the whole courſe of his Life, to ſleep when he ſhould wake, and to wake when he ſhould ſleep, yet naturally he loved Reſt ; and when he took it, he took it with more Tranquility than another ; yet this love of Reſt was no hinderance, but he could eaſily throw himſelf into the tumult of buſineſs, and he had ſuch a delicate and ſharp Spirit, that he could not endure the Government of any one, but would be continually complaining againſt thoſe who had the Adminiſtration of Affairs whatſoever they were: So that though he had the Publick-good for his Object, and though his own Intentions were very good, yet ſometimes he would act as if they were not, and be converſant with ſuch as were the moſt turbulent Fellows in the Commonwealth: Yet for all this, he loved all manner of Pleaſures, not only thoſe of a high and noble Strain, but alſo the moſt ruſtique and childiſh: It pleaſed him extreamly to ſee Shepherds dance after a Shawm, under a Shadow in a green Meadow; he would play for Pins with a Boy, and rather than fail, divert himſelf with the meaneſt things. Moreover, Cuſtom was ſo prevalent with him, that ſometimes it held the place of Reaſon, Merit and Beauty: And indeed, he did ſo accuſtom himſelf unto the places where he dwelt, to the Streets he walked, to the Houſes he went unto, to the Porters who opened the Gates, to the Slaves he met, and to the Perſons he did viſit, more than ever any Man did accuſtom himſelf: And this Cuſtom was ſo ſtrong in him, that ſome ugly Eyes which he hath accuſtomed himſelf to look upon, hath pleaſed him better than the faireſt Eyes in the World which he ſeldom ſees, and is out of the Quarters he uſes to inhabit; yet ſometimes he would be very variable in his Pleaſures; ſometimes Limning would be his predominate Fancy, and he did nothing elſe but go from Painter to Painter, from Cloſet to Cloſet, and to diſcourſe of that Art: Otherwhiles Muſick would have its turn, and he would wholly devote himſelf unto Harmony; another while Dancing was all his Fancy, and his imagination was filled with Balls and Meetings: Then again, he would be in Love with Books, and Poetry was his Miſtreſs, and he had ſuch an excellent Memory, that he was able to quote all that was excellent in any Author he had read.

Thus paſſing from one Paſſion to another, Solon told him one day merrily, in chiding him for his Inconſtancy, that he had loved all the Muſes one after another, even from Melpomene unto Pterſichore. Moreover, Madam, Piſiſtratis was not only a Lover of Verſe, but alſo he compoſed them moſt excellently and gallantly, Solon himſelf applauded him; but the moſt commendable Quality in Piſiſtrates was, that he was as good, as zealous, and as faithful a Friend as ever any could be, he was magnificent and liberal, he was brave and generous; and though he was more ambitous than he thought himſelf, yet he had an unintereſted Soul; and the greateſt Fault that could be laid in the diſh of Piſiſtrates was, that he was too much wedded to his own Opinions, and to believe too eaſily, that whatſoever he thought, would happen as he did imagine it. Moreover, Piſiſtrates had one Quality which I forgot to mention, which was, that when he was accuſtomed unto any one, Abſence could never unaccuſtom him; and though he had not ſeen one of his Friends fot ten years, yet whenſoever Fortune brought them together, he would ſpeak to them with as much Familiarity, as if he had ſeen them every day, and would talk of things paſt, as if he could not live without them; yet for all this, he could be long without ſeeing or ſorrowing for them: So I think, that I had reaſon to ſay at the beginning of my Diſcourſe, that there was a hundred things in his humour and way, which ſeemed to be incomparable. And yet for all that, he was a moſt excellent compleat Man: and I am confident, Madam, that after this deſcription of Piſiſtrates, you will wonder he ſhould ever think of making himſelf Lord of Athens, ſince it is not likely a Man ſo much devoted to Pleaſures, of an unbyaſſed Soul, one who loved Solon ſo well, ſhould ever dream of uſurping Soveraign Authority. But, Madam, when I have related his Adventures, you will wonder much more, and admire how one Heart could contain ſo much Ambition and ſo much Love. I ſhall not trouble you, Madam, with relating the Beginnings of Piſiſtrates his Life, though they were with much Glory; for he did ſignalize himſelf at the Enterprize of Salamine, and did many other Noble Acts: But let me in few words tell you, that at ſeventeen years of Age his Father forced him to marry, and within three years after his Wife died.

This Marriage being made by force without Love, and only an act of Obedience unto his Father, no Paſſages ſages happed whilſt it laſted worthy to be related unto you. But, Madam, after he had ſacrificed his Liberty this firſt time unto his Family, he would ſacrifice it unto himſelf the ſecond time, as you ſhall know by the ſequel of the Story; yet it's fit you know, that his Mother and Solon's being near Couſins, he received the Sapient Documents of this famous Man even from his very Cradle, yet this was no hinderance unto his matter of Gallantry: For, beſides that Solon was no Enemy unto Love, he affected and deſired that the Youth of Athens might more ſet their Minds upon matters of Gallantry, than matters of Ambition, and it would more conduce to the Liberty of his Country: For truly (ſaid he one day unto Thales when he was in our City) as long as Piſiſtrates, and all the reſt of his volley are Slaves unto our Beauties, they will never think of making us theirs. So that, Madam, Piſiſtrates being naturally gallant, and not being reſtrained from it any manner of way, no not by the Counſels of a Man whom he thought (and with reaſon) to be Soveraignly wiſe, he devoted himſelf wholly unto Pleaſures, and laid hold upon every occaſion of diverting both himſelf and others: 'Tis true, there were ſome that ſaid, that at that time he thought upon making himſelf Lord of Athens, and that he carried it ſo only to colour his Deſigns: But Piſiſtrates himſelf ſaid, that Fortune brought him to that height he was by her own Fancy, without any long Premeditation. However it were, Piſiſtrates was no ſooner abſolute Maſter of himſelf, but he ſeemed to think upon nothing but paſſing away his time merrily; and certainly he was in a place the fitteſt in the World for it: For, Madam, though commonly the Courts of great Kings are more proper for great Diverſions, than Republiques are, becauſe the Palaces of Princes do more invite Men of admirable Parts, than they can be in a place where the Power is divided; yet I aſſure you, Athens was then in ſo high a Luſtre, that there were few places in the World where one could more fully divert themſelves: For beſides, that the Buſineſs of whole Greece was done at Athens, which cauſed a huge concourſe of Strangers, there was alſo by a favourable Conſtellation abundance of moſt lovely Women, and ſo many Wits of both Sexes at that time, as if the Gods had ſent them all at once to honour our Country: Alſo Peace and Tranquillity looked as if it would laſt for ever. The Laws of Solon were then religiouſly obſerved, though there happened ſome diſorder in his Abſence; Peace, Plenty and Abundance flouriſhed then in Athens more than in any place of the World; yet the Cylonian Conſpiracy, which made ſuch a Ring in the World, had yet left ſome Sparks in the Embers, and ſerved for a pretence of all our Diviſions: Not that by reaſon of all the paſt Diviſions there was not any Diſpoſition to any new ones in the Minds of moſt Men; but ſince it was lately ſince the firſt Diſorders were appeaſed, there was ſo great a Calm in appearance, as put all thoſe who loved Quietneſs in hopes that it would laſt long: So that now nothing was feared but that ſleeping Peace would ruſt us: But amongſt the Youngſters of higheſt Rank, Piſiſtrates was the moſt conſiderable: Lycurgus and Theocrites who were Men of the firſt Form, and Sons unto one called Ariſtolas, were alſo in high eſteem, though of different Humours; and there was another, whoſe name was Ariſton, who was infinitely pleaſing. As for the Ladies, amongſt that Multitude of Ornaments unto our City, Cleorante, who was Daughter unto a Man very conſiderable in Athens called Megacles, held the firſt Rank as well as Corinthe, Daughter unto Philombrotus and Euridamia, the Kinſwoman of Solon. But, Madam, I beſeech you, give me leave to let you know them according to the Order, as Piſiſtrates came to know them; and in order to that, I muſt tell you, that though our City was under the Protection of Minerva, yet ſhe held Ceres in particular Veneration; and indeed, ſhe had a very famous Temple in Athens; and every year there was celebrated two Feaſts unto her Honour, which we called Theſmophoria, where Women are the principal Actors of the Ceremony: For beſides ſeveral other Auſterities, they would watch nine Nights together in the Temple of this Goddeſs; and in honour of Ceres, they would there be dreſſed as if they were going to a Ball: So that this Temple ple being very beautiful and enlightened with a thouſand Lamps, it was a moſt glorious ſight to view theſe Ladies when they watched nine Nights until after Midnight; and there was not a Man of any Quality but he was there; Men of Age came only to honour the Goddeſs, and the young Men came more in Devotion to the Ladies than to Ceres. One of theſe Nights then, Piſiſtrates, unto whom I was a piece of a Friend, made a motion to go thither, and I having nothing elſe to do, went with him: Piſiſtrates then had no particular Engagement upon him more than I had. But as ſoon as we had placed our ſelves by chance, more than out of any affected Choice, the lovely Cerinthe, Daughter of Philombrotus, who followed her Mother, came and ſat next us, and was ſo very pleaſant, that though ſhe ſpoke not unto us, yet ſhe ſeemed by the Air wherewith ſhe received our ſalute, that ſhe was not ſorry we were ſo near her: For, Madam, you muſt know, there was not any Perſon in the World who had ſuch ſignificant Actions as ſhe; and indeed with a Wink of her Eye, a Nod of her Head, or Sign with her Hand, ſhe could commend or diſpraiſe, and make others underſtand a thouſand ſeveral things. Moreover, Cerinthe though brown and little, yet ſhe was infinitely amiable, all the Features of her Face were delicate and fair, her Cheeks freſh, her Eyes quick, her Air ſprightly and pleaſant, and, for her bigneſs, Majeſtical; her Phyſiognomy did not deceive one, ſhe had Wit in abundance, and was infinitely merry.

She being ſuch a Piece as I have deſcribed, you may imagine, Madam, that we were not ill placed, ſince next her: But her Mother being a mighty preciſe piece of Auſterity, as ſoon as we began to ſay ſomething concerning our good Fortune, ſhe impoſed ſilence, and ſaid nothing; but it was in ſuch an obliging manner, though ſhe ſpoke only in the language of her Eyes, that yet we eaſily perceived, if ſhe had not ſtood more in fear of her Mother than the Goddeſs, ſhe would have gladly anſwered us. Thus this firſt ſight of her being paſſed, Piſiſtrates and I retired, murmuring much againſt the Mother of Cerinthe; for we knew well enough, that but for her, we ſhould have had ſome diſcourſe during the intervals of the Ceremony: However, though Cerinthe was very fair in the Eyes of Piſiſtrates, yet he never ſo much as thought upon her the next day, nor went he unto the Temple.

But the third day going thither alone, and betimes, he chanced to ſit next Cerinthe again, though not in the ſame place where he ſaw her firſt, and to his happineſs her Mother was not then with her, but there was with her a Kinſwoman which was not of ſo Puritanical a Temper. Piſiſtrates no ſooner ſaw her next him, but coming very reſpectfully to her Ear: You did ſo cruelly forbid me, Madam, the other day to expreſs my Joys of being near you (ſaid he unto her) that I cannot tell whether you permit it now. It is ſo great a Happineſs (replied ſhe) to be in a Multitude, and ſit next a Man of excellent Parts, that I believe Ceres will pardon me if I ſhould imploy one minute in receiving your Civilities unto me. A minute, Madam, is ſo very little (replied he) that if you allow me no more, I ſhall be but ill ſatisfied. Should you ſpend a whole day here (replied ſhe, and ſmiled) perhaps you would think Minutes very long. Yet, Madam, I find ſomething in your Eyes (replied he) which makes me think I could ſpend my whole Life here with much delight. Fie Piſiſtrates (ſaid ſhe, turning her Head aſide, and impoſing ſilence upon him with her Hand) I will not hear you any longer. Yet Cerinthe was not ſo good as her word, for ſhe ſtill liſtned from time to time unto what Piſiſtrates ſaid: 'Tis true, ſhe did not anſwer, but ſtill charged him to be ſilent. But, Madam, from that Night Piſiſtrates did accuſtom himſelf to ſee Cerinthe, and did it with abundance of care as long as the nine days Ceremony laſted: So that at the end of this Feaſt they were grown intimate Friends. Piſiſtrates was extreamly vexed, that as long as this Ceremony laſted, Ladies received no Viſits: So that as great a deſire as he had to ſee Cerinthe at her own Houſe, he muſt wait until the nine Days were paſt. But as ſoon as they were over, Piſiſtrates went unto the Wife of Philombrotus, who received him very well, and deſired that her Daughter ſhould alſo receive him with much Civility, lity, for ſhe knew that her Husband was deſirous to get ſuch Friends as Piſiſtrates.

Cerinthe being of a very merry Compoſition, and naturally loved Raillery, Piſiſtrates and ſhe fell into great familiarity the firſt Viſit. And ſince ſeveral ſerious Perſons came in, who took up the Mother of Cerinthe, Piſiſtrates talked much more freely than he had done, if the Company had been more general; he engaged himſelf into no diſcourſe but with her, not that he thought himſelf in love with her, nor indeed was he very much, but the truth is, he had that kind of amorous accuſtomancy towards her, of which I told you before he was apt for; and ſhe had towards him that firſt favourable inclination which is often ſeconded with a violent Paſſion: So that Piſiſtrates being that day in one of his merry Fits, and Cerinthe being (as uſually ſhe was) frolickſom, they were not weary of one another.

At firſt they diſcourſed of all they had ſeen in the Temple during the nine days Feaſt: Of ſuch Lovers as were wrong placed in being far from thoſe they loved; or of ſome jealous Husband which they had ſeen, who had never been there but to ſee who was with their Wives. So that after many an innocent Satyr, and many a pleaſant Deſcription, Piſiſtrates upon a ſuddain interupted Cerinthe, and ſaid unto her, I pray, Madam, after you have talked of every one you have ſeen in the Temple of Ceres nine days together, why do you not ſpeak one word of me? I profeſs, Piſiſtrates, ſaid ſhe, and ſmiled,you are the ſtrangeſt Man in the World to ask ſuch a Queſtion; for what can I ſay of you, but that you very ill obeyed me when I did forbid you talking? and you were the leaſt devout in all the Aſſembly. All this is true, Madam, (replied he) but this is not all you can ſay of me; for I am confident, that as you ſaw ſome Lovers who could not ſit next their Miſtreſſes, and ſome Husbands looking who were with their Wives, ſo you ſaw as well, that you were already very deep in my Heart. I do proteſt unto you, ſaid ſhe, and laughed, I did not ſo much as ſee my ſelf in your Eyes. It was not long of me, Madam, replied Piſiſtrates, for I looked in yours as much as poſſibly I could, and endeavoured to let you ſee in mine, that I did you Juſtice, and thought you far fairer than all I could ſee beſides. Your eyes, Sir, replied ſhe, may tell Lies, as well as your Tongue can flatter: And to puniſh you, (added ſhe, and laughed) I could almoſt wiſh all you ſay were true, and that you were deeply in Love with me, for I have, had a long curioſity to ſee a Man really in Love. O, Madam, ſaid he unto her, certainly you are not ſincere, for it is impoſſible but that you have ſeen many Lovers, ſince you are neither blind nor inviſible: But to ſpeak in your own terms, I am the moſt miſtaken Man alive, if your curioſity be not quickly ſatisfied; for if I be not yet in love with you, yet I dare ſwear that it wants ſo little of it, that two looks more will fully do it. Do not think, Sir, ſaid ſhe, being excellent at Raillery, that when I ſay I long to ſee a Lover, I mean ſuch Lovers as ſay they are in Love, but are not, for I have no deſire to ſee ſuch a one: But on the contrary, I mean ſuch a Lover as is able to do all that the moſt violent Paſſion in the World can make one do. What do you mean, Madam, ſaid he? I mean, ſaid ſhe, that he ſhould (if occaſion preſent it ſelf) kill himſelf, throw himſelf down a Precipice, and poiſon himſelf for very deſpair. But, Madam, replied Piſiſtrates, I pray tell me which one of theſe three Teſtimonies of Love would you have a Man give you, if you ſhould make him in Love? For, ſaid he, and laughed, a Man cannot kill himſelf, throw himſelf down a Precipice, and poiſon himſelf all at once: But, Madam, to tell you truly, added he, me-thinks I ſee too much Joy in your Eyes, to deſire any ſuch tragical Teſtimonies as theſe: And I am the moſt miſtaken Man in the World, if you would not take more delight in ſome Muſique which a Lover ſhould preſent unto you, than in ſeeing him kill himſelf; and therefore, Madam, be pleaſed to make an ingenuous Confeſſion, that you do not deſire any ſuch ſad Signs of Love; for I muſt needs confeſs, that I take ſuch infinite pleaſure in ſeeing you, as if you ſhould require it, I ſhould not obey you. Truly, Piſiſtrates, ſaid ſhe, not Sincerity does pleaſe me; yet I muſt tell you, that then you muſt be no other than my Friend, for if I ſhould wiſh you my Lover, I ſhould wiſh you alſo to be ſuch a one as I mean; to wit, Pale, Sober, Grave and Melancholy, ſometimes Unquiet, Diſordered, and Reſerved; and indeed to be the moſt miſerable Man in the World: I would not have you one of thoſe who can play with a Feather, and divert themſelves at every thing. However, Madam, ſaid Piſiſtratus, I beſeech you receive me as your Lover, and afterwards I will try if I can become conformable to your Deſires. But, Madam, you muſt not think I can grow Pale, Lean, Sober and Melancholy in four and twenty Hours. No, no, Sir, ſaid ſhe, and laughed, I am not ſo unreaſonable, I will allow you fifteen days to fall in love with me, and fifteen days more after that to become ſuch a pittiful Lover as I deſire out of curioſity to ſee; for ſince I am none of thoſe great Beauties who wound in an inſtant, you will ſtand in need of this time to become only a little reſerved: But if at the expiration of this month which I allow you, added ſhe, you are not become the moſt pitiful puling Lover in the World, you muſt give me leave to think you will never be ſuch a one: But, Madam, ſaid he unto her, ſince it does depend wholly upon you whether I muſt be happy or miſerable, it is not in me to promiſe whether I ſhall, or ſhall not be ſo; but I am able to ingage my ſelf, to be more in Love with you than ever any was; and to be ſincere with you, if my Love ſhould encreaſe as it hath done this laſt quarter of an hour, I ſhall not need half fifteen Days to become the moſt paſſionate Lover upon Earth. Seriouſly, Piſiſtrates, (ſaid ſhe unto him) I ſhould be very angry, if you ſpeak truly; for to diſcover the very bottom of my Heart unto you, I care not for ſuch real Lovers, as for ſuch as think they are ſo and are not, and yet make much more noiſe of it than thoſe who really are: for I think it does reflect much upon a Woman's Honour, to admit of ſuch a croud of Adorers, as many muſt vainly do. Yet methinks, Madam, (replied Piſiſtrates) it is an Honour to reign ſoveraignly over the Hearts of ſo many Men. I do aſſure you, Sir, much leſs than you do imagine (replied Cerinthe) for to tell you truly, I am confident, that when one is young, and not altogether ugly, one may, with a very mean Merit, ſo they have any Handſomneſs, make themſelves followed, and get a Troop of moſt aſſiduous Lovers: ſince certainly that is not any effect of great Beauty or Wit; but depends only upon ſome certain petty affected Indulgencies, and a kind of Air which is moſt fit to attract, which makes Men ſeem more than Friends, and dare not ſee ſuch Women without applauding their Sweetneſs: On the contrary, I dare affirm, that without this attractive Behaviour, the faireſt Perſon in the World, and the moſt charming, ſhall never have this multitude of Lovers: So that ſince I think, many Lovers are no Effects or Arguments of extraordinary Merit in ſuch as have them, but rather of their weakneſs; I ſhould be very ſorry to have any ſuch: And though I tell you I long to have one, yet I had much rather never ſee him, than to be perpetually importuned with ſuch Complaints, as I can never ſatisfy: and I am ſo afraid to meet with any ſuch, that I dare not make my ſelf any Friends, leſt they ſhould afterwards change the nature of Friendſhip into Love at laſt. For ought I ſee, Madam, (replied Piſiſtrates) my Deſtiny is changed in a ſhort time, ſince within this quarter of an hour, you deſire to ſee a Lover, and now forbid me being your Friend. I aſſure you, Sir, (ſaid ſhe, and laughed) I think my ſelf ſo happy to have no Acquaintance, that I think it would be a very ill Office to make me alter my Opinion. For my part, Madam, (replied Piſiſtrates) I ſhall not oppoſe your Humour, of having no Friends, and of not affecting to have an infinite number of Lovers; but I muſt confeſs I cannot endure that you ſhould not entertain one, or that I ſhould not be that one.

As Cerinthe was ready to reply, thoſe Ladies who were talking with her Mother, being gone, their Diſcourſe was interrupted. Yet Cerinthe being of a merry Nature, and one that loved Raillery, ſhe knew ſo well how to carry the matter, without ſaying either yea or no, unto Piſiſtrates, that he continued ſeeing her with much delight; for he was ſo deeply in love with Cerinthe, that he took a greater pleaſure in talking with her, than in any other in the World; yet not ſo far as to have all the inquietudes of a violent Paſſion, but on the contrary, was always much joyed; for he ſaw Cerinthe every day, who chuſing him for her Companion in Raillery, made him the gladdeſt Men alive, by her thouſand pleaſant Conceits, which ſhe told him upon ſeveral Subjects. But, Madam, that you may the better underſtand what did moſt contribute unto their Diverſions a long time, be pleaſed to know, that Theocrites, of whom I ſpoke before, who was ſecond Son unto Ariſtolas, was extreamly in love alſo with Cerinthe, but in ſuch a manner, as made her extreamly merry, and acquaint Piſiſtrates with a hundred of her Conceits. Not but that Theocrites was very handſome, and had Spirit enough: but being naturally of a grave, ſage and ſerious Temper, he talked of Love, as if he were upon ſome politique Negotiation, and he loved as if he were in Print. Indeed, Madam, he was one of thoſe Lovers, who would ask a Pardon if he did but ſigh a little too loud; you may imagine that ſuch a Man was ſport enough to Cerinthe. In the mean time, as frolique as ſhe was, the Lady, who of all the Town, did moſt viſit her, was Euridamia, Kinſwoman unto Solon, who was a Perſon ſo ſerious, and cold, whoſe Eyes were always in a languiſhing Melancholy, which was one of her greateſt Charms, though ſhe had many others; for Euridamia was fair, and had abundance of Wit, and of a ſweet and pleaſing Spirit. So it ſeemed as if Fortune took delight to oppoſe the Seriouſneſs of Euridamia, and the Gravity of Theocrites againſt the Gayety of Cerinthe, to make it ſeem the more: And that ſhe had alſo infuſed into Piſiſtrates, ſeveral things, which did ſympathize with the Seriouſneſs of Euridamia, and the Merrineſs of Cerinthe: and he did equally accuſtom himſelf to ſee them both, and they were both more or leſs pleaſed with him, in their turns, according to the humour he was in; for when he was melancholy, then he would ſit by Euridamia, and when he was merry, he was all for Cerinthe: However, certain it is, that at firſt, he made a further progreſs into the Heart of the melancholy one, than into the Heart of the merry, tho ſhe alſo eſteemed Piſiſtrates more than any other. For my part, I was every day in their company, and I took a ſtrange delight to ſee how odly Love had ordered things between theſe four Perſons. For it ſeemed as if Theocrites had been purpoſely cut out to love Euridamia, by reaſon of the ſutableneſs in their Melancholies; it ſeemed alſo that Cerinthe ſhould be moſt moved by the merit of Piſiſtrates, and not Piſiſtrates with hers: yet it was the pleaſure of Cupid, to make the melancholy perſon love the merry: That Piſiſtrates ſhould almoſt love both the ſerious, and the jocund; and that the merry one ſhould almoſt love none. For my part, I was the happieſt in the Company; for I was in ſuch favour with all theſe Perſons, that they made all their Complaints unto me as occaſions fell out: Indeed, Piſiſtrates would often complain that he thought Theocrites was too often with Cerinthe: Cerinthe alſo ſhe complained againſt the too frequent Viſits of this over-ſerious Lover, becauſe he ſaid, that ſhe did not give her time to rally after her own way, againſt Love: Theocrites on his ſide, he complained that he was forced to love a Perſon, whoſe humour was ſo oppoſite unto his own: And Euridamia alſo accuſed Cerinthe for jeering at all ſorts of Men, not ſparing her very Friends: 'Tis true, ſhe did ſo, even before her Face, as well as behind her Back: and I remember one day when Cerinthe was in one of her pleaſant Humours, ſhe began to counterfeit Theocrites, and to act his manner of ſpeaking and action, even to his very looks: So that Euridamia perceiving how ſhe pleaſed Piſiſtrates, ſhe could not chuſe but check her Raillery, perhaps as much out of a reſentment of Jealouſy, as Juſtice. I profeſs, Cerinthe, (ſaid ſhe unto her) you commit a moſt horrible piece of Injuſtice, in treating Theocrites after this manner. I do profeſs (replied Cerinthe, and laughed) you are much more unjuſt than I am, in offering to do an ill Office both unto Theocrites and me: For, I ſwear, if I ſhould not laugh in his abſence at an hundred of his Actions, I ſhould not endure his Preſence. Therefore if you think he loves me, and that my Preſence pleaſeth him, you muſt let me laugh at his melancholy; for when all is done, ſtill I will ſay that Theocrites is a Man of much Honour; but to think that when I ſee him all Gravity, from Morning till Night; or to hearken a whole day to his ſerious Sighs; and that I ſhould not laugh at them, and pleaſe my ſelf: This is the way to be neither Friend unto Theocrites nor me, ſince you would make him much more melancholy, and deprive me of much delight. For my part (ſaid Piſiſtrates then) I think the fair Cerinthe in the right: And for my part, (added I) I am of Euridamia's Opinion, and think there's nothing more inhumane than to jeer a poor Lover. To ſpeak ſeriouſly (ſaid Euridamia then) I think no Raillery to be innocent. Then am I very often to blame (replied Cerinthe) for I muſt confeſs, that I find no Company ſo pleaſing as that where there is a kind of agreeable Satyr mixed in it, which makes it more merry and full of Life; and to ſpeak ſeriouſly, if any Raillery be innocent, it is at a ſerious and grave Lover: Gallantry, without Mirth and Jocundry, is a thing ſo extravagant, as I wonder every one ſhould not laugh at it; for certainly it were no odder thing to ſee the General Council of all Greece to fall a dancing when they ſhould talk of State-Matters, than to ſee a Lover, and a Gallant, of a ſevere Garb. Since you are not ignorant that you can railly handſomely (replied Euridamia out of ſpite, ſeeing Piſiſtrates laugh at what Cerinthe ſaid,) you think that you may, without any ſcruple, railly thus as you do: And I am confident you think all that can be pleaſing, muſt be ſpoken in Raillery. Fie Euridamia (replied ſhe) that's too far; yet I muſt confeſs, it is a piece of difficulty, to keep up any pleaſant thought in ones Mind, which one knows they can well vent; and to tell you truly I think it argues more delicacy of Wit to railly handſomely, than to do many things which ſeem more difficult. It muſt needs be confeſſed (added Piſiſtrates) that it argues much Wit to turn things handſomely as they pleaſe: and it is ſometimes more delight to be jeered by you, than to be applauded by another. It is certain (added I) that Cerinthe is admirably good at it, when ſhe pleaſeth; but it is as certain alſo, that many Perſons will be medling with Raillery, who ought not. For my part (ſaid Euridamia) I will go further than you, and ſay again, that almoſt no Raillery can be innocent; and whoſoever gets a habit of it, are in great danger to loſe all Friendſhip, all Honeſty, and all Goodneſs. Really (ſaid Cerinthe, and laughed) you uſe me very cruelly. I uſe you according as you deſerve (replied Euridamia) not but that I know very well there is a kind of gallant Raillery, which hath leſs malignity in it than others have; but I will maintain, that whoſoever uſeth to rally often, does walk upon Precipies: and it is the hardeſt thing in the World to walk even, and do it well, without danger, or wronging the Laws of Friendſhip and Goodneſs, and without wronging themſelves alſo: For it is a thing almoſt impoſſible to uſe it without hatred, or at leaſt feared; and the very truth is, none are allowed to uſe it; alſo I do know very few Men who are juſt Subjects of Raillery. How? (ſaid Cerinthe) will you defend all Men in the World? I aſſure you (replied Euridamia) I would have none forſake you.

For firſt, purſued ſhe, I would not have one jeſt, not only upon their particular Friends, but alſo not upon their Acquaintance: Firſt chuſe them well, and be as nice as you pleaſe in the choice, but when you have choſen them, by no means play upon them; I cannot allow of their Opinions, who will not ſpare thoſe whom they love beſt in the World: For in my Opinion it is moſt dangerous to divert ones ſelf at the Expences of ones Friends. However, ſaid Piſiſtratis, you will give Cerinthe leave to play upon her Enemies; Truly, replied Euridamia, I cannot allow that more than upon Friends, for Raillery is the pooreſt kind of Revenge that can be rendred: For ought I ſee (ſaid Cerinthe) you will not allow one ſo much as to railly with ones ſelf: I aſſure you, replied ſhe, though that be the moſt harmleſs Raillery that can be, yet if it be not done with abundance of Judgment, it will be found no great Diverſion, and ſurely it is a more difficult matter to play upon ones ſelf, than upon any other. Moreover, added ſhe, I cannot allow any Raillery upon ſuch as are Men of mean or no Merit, for it is never handſom; nor do I allow it upon Men of Parts, becauſe it were Injuſtice to deſcant upon one ſlight Fault, in prejudice of a thouſand good Qualities: But if one will needs be raillying, let it be upon ones ſelf, but never ſpeak any thing that may anger, or any thing that will do more than a little animate Converſation, for in that caſe I confeſs it is allowable to chide ones beſt Friends. But Cerinthe, how few Men are there who knows how to railly either wittily or innocently? And truly I do not wonder at it, for the Talent muſt be born with them,no Art can infuſe it; and whoſoever will force his Naturals, will be ſo far from diverting others with his Raillery, that he will be the ſubject of Raillery himſelf: It is not ſo in any other pleaſing qualities of Wit, ſince they may be all acquired by Pains and Study; but as for the gift of Raillery, Nature only muſt give it, and Judgment muſt guide it: It is not enough to have many pleaſant Thoughts, but there muſt be alſo ſuch an Expreſſion as muſt render them agreeable; the Air, the Aſpect, the Tone, and every part in general muſt contribute. I ſhould never have thought, ſaid Piſiſtrates, that a Perſon ſo ſerious as Euridamia is, could ſpeak ſo well of a Quality ſhe never practiſeth. On the contrary, replied ſhe, I ought to be more believed becauſe I railly not; for having no intereſt in it, I ſpeak without any Paſſion, and examine the kinds of Raillery without Injuſtice unto any: But to tell you truly, except one of my Friends who hath a moſt admirable delicacy of Wit and Fancy, I know none but Cerinthe whom I will allow to railly. Truth is (ſaid I then) there is nothing more inſufferable than ſuch Men as are always ſlandering, and whoſe whole Thoughts are Raillery, who think becauſe they groſly rub upon the Faults of others, therefore they are good at Raillery. There are another ſort of ſcurrilous Men, replied Piſiſtrates, who make me mad when I meet with them, for all their delight conſiſts in a popular and baſe way of talk, which fills the Imagination with nothing but villanous things, and which makes it apparent unto all who hear them, that they have ſpent the greateſt part of their Lives in the very worſt Company of the World. Ah Piſiſtrates (ſaid Cerinthe) you delight me extreamly to hear you hate ſuch Men; for though I do defend Raillery in general, yet I ſhould forſake all manner of Jocundry, rather than ſuch ſhould be permitted, eſpecially this you ſpeak of in particular; for the truth is, I would have Raillery to be gallant, and have a little touch of Satyr; but yet I would have it modeſt and delicate, that it wound neither the Ears, nor the Imagination, and that it make one bluſh only for Anger. There are yet another ſort of Jeſters, replied Euridamia, who tire my Patience when I meet them, for their Fancy is to play upon all, ſo that racking their Wits to find an occaſion, they bring out a thouſand tedious things for one of any conceipt in it; and for three or four happy Jeſts which they had broken in all their Lives, you ſhall hear a hundred thouſand bad ones from them. For my part, replied I, I met once with a Man who madded me with his continual Repetitions of what he thought he had wittily ſaid, and it was ſuch a Jeſt, as I dare ſwear I have heard above a hundred times before. I cannot endure thoſe Tale-tellers, added Piſiſtrates, who always laugh firſt at their own Story, and who ſhould laugh alone if they never told them unto any but me. After all this, ſaid Euridamia, there is another ſort the moſt tedious of all, ſince in my opinion nothing is more unhandſom, than a certain kind of faint cold Raillery which is good for nothing, ſuch as when they ſee thoſe they talk with have a deſign to be pleaſant, yet they will not be ſo, nothing can be more tireſom than this. Theſe Tellers of long tedious Stories, replied I, who bring in a hundred Impertinencies for one pleaſing Paſſage, are a moſt troubleſome ſort of People, though they themſelves are very pleaſing, and it is ſo hard a matter to ſpeak neither too much nor too little, in telling a long Story, that few Men can do it well. Theſe great Men of old Proverbs, replied Euridamia, are very impertinent, not but that when a Proverb is aptly applied, it is very pleaſing, but when the Proverb is nought or ill applied, it has a contrary Effect. For my part, added Cerinthe, That as errand Fools as they are, yet they ſerve to divert me; for though they talk much, and laugh at what themſelves ſay and think, though they make a great noiſe, and talk harſhly, I can laugh as heartily at them as if they were the beſt Company in the World. But the reaſon why you laugh, replied Euridamia, is becauſe you are naturally Merry, and find an ample matter of Raillery upon thoſe who do it ill-favouredly. However, added Piſiſtrates, we ought to be all of Euridamia's Opinion, for ſince Raillery is a thing ſo difficult to be done well, ſhe has good reaſon to ſay that it is very dangerous to uſe it often. I do agree, ſaid Cerinthe, that bad Raillery is to be condemned, and that the Satyrical, the Groſs, the Cold, and the Extravagant is not to be endured; but as for the Gallant, Delicate, Fine, and Witty, I ſhall oppoſe her, and defend it as far as I am able; and Euridamia muſt either be abſolutely of my Opinion, or elſe directly tell me what ſort of Raillery ſhe will permit me to take delight in. I have already told you, replied Euridamia, that there is none which I approve of, though there be ſome which pleaſeth me: Tell me then which pleaſeth you, ſaid Piſiſtrates, for I do believe what pleaſeth you will pleaſe all the World, and though it be only to correct Cerinthe, I beſeech you eſtabliſh the Law of Raillery, proteſting unto you, that I will obſerve it as exactly as the Laws of Solon. For my part, ſaid Cerinthe, and laughed, I will not ſay ſo much, and if I am not much miſtaken, the ſame may be ſaid of the Laws which ſhe ſhall make, as was ſaid by Anacharſis of our Legiſlator. However (ſaid Euridamia) ſince Piſiſtrates ſays he will obſerve them, I will venture to make them: And I do promiſe alſo never to break them, ſaid I unto her, provided you give them unto us preſently. The word Law does ſo much fright me, ſaid Euridamia, that I dare hardly pronounce it; and therefore to ſpeak a little more modeſtly, I will only tell you my opinion, and ſubmit unto your own Judgments. I ſhall tell you then, added ſhe, that I would have Raillery natural, not forced, I would not have any to ſeek it; for certainly if it come not of it ſelf unpumpt for, and without pains, it will never come well and pleaſingly off. Moreover, there muſt be ſuch a great interval and difference between Raillery and Satyriſm, that one may never be taken for the other. I know very well ſome ſay, That if Raillery be not a little biting, it will never take well, but for my part, I conſider it otherwiſe: Truth is, I would have it ſurprize, and ſenſibly touch him to whom it is addreſſed, but I would not have the Wounds it makes to be too deep, nor prick the Hearts of thoſe who reſent it, otherwiſe than thoſe are pricked who gather Roſes, and find a ſweet ſmell to make amends: I would have Raillery raiſe the Fancy, and quicken the Imagination with a Wit full of fire, which retaining ſome part of its Original, may ſhine only as the Stars do, but burn not. Again, I would not have one be always in a vein of Raillery, few long Continuances in Raillery but are naught: But above all, I would have every one know his talent of Wit, and be contented; and therefore thoſe unto whom Nature hath not given a nimbleneſs and quickneſs either in their Actions or Feature of Face, or in their Expreſſions, are never to meddle with more than ſhe hath given them; for Art commonly mars all, let him follow only his own Genius, and not anothers. It is not with Raillery as with Pictures, which ſometimes are copied ſo like the Original, that one cannot know the Copy from its Original; but in matter of Raillery, there is no imitating another, and therefore let him never attempt it. But to ſpeak ſomething concerning thoſe ill Jeſters and Tellers of Tales which we have condemned, I would have ſuch as tell a Tale, never no ſay it is delightful before-hand; I would have the Tale to be either very Natural, or elſe very Witty and Pertinent, that the beginning be not more pleaſant than the ending, and above all things, I would have it new and ſhort. Thoſe who are to make long Stories, I would have them do it with Art and Method, that they ſuſpend the Minds of their Auditors, and if it be poſſible to deceive them, in ending their Diſcourſe contrary to their Expectations: But principally let them not uſe any Impertinencies, let not their Eloquence be either intricate or drailing, but on the contrary, let them paſs from one thing to another without Puzzle or Confuſion, and not to interrupt themſelves too often, in ſaying, I had forgot to tell you, or by ſaying, I ſhould have told you, and a hundred ſuch like with ſuch uſe, as have no Method nor Order in their Thoughts.

Furthermore, I would have them be ſure to ſpeak in the Language of compleat Men, not like thoſe whom Piſiſtrates did moſt wiſely mention, unleſs in caſe he be to imitate how a Slave ſpoke unto his Maſter, or ſo; for then, ſince imitation is his aim, the nearer he imitates, the more commendable it is. Moreover, I would not have them be too covetous of their Thoughts, but to take care as much as poſſible not to repeat any thing twice. As for ſuch as are full of old Proverbs in their Raillery, I have already ſaid, that they may be pertinent; and I ſay again, that if they be natural, pat, and applicative to the Buſineſs, they much illuſtrate. But to ſpeak upon that which is poſitively called Raillery or Jeſting, I ſay, that to railly right, is requiſite to have a Wit full of fire, a quick Fancy, a delicate Judgment, and a Memory full of Variety to be uſed upon all Occaſions; he muſt know the World, and pleaſe it, he muſt have a natural nimbleneſs of Wit, and a kind of bold Familiarity, which without any ſmack of inſolence muſt pleaſe, and impoſe ſilence upon others. Ah Euridamia, replied Piſiſtrates, What abundance of Wit is requiſite to make up ſuch a one as you deſcribe? For my part, ſaid Cerinthe, I believe if ſhe would lay aſide her ſerious Humour, not one in all Greece could railly better than ſhe. Serioufneſs, replied Euridamia, is not ſo great an Obſtacle unto fine Raillery as you imagine; for I once knew a Man, who had ſuch a languiſhing Air with him, ſo melancholy and ſo dull a Garb, as I never ſaw the like; and yet he was the fulleſt of pleaſant Wit and gallant Raillery, that I never ſaw Man in my Life like him. Now though I have hinted unto you how one ought to railly, yet I muſt repeat what I ſaid before, and maintain that one ought to have a great care how he raillies, eſpecially upon his Friends; yet there is one general rule which will never fail, which is, to ſay nothing of ſuch as one would not willingly have them underſtand, and never to ſay any thing of themſelves ſo biting as to hinder the delight of ſuch as hear him; for it is not juſt to ſay any thing of your Friends which will pleaſe others more than them, nor to put them into ſuch a Neceſſity as to reply ſuch things as will pleaſe you leſs than the Company; for Friendſhip is ſo nice a matter, that one cannot too much fear the wounding it; and indeed to ſpeak rationally, theſe biting Quiblets do not make the beſt Raillery. The delight any takes in them, proceeds more from the malignity of their own Inclinations, than from any right Art of Raillery; and certainly a trifle handſomly retorted, is more fit for pleaſant Raillery than a Satyrical Invective, whoſe name is only changed and called Raillery: It is no fault to be ill at Raillery, but it is a grand one to loſe ones Friend rather than his Jeſt. All you ſay, replied Cerinthe, is ſo like the Couſin of Solon, that I think he left you all his Wiſdom when he went out of Athens. I am ſure, ſaid Piſiſtrates, ſhe has ſpoken all according to the Rule of good and ſound Reaſon. I know but too much for my Satisfaction (replied Cerinthe) for if I ſhould regulate my ſelf according to her Documents, I ſhould never ſpeak as long as I live. It would be too great a loſs to impoſe ſilence upon you, Madam (replied I) ſince few can ſpeak ſo well.

As I ſaid ſo, Theocrite entred in Querpo, with a moſt majeſtique Gravity, which turned the diſcourſe, and preſently parted the Company; for Euridamia going away, Piſiſtrates whom ſhe had pleaſed very well that day, preſented his Hand unto her, and I following preſently after, we left Cerinthe with her melancholy Lover, whom ſhe ſuffered only to divert her ſelf, and to tell us the next day how grave and ſeriouſly he courted her.

In the mean time, Piſiſtrates not well knowing whether he was Lover or Friend unto Cerinthe or Euridamia, whether he was in Love with one, and a Friend to the other, or loved both, he placed himſelf almoſt equally poized between theſe two Ladies: Truth is, it was (as I told you before) according to the humour he was in: As for example, on one of thoſe days when he found fault with all the Evils in the Commonwealth, then he was all for Euridamia, and never looked at Cerinthe, but he would complain unto Euridamia of all the ill management of Affairs, examining them to the bottom, obſerving all their Defects, and ſeeking out all Remedies, as if what he ſaid unto Euridamia were to be followed: Indeed his Spirits and Imagination was as zealous, as if he were perſwading all the People in Athens, and driving the nail more home; he foreſaw all the Benefits and all the Miſeries of the Commonwealth according to his Thoughts, and made ſuch a ſubverſion of things, that if Fortune had executed his Will, none in Athens could have ſtayed where he was.

In the mean time, Piſiſtrates mixed ſome matters of Gallantry with his Policy: So that Euridamia lent a pleaſing Ear unto him, and he was very glad of it. But then in one of his merry days, he would ſpend it all with Cerinthe, with whom he plotted projects of Pleaſure and Diverſion more than Policy; Walks, Balls, Muſick were the principal Deſigns, whole Afternoons were ſpent in Counſels how to contrive them, and imagining a thouſand other Delights: Yet during all theſe days of ſport, Theocrite and Euridamia were out of tune; yet this grave Lover was much more unhappy than this ſerious Lover; for ſhe having an infinite Wit, knew well enough that Cerinthe had no more power upon the Heart of Piſiſtrates than ſhe had: But as for Theocrite, he knew ſo well that he had no ſhare in the Heart of Cerinthe, that he was troubled to the Soul; and yet he ſaw that this Lady was not capable of any great compliance with any one: But ſince Piſiſtrates pleaſed her more than any other, he grew extreamly jealous: But, Madam, if Cerinthe had reaſon to ſay that a ſerious Lover was a very odd thing, I am ſure that I have more reaſon to ſay that a jealous grave Lover is no leſs; and the truth is, Madam, a ſtranger ſight could not be ſeen than Theocrite when he was jealous; lous; for it being a Paſſion which of it ſelf carries Melancholy along with it, judg I beſeech you what he was, who was naturally ſo before; but the ſtrangeſt thing was to ſee this Man ſo ſerious, and whoſe Actions were wont to be always ſo in print, now full of all frivolous Cares, and impertinent Curioſities, that Jealouſy could inſpire unto a Man moſt apt for it. In the mean time, I delighted my ſelf in the ſadneſs of others, and in their Joys alſo; for being then much in favour with Piſiſtrates, I ſhared in his Diverſions; and ſpeaking unto him one day concerning Cerinthe and Euridamia, I preſſed him to tell how his Mind ſtood affected unto them: They are both of them ſo much in my Mind (replied he) That did I know but one of them, I am perſwaded I ſhould be extreamly in love with her, but becauſe I equally eſteem them both, my Heart is not reſolved what to do: And I think I may well ſay, that I do love them much better than I do any other of my Friends, and leſs than a Miſtreſs unto whom I ſhould wholly devote my ſelf. This anſwer is ſo ſtrange, replied I, and laughed, that I think you give it rather as good Conceipt, than as your real Thoughts. I do proteſt, ſaid he unto me, I tell you really what my Heart thinks; for if Euridamia had not come unto Cerinthe, when firſt I knew her, I had then fallen down right in Love with her; and if I had known Ewidamia and never been acquainted with Cerinthe, I believe I ſhould have loved her moſt tenderly: Truth is, Silamis, ſaid he to me, The Jocundry of Cerinthe does ſo much pleaſe me, and the melancholy of Euridamia does ſo much charm me, as I am confident if either of thoſe two ſhould go into the Country for one month, I am fully perſwaded that I ſhould fall deeply in love with her who ſtayed in Athens. I profeſs, ſaid I, this is moſt admirable: Be it what it will, ſaid he, what I ſay is true: But, Sir, ſaid I unto him, How can your Mind be divided ſo between two Perſons of ſuch oppoſite humours? Theſe two Perſons of humours ſo oppoſite, replied he, have each of them in their way abundance of Merit, and therefore no wonder my Mind ſhould be unſetled, and the wonder is the leſs, becauſe they do not reſemble one another; for if they were both merry, or both melancholy, doubtleſs I ſhould make choice of her whoſe Mirth or Melancholy moſt pleaſed me: But becauſe I do find that in the one which I do not find in the other, I am forced to part my Eſteem and my Affection: And ſo it may alſo be ſaid, that I do love them both, or at leaſt have an equal Diſpoſition to love them: And indeed, Madam, Piſiſtratus lied not, ſince had it not been for his Inclination towards Euridamia, he had in all likelihood fallen in love with Cerinthe; and had it not been for his Inclination to Cerinthe, he had fallen alſo in love with Euridamia.

However, theſe two Ladies at laſt perceiving that they themſelves were equally Obſtacles, to keep the Heart of Piſiſtrates from each other, they began to love one another much leſs. Inſomuch as Cerinthe who was uſed to ſpeak of Euridamia, and to ſay only, that ſhe was very ſerious, did now ſay upon ſeveral Occaſions, that ſhe was lumpiſhly melancholy; and Euridamia on her ſide, who was wont only to ſay that Cerinthe loved Raillery a little too well, accuſed her now of ſlandering, and as a lover of Miſchief; inſomuch as this petty Diviſion produced divers Quarrels between theſe two Ladies, which ſtrangely perplexed Piſiſtrates, for they would both of them be forcing him to take their parts, yet he carried it ſo handſomly, that ſometimes condemning the one, and ſometimes the other, he became a Judg of their Differences, and did not declare himſelf.

But in the interim of all theſe Squabbles, Theocrites continuing ſtill the Gravity of his Humour, made no further progreſs into the Heart of Cerinthe than ordinary, and conſequently was more miſerable than he was uſed to be. Things ſtanding upon theſe Terms, and Piſiſtrates ſtill ſaying, that but for Euridamia he had loved Cerinthe, and but for Cerinthe he had loved Euridamia; I underſtood that Philombrotus was to go into the Country with his whole Family: I no ſooner heard this, but I went unto Piſiſtrates, and addreſſing my ſelf unto him: Well, Sir, (ſaid I unto him, and laughed) we ſhall ſhortly ſee whether your words be true or no, and whether you will fall in love with Euridamia as ſoon as Cerinthe is out of your ſight, for I underſtand ſhe is going into the Country. How, ſaid he, Cerinthe into the Country? Yes, Sir, anſwered I, and I underſtand Philombrotus reſolves upon it to morrow: Then am I in a miſerable caſe (ſaid he to me) for I underſtood yeſterday that Euridamia goes away alſo to morrow; and as you were coming to me, I was ſaying to my ſelf, That I muſt prepare to fall in love with Cerinthe during the abſence of Euridamia; but for ought I ſee I am out of that danger ſince they both go. Since it is not likely (replied I, and laughed) that the ſame chance which cauſed them to depart both in one day, will make them return alſo both in one day, I ſhall not deſpair but to ſee my Curioſity ſatisfied ere it be long, and we ſhall ſee whether you will fall in love with her who returns firſt. In the mean time, Piſiſtrates thought himſelf extreamly concerned in the abſence of both theſe Ladies; yet ſince he had rather only a bare amorous Inclination towards them, than any real Love, he comforted up himſelf; and being obliged to take a Journey himſelf a little after their departure, change of place helped to diſſipate melancholy Thoughts: But, Madam, I being he of all his Friends with whom he held moſt Familiarity, he ingaged me to go this Journey with him, telling me the more to induce me to it, that he was to go near thoſe famous Bathes which are at the foot of the Mountain Thermopiles, and that we ſhould go thither and divert our ſelves ſome days after he had finiſhed his Buſineſs: For, Madam, be pleaſed to know, that theſe Bathes are ſo famous, that for three Months an infinite number of Perſons of greateſt Quality in all Greece reſort thither: Not ſick, languiſhing, and diſeaſed Perſons: But the opinion of thoſe beſt known in the Virtues of theſe Bathes, is, that they are more proper to preſerve Health, than to cure Diſeaſes: So that all thoſe who reſort thither are in a fit condition for Diverſions. Moreover, Ladies having a fancy that theſe Bathes do augment their Beauty, or at leaſt preſerve it, there is every year a huge reſort of them thither under pretence of preventing Diſeaſes, though really only to keep longer fair, or at leaſt to divert themſelves; for this is a Rule in all Baths, that Melancholy is by all means to be baniſhed, and Mirth muſt be made as much as may be: So, Madam, ſince I had never been there, but often heard excellent Diverſions to be there met with; I accepted of the offer which Piſiſtrates made unto me. I ſhall not inſiſt upon telling you what buſineſs carried Piſiſtrates unto Thermopiles, for I muſt confeſs he kept it ſecret from me; yet I thought it was to confer with ſome who were baniſhed from Athens, which might be uſeful to him in the change which he hath ſince brought about, though he would not confeſs ſo much unto me: However, I went this Voyage with him; and after he had left me two days with one of his Friends whilſt he diſpatched his unknown Buſineſs, he returned, and we went unto Thermopiles, which was not above half a days Journey off us. But, Madam, it is very requiſite I acquaint you both with the place, and the manner how they live at theſe Baths for three Months in the Year: Be pleaſed therefore to know, Madam, that very near this Mountain of Thermopiles, which parts Greece, and leaves but one narrow and difficult Paſſage by which one can paſs from one part of Greece unto the other; here ſtands a Town called Alpenes, wherein are many Houſes commodious for Lodgings, ſuch as reſort to the Baths; but the place where the Baths ſtand, hath in it ſomething both ſalvage and pleaſing: Indeed when one is at that ſtrait paſſage by which Men come from one part of Greece into another, one ſhall ſee a moſt inacceſſible Mountain, environed with affrighting Precipices, which reach as far as Mount Etna towards the Weſt; and on that ſide towards the Eaſt may the Sea be ſeen, and a kind of mariſh Ground, ſo full of Sources and Bogs, as there is no going: 'Tis true, that deſcending a little lower towards that ſide which looks towards Artimiſſion, there is a moſt pleaſant Meadow, and though it be in the view of this hideous Mountain, and on the other ſide the Sea, yet there are an infinite number of Trees growing about it. Moreover, ſince it is there where theſe Bathes are, they have drained away the Bogs and mariſh Waters; and conveying them away by ſeveral Channels, theſe famous Baths, are preſerved: There are alſo made, at both ends of the Meadow, above an hundred, all bathing Tubs of Marble, unto which when they pleaſe they can convey the Water; and ſince every one who comes unto this Bath brings with them a magnificent Tent to cover over the Bath they imploy, theſe ſeveral Tents ſtanding in this Meadow do make a moſt delighting Object. But, Madam, I forgot to tell you, that the reaſon why this is ſo, is, becauſe theſe Waters being naturally luke-warm, do loſe their Virtue if tranſported, and therefore they muſt of neceſſity bathe in the ſame place where they ſpring: Yet here the Ladies have every one their Bath in private, as well as if in their Chambers; and the Tents appointed for the Men are at the other end of the Meadow in reſpect unto the Ladies; yet there is a Gallery between them, where Guards are kept during the hours of bathing, ſo that the Men do wait upon the Ladies ſo far only as this Gallery; after which they go into their own private Tents, where they are at full liberty: Alſo the Men do never bathe at the ſame hours they do, for they bathe Mornings, and the Ladies Evenings: So that after they have waited upon the Ladies to the Gallery, they afterwards walk in the Meadows, and wait until they have done bathing, and then to conduct them unto their Coaches, which ſtand in Ranks in the Meadow. And this Year was a moſt rare Year for abundance of Company: Indeed, there were Ladies from all parts of Greece; ſome from Athens, ſome from Thebes, others from Magares, Argos, Corinth, Chalcis, Delphos, and an hundred other places; and I do verily believe, except from Lacedemon, there was Company from all the principal Towns in Greece. Moreover, there was Muſicians from all places in the World which had any Fame for excellency: Indeed there was no pleaſure, but it was there to be found, and more pure than in any other place, for there was not a Man who had the face of Buſineſs or domeſtique Occaſions upon him, all their care was only to divert. But, Madam, be pleaſed to know, that the hours of the Womens bathing being an hour before Sunſet, as the Mens was an hour after the riſing, Piſiſtrates and I came to Hermopiles when the Ladies were in their Tents: So that Piſiſtrates having been there formerly, he knew the cuſtom of the place; and we alighted from our Horſes at the ſide of the Meadow, then went to walk as the reſt did; for ſince we had not come far, we were in equippage well enough to appear before the Ladies: Alſo Piſiſtrates (who as good luck was) was not in one of his negligent Humours, he had on a Country Habit, the moſt magnificent and gallant that poſſibly could be ſeen: But we had no ſooner walked twenty paces in the Meadow, but an Athenian Man of Quality, called Ariſton, named us unto the Company with whom he was, and came to meet us with them; and it being the cuſtom of the place for thoſe who come firſt, to do Honours unto ſuch as come after, they received us very civilly. For my part, being altogether a Stranger, I viewed theſe ſeveral Tents with much delight, and informed my ſelf from Ariſton of all I deſired to know.

But, after the firſt civilities were over, Piſiſtrates and I being parted from the reſt, with Ariſton, we asked him, If there were any Beauties of Fame there that Year? And, after he had told us, that there were many who were very fair; others, leſs fair; others, leſs then they; and others, not fair at all: I ſpied among the Tents of the Ladies, one walking alone very reſervedly, whoſe Garb was extreamly noble, and Habit very gallant. Indeed Madam, I forgot to tell you, that they uſe to dreſs themſelves after a very particular manner in that place, which truly is very pleaſing and delightful; for the Habit of the Ladies is reſemblant unto that which Painters dreſs the Nymphs of Diana in; and the reaſon of the Cuſtom is, that ſince they muſt undreſs themſelves to bathe, ſuch a Dreſs was invented, as was both gallant, and convenient for that purpoſe.

But, to return from whence I digreſſed. I told you, That I ſaw one walking alone, and not ſeeing her Face, I asked Ariſton, who ſhe was? Though you know her not by her walk, (ſaid he unto me) yet, ſhe is one of our Athenian Beauties. At theſe words, Piſiſtrates looking more attentively upon her, and ſhe turning her Face towards us, he knew her to be Cleorante, of whom I ſpoke in the beginning of my Diſcourſe, and who was Daughter unto Megacles, a principal Athenian. He no ſooner knew her, but he ſaluted her, though he had never ſpoke unto her; for, ſince there had been an oppoſite Faction between their Fathers, there was no familiarity between their Families: Yet, ſince Athens was then all in Tranquillity, Piſiſtrates and Megacles were upon civil terms, though they uſed not to viſit each other: But, Megacles not being at the Bath, only his Wife, called Erophile; this did facilitate the acquaintance of Piſiſtrates and Cleorante. In the mean time, ſince this fair one returned her ſalute ſo civilly, ſhe obliged Piſiſtrates to talk longer of her, and to ask Ariſton, how long ſhe had been at the Bathes? So little a while, replied he, that if you had been ſeen privately at Athens with her, I ſhould have thought you had held intelligence together; for Erophile and ſhe have been here only two days. But, how comes it to paſs, (ſaid I unto Ariſton,) that Cleorante does not bathe? For, I find her fair enough to preſerve her Beauty. The reaſon is (replied he) becauſe ſhe is ſo fair, as ſhe thinks ſhe ſhould wrong her ſelf, ſhould ſhe uſe a thing which has a reputation of imbelliſhing it. I thought indeed, ſaid Piſiſtrates then, that Cleorante was very fair; at leaſt, I remember very well, that in the time of our diviſions at Athens, I ſaw her one day in the Church at a nearer diſtance, than now I do, and I ſaid unto one, that I was very ſorry Megacles had ſo fair a Daughter. You ſpeak of this in ſuch a pleaſant manner, (replied Ariſton) as would move one to ſay, you had no Eyes: I aſſure you, (ſaid he unto us) that I have not Eyes always, for that which I look upon, for if my Mind and my Eyes do not hold intelligence together, I know not well what I ſee.

As Piſiſtrates ſaid ſo, we ſaw many Ladies coming out of their Tents after they had bathed themſelves, who, meeting with Cleorante, began to walk together towards the Gallery; and ſince we were very near them, we ſaluted them. But, as they turned back, ſtaying for other Ladies to come out from bathing, Ariſton at the requeſt of Piſiſtrates, ſpoke unto her: I beſeech you Madam, (ſaid he unto Cleorante) do not ſo ſoon deprive us of the happineſs in ſeeing you, but give me leave to preſent two Athenians to you, who are ſorry they have need of my mediation to make themſelves known unto you; and that they have not hitherto the honour to be acquainted. Ariſton being a particular friend unto Cleorante, ſhe ſtayed, and kept one of her Friends with her, named Cephiſe, and coming then out of the Gallery with as much grace as civility: If theſe Noble Athenians, ſaid ſhe, would know me better than they do, they muſt diſclaim from thoſe civilities you tell me of: It appears very plainly, Madam, replied Piſiſtrates, that I have not the Honour to be known unto you, ſince you think I can diſclaim from what Ariſton hath ſaid unto you. For my part, Madam, added I, I think it ſufficient, that the fair Cleorante does know her ſelf; not to doubt, but, that as ſoon as any ſees her, they muſt needs be ſorry they ſaw her no ſooner: At leaſt, I am ſure, ſaid Ariſton to her, that Silamis thought you ſo fair, as he wondred why you ſhould not bathe your ſelf, ſince the Baths have a reputation of preſerving Beauty. Since I do know my ſelf very well, replied ſhe, and ſmiled, I have good reaſon to think, that your friend finding ſo little of Beauty as I have in my Face, he thinks I ſhould wrong my ſelf, if I ſhould hazard the loſing of it, in a thought; that if I ſhould loſe any, there would not remain ſo much, as would let me be endured. I profeſs Madam, ſaid the Lady who was with her, you do wrong unto ſo great a Beauty as yours is. I beſeech you, ſaid Cleorante, and ſmiled, do not ſmother me with Commendations, for ſince Piſiſtrates and Silamis do hardly know me, they will think I love to be commended, hearing one of my friends flatter me ſo highly; and I pray know, that I do not love to be commended to my Face; though I muſt confeſs, I love it well enough in ſpeaking unto others, behind my back. But, I beſeech you Madam, replied Piſiſtrates, what ſatisfaction will thoſe Commendations do you which you hear not, and very often will never know of? As for Example, added he, I am confident, that though I ſhould depart to morrow, and never ſee you again as long as I live, yet I ſhould ſpeak above an hundred times of you, and you never know it. Perhaps you, Sir, would ſpeak ſo little in my advantage, replied ſhe, and ſmiled, that it would be better for me not to know what you ſay of me. I aſſure you, Madam, ſaid I unto her, if you did well know Piſiſtrates, you would eaſily believe that he never ſpeaks ſo oft of one that does not pleaſe him; and ſhe would know alſo, added Piſiſtrates, that I am always ſpeaking of her who pleaſeth me. As Piſiſtrates ſaid ſo, Erophile, and almoſt all the Ladies being come out of their Tents, Cleorante left us, and went unto her Mother, who doubtleſs had been one of the greateſt Beauties in all Athens, and ſtill was very well: Thoſe who had ſeen her young, yet ſaid, that ſhe was never ſo lovely as Cleorante, who indeed was one of the moſt charming Beauties upon Earth; for, beſides that her Beauty was a Beauty of great Luſtre, ſhe had alſo ſuch a rare Air of Youth, ſuch a pleaſing and merry Modeſty, and ſuch an inviting Power, that it was an impoſſibility to reſiſt her.

But, Madam, as ſoon as ſhe had left us, we went, as all the reſt of the Men did who walked in the Meadow, to wait upon the Ladies at the Door of the Gallery, and to preſent our Hands unto them; for in that place Men have as much liberty as at a Ball, where it is not neceſſary to be acquainted before they ſpeak, or dance together. In the mean time, Ariſton being next the Door, and (as I ſaid before) being a particular Friend unto Cleorante, when ſhe went out, ſhe tendred her Hand unto him; but as ſoon as he took it, he turned towards Piſiſtrates, and told him, that as a Teſtimony of his Friendſhip he would ſurrender his Place unto him: And (added he, ſpeaking unto Cleorante) as he deſerves it better than I, ſo I beſeech you, Madam, let him have it. It ſeems you are weary, replied ſhe, and laughed, and deſiring Piſiſtrates ſhould be ſo alſo, you would have him go away to morrow. No, Madam, anſwered Piſiſtrates, but on the contrary Ariſton deſires my ſtay here, and therefore he lets me have the Honour of ſpeaking to you: However it be, (ſaid Ariſton in leaving them) I hope you will tell me what you talk of at the end of the Walk. After this, Ariſton preſented his Hand unto another Lady, and I mine unto Cleorante's Friend, of whom I ſpoke: So that the Evening being very fair, they walked a long time; Piſiſtrates and Cleorante had ſo much leiſure as to talk enough to let one another know, that they had both of them moſt admirable Wits. But the hour of returning unto Alpene being come, Ariſton came to them, becauſe the Lady whom he waited upon went firſt away; and as ſoon as he had put her in the Coach, he came and asked Cleorante and Piſiſtrates how they liked one another. For my part, ſaid Piſiſtrates, and laughed, I muſt tell you, that I was never in all my Life ſo taken with any, as I am with Cleorante, and methinks I have been acquainted with her ever ſince ſhe began firſt to live. For my part, ſaid this fair one, Piſiſtrates is ſo little a ſtranger unto me, that I believe, if I had any Secrets, I durſt truſt them unto him. To teſtify unto you (added Piſiſtrates) that we were not at any non-plus, as ordinarily thoſe are who are firſt acquainted: I aſſure you we talked all the while, and yet not of any Beauties of the Time; or that of the Place, nor of any ſuch kind of things as People uſe to talk of when they have nothing elſe to ſay. As Piſiſtrates ſaid ſo, Erophile being returned to call her Daughter, Ariſton advanced towards her, and told her at the deſire of his Friend, that Piſiſtrates had a Deſign to go with her to her Houſe: So that ſhe ſtaying, he ſaluted her, and ſhe received him very well; for ſhe being a Lover of Peace, Quietneſs, and Pleaſures, ſhe was very deſirous to contract an Amity between Megacles, and Piſiſtrates; yet this Converſation was not long: For ſince it was very late, we only waited upon the Ladies to their Coach: After which, Piſiſtrates, Ariſton, and I, we walked a little longer.

In the mean time, they had no ſooner left us, but I ſaid unto Piſiſtrates, in a laughing manner, that I found he would 'ere long be accuſtomed unto Cleorante: But be ſure, ſaid I unto him, whilſt Ariſton was taking order for our Lodging, that firſt you have unaccuſtomed your ſelf from Cerinthe, and from Euridamia. We ſhall ſtay ſo little here, replied he, and laughed, that I ſhall not have leiſure to accuſtom my ſelf in earneſt with Cleorante: And we ſhall return ſo ſoon unto Athens, that I ſhall not have leiſure to unaccuſtom my ſelf from Cerinthe and Euridamia. But Euridamia and Cerinthe, ſaid I unto him, will not be there when you return, for they are both in the Country. 'Tis very true, ſaid he unto me, I profeſs I had forgotten that. Really, ſaid I unto him, and laughed, this is a moſt infallible proof that you are not in Love with them: For it is without example, either in a Lover or a Friend, that they ſhould forget they bad adieu unto their Miſtreſs or Friend, and not remember whether they be abſent or preſent. Since I laughed ſomething loud, Ariſton coming towards us, asked what I laughed at? But Piſiſtrates not well knowing any reaſon why, forbad me to tell him ſo earneſtly, that indeed I did not: After which, we began again to talk of Cleorante, and we asked him, Whether ſhe had as much Goodneſs as ſhe had Beauty? Doubtleſs ſhe hath, (replied Ariſton) but ſhe hath one good Quality which is very particular, for ſhe is unequal-humoured, without any fantaſticalneſs; and ſhe is at that very ſame time one of the moſt equal-humoured Perſons upon Earth, in many things. This is a thing, replied I, which cannot be eaſily comprehended. Yet it is moſt true, replied he, for moſt certain it is, that Cleorante is always one of the beſt Perſons in the World, and loves her Friends with the moſt even, conſtant, and equality of Humour. In what then is ſhe unequally humoured? replied Piſiſtrates. In this, anſwered he, that ſhe is ſometimes merry, and ſometimes ſerious; and yet her Jocundry never makes her too Merry, nor her Seriouſneſs too Melancholy; but for all that, ſhe is of a very different Humour, though ſhe be always equally Good. Moreover, the very ſame Pleaſures will not equally delight her; for ſome days it is a Torment unto her to talk of going to a Ball, and ſometimes ſhe is wholly intent upon it; and yet, whether ſhe be Merry or Serious, ſhe is always equally amiable to all her Friends, for ſhe never has any pettiſh Humours towards them, how different ſoever ſhe be to her ſelf; and indeed it may well be ſaid, that ſhe is only different and unequal, to the end ſhe may the more pleaſe, and make it appear ſhe has all the Charms that can be found in two Tempers ſo oppoſite to each other. You ſet Cleorante out by ſuch a Character, as fills me full of Curioſity to know her more particularly, replied Piſiſtrates; and I think that if I had no Buſineſs at Athens, I ſhould ſtay here as long as ſhe did; but ſince I intend my time here to be not above ſeven or eight days, I deſire to imploy that time in ſeeing her as much as I can. If that be your Deſign, replied Ariſton, then we muſt retire; for it is this very Night that all the Ladies meet at her Mother's Houſe to dance.

Ariſton had no ſooner ſaid ſo, but Piſiſtrates went towards our Horſes, at the ſide of the Meadow with Ariſton's: After which, we went unto Alpenes, and lodged at Ariſton's Houſe, who gave his own Chamber unto Piſiſtrates, and divided another between me and himſelf; for there was this Year ſuch a multitude of People at the Baths, that without him we ſhould have been puzled for a Lodging. In the mean time, Piſiſtrates having his Men and Equipage with him, he put himſelf into a habit for dancing, and did it doutleſs without having the leaſt thought of falling in Love with Cleorante: on the contrary, when I came unto his Chamber, he talked with me of Cerinthe and Euridamia as we were wont, and he wiſhed them in that place, asking me, which I thought would firſt return to Athens? adding, that as ſoon as he returned thither, he intended to write unto them of all the Paſſages at the Bath, and to make an ample Relation of them. After which, Ariſton alſo entring, to tell us it was time to go, and acquainting us with the mode of their Gallantry, to the end we might not ſeem as Strangers, we went unto Erophile's Houſe, who, with Cleorante, received us with much civility; and Cleorante putting her ſelf into another Dreſs, after her return from the Baths, with an addition of Jewels thereunto, ſhe was a freſh luſtre of Beauty in the Eye of Piſiſtrates. Again, ſince he was better acquainted with her than any of the reſt, and ſince ſhe was the only Lady of all the Company except Cephiſe, unto whom he ever ſpoke, therefore he applied himſelf more aſſiduouſly unto her, and took her out to dance ofter than any other. Both of them chancing that Night to be in their frolique Humours, they danced ſo well together, that all the Company admired them: Truth is, Madam, it may well be ſaid, they paſſed away that Night together in private amidſt a great multitude, ſo ſeldom were they ſeparated; for my part, though I applied my ſelf to court Cephiſe, yet I obſerved, by the countenance of Piſiſtrates, that he was not weary of his imployment, and by Cleorantes, that he was welcome to her: Alſo I plainly ſaw, that all the great Feaſts of Athens did never divert Piſiſtrates ſo much as this Aſſembly; and indeed it was ſuch as would delight any, for the Ladies were very fair, they were in more Gallantry of Dreſs than ordinary, and there was a kind of greater freedom than at thoſe Balls which are kept in Towns. But the hour of retiring being come, and the Company parting, we parted as the reſt did, and in our return I obſerved, that Piſiſtrates was extreamly gay and pleaſant: So that coming to him, whilſt Ariſton was talking to ſome other Men; Doubtleſs, ſaid I unto him, you are extreamly well ſatisfied with your viſit of Cleorante, ſince you are ſo merry and lively at ſuch a time when every one deſires to ſleep, and is weary with dancing or walking. Alas, Silamis, (ſaid he unto me) did you but know my Adventure, you would wonder. What, in the Name of the Gods, may it be, ſaid I unto him? It is, ſaid he, that I have found Cerinthe in Cleorante. How, Piſiſtrates, ſaid I unto him, they are nothing alike, for Cleorante is tall and fair, and Cerinthe is little and black: But it muſt be confeſſed, ſaid Piſiſtrates, that the tall and fair is a greater Beauty than the little and black; and all the Charms of wit and jocundry which are in Cerinthe, are likewiſe to be found in Cleorante, only here's the difference, Cleorante rallies with leſs Malice, and if I be not much miſtaken, ſhe has a Soul more tender than Cerinthe. But, Sir, ſaid I unto him, and laughed, as when we were at Athens, there was nothing but the preſence of Euridamia which hindred you from loving Cerinthe, ſo I ſhall think that nothing elſe will hinder you from loving Cleorante, ſince you find the Charms of Cerinthe in her. Since we are to tarry here but eight days, replied he, and ſmiled, I ſhall not be perfidious either unto Cerinthe or Euridamia; yet ſince Cleorante makes me remember Cerinthe, I know not whether ſhe will have the advantage of the other. As I was ready to reply, Ariſton coming to us, he asked Piſiſtrates, whether what he had ſaid unto him, before they went unto the Ball, did any thing profit him? And whether he obſerved how cloſely a Man of Corinth had courted a lady of Argos? and many other ſuch Queſtions. You might do well to ask Silamis whether he ſaw any ſuch, replied Piſiſtrates: As for my part, I ſaw none but Cleorante, who ſeemed unto me ſo fair and ſo lovely, as I underſtand not why I ſhould not be on the ſide of Megacles, that I may be a Friend unto his Daughter. Since it is much a more eaſy matter to be her Lover than his Friend, replied Ariſton, perhaps it had been better for you, if you had never ſeen her, or at leaſt not ſo ſoon. No, replied Piſiſtrates; but on the contrary, for if it be my Fate to fall in Love with Cleorante, I would have it at the very firſt ſight of her, for then I ſhall ſooner find a recompence to my million of Services, or at leaſt ſtave off the more Lovers, and hinder Rivals: Yet ſhe hath one very reſolute Lover, replied Ariſton. I believe, ſaid I, it is the Brother of Theocrites, called Lycurgus. The very ſame (replied Ariſton) and he hath ſo long loved her, without being loved again, that I think he will love her as long as he lives. Provided it be always ſo, ſaid Piſiſtrates, he will not much prejudice his Rival. Yet I aſſure you, replied I, that a Rival is always a Mote in ones Eye, though he be hated. As I ſaid ſo, we came to Ariſton's Lodging: ſo that it being very late after we had waited upon Piſiſtrates to his Chamber, we went into ours. In the mean time, Piſiſtrates being very Noble, and his dancing Fancy continuing, he told Ariſton, at parting, that he deſired to give a Ball, and Cephiſe being Ariſton's Couſin, he entreated him to oblige her that it might be kept at her Houſe; and Piſiſtrates reſolved to go himſelf and imploy the afternoon following in entreating that Favour from her, and in inviting moſt of the conſiderable Ladies: But ſince he would needs begin with Erophile, becauſe of Cleorante, we made not ſo many Viſits as we intended, for the viſit laſted almoſt all the day. In the mean time, I obſerved that Cleorante and he were nothing ſo frolique as the Night before; but on the contrary, ſhe was all ſerious and grave. The truth is, I never in my life ſaw a melancholy Perſon ſo ſweet and lovely, nor a modeſty more charming than hers: I had need to coin a word to expreſs the Air of her Aſpect rightly when ſhe is not in that frolique Humour which ſometimes takes her; for the word Melancholy is too much, the word Serious alſo gives an Idea of too grave a Perſon; but ſuch a phraſe it muſt be, as will ſpeak Cleorante neither directly ſerious, nor melancholy; but ſomething that is ſo languiſhing, ſo ſweet, and ſo modeſt, as infinitely pleaſeth, and imprints reſpect. But, Madam, after we had waited upon the Ladies to their Coach, and came to the Meadow, we walked, whilſt the Ladies bathed. Piſiſtrates drawing me aſide very earneſtly: Did I not fear (ſaid he unto me) that you would mock me, I would tell you the ſtrangeſt paſſage that ever happened unto any. For truly (ſaid he) yeſterday I found Cerinthe in Cleorante, and to day, I proteſt, I found Euridamia, an Euridamia without melancholy, an Euridamia a thouſand times more charming than the other. I profeſs unto you, Sir, ſaid I unto him, and laughed, this is a great happineſs, to find two Friends or two Miſtreſſes that are abſent in one Perſon, and this one more amiable than they both. It is ſo, ſaid he, for Cleorante ſerious is Euridamia, and Cleorante merry is Cerinthe; and this is ſo true, that if you will obſerve her, you will find I am in the right. The thing is ſo worthy of curioſity, replied I, and laughed, that I ſhall be ſure to obſerve it.

But in the mean time, ſaid I, I do not ſee, Sir, how you can reſiſt a Perſon who hath the Charms of two; the one of which had overcome you, if you had not ſeen the other. I told you yeſterday, replied he, that we ſhall ſtay ſo little here, as I ſhall not have leiſure to tie my ſelf unto Cleorante, or untie my ſelf from Cerinthe, and Euridamia. As I was ready to anſwer him, we were interrupted by ſeveral Perſons; and all the reſt of the day I could talk no more with him, for as ſoon as the Ladies came out of the Gallery, he preſented his Hand unto Cleorante, and never left her until ſhe took Coach. Moreover, as ſoon as ever we were riſen from Dinner, we went unto a Lady's Houſe of Argos, with whom the Company was to paſs away the Afternoon; and as ſoon as we came there, Piſiſtrates applied himſelf to Cleorante.

At our going from thence, he aſſembled all the Muſicians in Alpenes to play (as he ſaid) unto all the Ladies; but to tell you truly, we began at Cleorante, and were ſo long before her Window, that the Sun was ready to riſe before we returned to our Lodgings: And I aſſure you it may well be ſaid, that we rather waked than diverted ſome of the Ladies. But at laſt, Piſiſtrates being every way Noble and Magnificent, his Deſign of the Ball was executed; he went to prepare Cephiſe, who undertook to invite the Ladies; and to the Harmony he added a moſt rare Banquet: and he did ſo often ingage himſelf in ſuch Feaſts whilſt he was at Alpenes, as I ſaw it would be longer than eight days before we ſhould depart; and indeed, Madam, I was not miſtaken, for in lieu of eight days, we ſtaid there two entire Months. However, that eight day being come, I ſaw, that in lieu of dreaming upon my departure, Piſiſtrates taking order for a great Feaſt which he intended to make: So that not being able to forbear chiding him; I ſee, ſaid I unto him, there is no ſign of our return to Athens; but, I pray Sir, do that which you ſaid you would. Then put me in memory of it, replied he, for I muſt confeſs I have forgotten what it was I ſaid unto you. How? ſaid I, do you not remember how you ſaid you would write unto Cerinthe and Euridamia? And make them ample Relations of all your Diverſions at the Baths, and of all you ſaw there? When I had that Deſign, replied he, and laughed, I knew not that I ſhould find Cerinthe and Euridamia at Alpenes; and truly, Silamis, to ſpeak more ſeriouſly and ſincerely both, I cannot tell whether I ſhould much pleaſe them in relating all Paſſages here, eſpecially the Paſſages in my Heart. For, truly Silamis, I never ſaw my ſelf ſo near, not being my ſelf as now. To ſpeak the Truth, replied I, it would be ſtrange News to ſend them, that you are in Love with Cleorante; for I am ſure both of them had hopes of captivating you themſelves. However, ſaid he, whether I fall in Love with Cleorante or no, I do think it very expedient that you do write unto them a true Relation of all the Paſſages at the Baths, and that you ſend them word (as great News) how you believe I am in Love with Cleorante; for if I do fall in Love with her, the thing will not ſurprize them when we return to Athens; and if I do not fall in Love with her, we can turn it into Raillery. I would with all my Heart, ſaid I unto him: But why ſhould I write unto thoſe two Ladies, unleſs you write alſo? Then do not write, ſaid he, for I cannot write any thing to them at this preſent; not but that I do very much eſteem them; but Cleorante is ſo much in my Fancy, that I can think upon nothing elſe. And the Truth is, Madam, he had ſo accuſtomed himſelf to ſee Cleorante, that he could not endure to be from her; yet he did not plainly tell her that he loved her, but all his Actions ſpoke it for him, and there was not one at the Baths which did not ſee and ſpeak of it. On the other ſide, Cleorante did very much eſteem Piſiſtrates; and it was apparent no Man did pleaſe her ſo well as he did. The Truth is, his whole Care was to divert her; and it was he alone who made all the Diverſions ſince he came to the Baths. Since there was that Year many more Women than Men; I underſtood by Cephiſe, that when we came, the Ladies intended to be at the Charges of the Muſick, and all the Diverſions, becauſe there was ſome Men who ſought for ſome poor Pretences, to be excuſed from it; but after Piſiſtrates came, none ever meddled with it but himſelf. In the mean while, ſince the inequality of Humours in Cleorante and Piſiſtrates did not every day hit alike, there hapned the pretticſt Diſputes in the World between them: But when they jumped both in one Humour, it was the rareſt ſight imaginable to ſee them together. For my part (ſaid I one day unto Piſiſtrates, and laughed) I ſhould think it much better to have a ſerious Friend and merry Friend ſeveral, than to have them both in one Perſon; for when Cleorante is in her languiſhing Humour, and you not, then cannot you tell where to be merry; whereas if they were ſeparate, you might be either merry or melancholy according to your own Humour. You do ſo much divert your ſelf at my Follies, ſaid he to me, that I ſhould do you a very bad Office if I ſhould ſee Cleorante no more; and therefore me-thinks you ſhould be glad I love her.

Piſiſtrates ſpoke this in ſuch an angry Air, that I plainly perceived the merry Humour was not upon him that day; and I ſaw he was ſerious, and reſerved, and angry, even before Cleorante; and I had the pleaſure to ſee two Perſons which infinitely eſteemed each other in oppoſite Opinions: Truth is, this did not happen very oft; but when Piſiſtrates had a fancy of Poetry, and Cleorante a fancy of Muſick, they would compoſe moſt rare Elogies and Satyrs of thoſe two Arts; and ſo of all the reſt as occaſions were offered: But one day, Policy and Publick Affairs was their Conteſt; for as we heard that Morning there had been ſome ſtirs in Athens, ſince our departure, Piſiſtrates being then in his lumpiſh Humour and Fancy of regulating the Common-Wealth, he bolted out an hundred Quibbles againſt ſuch as had Authority in our City: So that Cleorante being in her merry Fit, and unwilling to ſpend all the day upon Matters of Policy, ſhe began to contradict him; and the rather, becauſe Erophile being buſy in her Cloſet, writing unto Megacles, there was none but Cephiſe, Piſiſtrates, and me with her. So that after ſhe had ſuffered Piſiſtrates to inveigh againſt the Diſorders of the Common-Wealth near half an hour, ſhe abruptly interrupted him: Is it poſſible, Piſiſtrates, ſaid ſhe unto him, you ſhould not conſider that ever ſince any Force or Laws were, and ſince they made difference of Men, there has ever been ſome who have ill commanded, and ſome who were ill obeyed? And therefore time is but ill ſpent in continual Complaints, which will do no good. Why? ſaid he, will you not give me leave to complain, that ſo many things ſhould be done againſt all Reaſon: And to ſee that the Athenians, who thought themſelves free becauſe they had no King, ſhould now be Slaves unto an hundred Tyrants, who have all the Authority in their Hands? and who do nothing but inrich themſelves, and impoveriſh others? Is it poſſible one ſhould endure, and ſay nothing, when a thouſand Injuſtices are committed every day? And that Athens, which is the moſt famous City of all Greece, ſhould be ready to periſh, becauſe the Governours do govern it ill. I aſſure you (ſaid ſhe) rather than torment my ſelf as you do, I would do any thing elſe; for if you can govern it beter, do, and you would do well: But ſince it is not the pleaſure of Fortune to caſt the Conduct of Affairs upon you, believe me, Piſiſtrates, it is better to let them alone: And be confident, that as what others do, doth not pleaſe you; ſo what you would do would not pleaſe others, if you were in their places. If it did not pleaſe them, yet it ought to do, (replied he) for I am ſure that I would do nothing but what was juſt. Though you did nothing but what was juſt, (replied Cleorante) yet they would complain of you; for indeed whether Kingdom or Common-Wealth, Complaints will be; and therefore ſince (to ſpeak generally) theſe kind of Complaints do better become the Herd of People, than Men of Quality. I would complain as little as I could I aſſure you, replied Cephiſe: Piſiſtrates is not the only Man of his Quality who complains, but there are many others. Were he the only Man, replied Cleorante, I ſhould not find fault with his Complaints; for being my Friend, I ſhould impoſe ſilence on him, or elſe deſire him not to ſee me till his Politick Humour were over. But all Men of his Humour, have of late got ſuch a cuſtom of eternal talking concerning the Publick-Good, and Matters of State, as that they are become inſupportable.

ſupportable. Some of them we ſee no ſooner come from School, but preſently they pretend to be Reformers of the Common-Wealth.

Some Women there are alſo, who having only as much Wit as to dreſs themſelves, will as boldly give their Opinions upon the moſt difficult Buſineſſes of State, as if they had the Wiſdom and Experience of Solon. In the mean time, it would be nothing ſo abſurd to ſee the Seven Sages of Greece buſy themſelves in the choice of Ribbons or Faſhions, as to ſee theſe young People of both Sexes meddle with Matters of Government: Truth is, (ſaid Cephiſe, and laughed as well as Piſiſtrates and I) Policy is ſo unfit a Subject for a whole Afternoon's Diſcourſe amongſt Ladies, as I will not meddle with it. For my part, (added I, to curry Favour with the Ladies) I will never talk of it with Women unleſs I be forced. And, for my part (ſaid Piſiſtrates crabbedly) I will talk of it as often as the mind takes me, for I am a declared Enemy againſt all manner of Injuſtice, and moſt zealous for the Publick-Good. But, I pray Sir, replied Cleorante, What good will theſe Complaints do you, or any elſe, be they never ſo juſt? For when you have ſpent a whole day in talking, all your Talk does nothing. Alſo you often reaſon upon falſe Grounds, added ſhe, becauſe you know the Things, and do not know the Motives; you propoſe an hundred Expedients which can never be followed; and therefore time is ill ſpent in talking of Evils which cannot be remedied by talking; and though it were poſſible to find Remedies, by changing the Government; yet I have heard many able Men ſay, it were better to live in a diſordered Government, than to alter it. And therefore, Piſiſtrates, the beſt courſe is to pray unto the Gods, that they would be pleaſed to place able Men at the Stern of Affairs; but if it ſhall not be their pleaſure to ſend ſuch, let us ſee their Faults, but not do them, and not ſpend our whole lives in talking of Policy, and making needleſs Complaints; unleſs, added ſhe, and laughed, you have ſome ſecret Deſign which you will not impart unto us; and unleſs, by vilifying the Government, you would incite the People to Rebellion, and make your ſelf the Tyrant of Athens. Since I cannot be ſo, but I muſt be yours alſo, Madam, replied he ſharply, I have almoſt a mind to endeavour it: For to have ſuch a Subject as you, I would not think the Name of Tyrant odious: But I ſee, Madam, ſaid he, you are not ſo zealous for the Liberty of your Country, but that you would hate me if I ſhould ſet it free. Truly, ſaid ſhe, and laughed, provided that in four and twenty hours ſpace you could make a Calm in Athens, that there ſhould be neither Civil nor Foreign War, and that you would make a Law forbidding talking againſt State-Matters, eſpecially young Gallants and Ladies, I ſhould not much care if you had the Government, becauſe I am perſwaded that there is much more Safety and leſs Faction in a Monarchical Eſtate, than in a Common-Wealth. But ſince this will never come to paſs, and ſince you cannot reign without abundance of Trouble and Diviſion, keep your ſelf content, I conjure you; and let us rather talk of Dancing, Muſick, Poetry, Painting, or any thing, than of Policy. Since you will not talk of what I would have you, replied Piſiſtrates, I will not talk of what you deſire; but I will ask you which you would rather chuſe, I ſhould be the Tyrant of Athens, or yours, as your Lover, or as your Husband? Cleorante is ſo generous, replied Cephiſe, that I can gueſs what ſhe will anſwer. For my part, replied I, I cannot ſo eaſily gueſs. And yet you eaſily may, (replied Cleorante) for you may imagine I had rather all the Athenians were Subjects unto Piſiſtrates, than that I were his Slave? But Cleorante, ſaid Cephiſe to her, where is your Love to your Country? But, Cephiſe, replied Cleorante, where is the Love to my ſelf? No, no, added ſhe, let us not deceive our ſelves; our particular Intereſt is dearer to us than the general; and all thoſe Zealots for their Country aim moſt at their own Good: Therefore I declare unto you, that I had rather a thouſand times Piſiſtrates were the Tyrant of Athens than mine. I am ſo far from being ſo, replied he, and looked upon her with abundance of Love, as I think nothing more impoſſible. If you take not good heed, Madam, ſaid Cephiſe, and ſmiled, as ſhe turned towards Cleorante, in your forbidding Piſiſtrates to talk of Policy, you will perhaps oblige him to talk of Love. Though I do not much love any ſhould ſpeak unto me of it, replied Cleorante, and laughed, yet ſo one talk gallantly of that Subject, I had rather be obliged to hear it, than to hear talk of State-Matters, eſpecially ſome certain Men in the World; for there are ſome whom it concerns not who governs, becauſe they have no Intereſt, yet do trouble themſelves as much, as if they had as much right to pretend unto it, as Piſiſtrates hath. But, Madam, replied he, is there any who have no Intereſt in the Government? Can Servants themſelves be happy, when their Maſters are not? I know not, ſaid ſhe unto him, in the pretrieſt fret in the World, whether they can or no; but I am ſure there is no great pleaſure in ſeeing you, when you have your Politick Humour in your Head. If you will, Madam, ſaid he unto her, I will never ſpeak of it again as long as I live. If you can do ſo, replied ſhe, and ſmiled, you will do me a great pleaſure. But, Madam, replied he, I will not engage my ſelf but upon this Condition, that I may ſpeak what I pleaſe both of you and my ſelf. Piſiſtrates had no ſooner ſaid ſo, but Cephiſe and I condemned her for accepting his Offer, yet for a while ſhe did forbid him; for, ſhe ſaid, what can he ſay of me and himſelf? If he tell me of my Faults, he will vex me; and if he commend me, he will not much divert me, for I do not love to be commended to my Face. Moreover, if he commend himſelf, I ſhall eſteem him leſs; and if he diſcommend himſelf, I ſhall think it a diſguiſed Pride. So that not ſeeing what pleaſure I can have in ſuffering him to ſpeak often both of himſelf and me, it muſt be concluded, that I do hate Policy in accepting his Propoſition.

Thus, Madam, this Treaty ended, and Piſiſtrates engaged himſelf to talk no more of State-Matters unto Cleorante, and Cleorante promiſed Piſiſtrates to let him ſay what he pleaſed, both of her and himſelf; yet not to have this Liberty, but when he was in his Humour of Policy. But, Madam, ſince this I aſſure you, he made uſe of his Priviledg, in telling her ſhe was the faireſt that ever he ſaw, and gave her good cauſe to believe he loved her more than ever any did: So that Cleorante having a Pretence for letting him ſpeak thus, without taking the thing as ſerious, ſhe managed the matter ſo handſomly, that when Erophile talked of returning unto Athens, Piſiſtrates had no more to ſay unto Cleorante, but that he was in good earneſt when he ſaid he loved her. However ſince Piſiſtrates ſtaid at the Baths, only becauſe Cleorante was there, he offered himſelf unto Erophile to be her Guard, ſo that we returned with her. Cephiſe and Ariſton alſo returned with us. But, Madam, be pleaſed to know, that an Accident happened, which ſtrangely perplexed Piſiſtrates; for it chanced unhappily, that when we were near Athens, we loſt our way; and to compleat the Diſaſter, Night being upon us, Erophile's Coach broke, and broke juſt before the Gate of a baſe Court, which ſeemed to belong unto a Houſe of a good Capacity. So that ſince we had no courſe, but to deſire the aſſiſtance of the Maſter of the Houſe, we lighted from our Horſes, and the Ladies came out of the Coach, and began to walk, whilſt Piſiſtrates went and deſired a Lodging for all this good Company in the great Houſe. So that going on foot to the Gate of this baſe Court, to know whoſe the Houſe was, he knock'd, and the Gates were opened: And they were no ſooner open, but within four paces of him, he ſaw Philombrotus his Wife, Cerinthe, Euridamia, and Lycurgus, who came out to ſee them; and having a deſign to walk into the Fields, took that way where the Coach was broken. You may imagine, Madam, how Piſiſtrates was ſurprized at this ſight; yet ſince he was ſo near Philombrotus, that he had no leiſure to conſider; and ſeeing there was no altering his Deſign, he went on very confidently, and ſaluted him and all the Ladies. After which, acquainting him with the Accident which had befalled Erophile's Coach, Philombrotus prevented him in the Requeſt he intended to make, and offered very nobly to lodg all that Company, towards whom he was walking with his. So that theſe two Companies meeting, you may conceive, Madam, in what a vexed Condition Piſiſtrates was; for beſides his loving Cleorante incomparably better than ever he loved Cerinthe or Euridamia, the ſight of Lycurgus diſpleaſed him, becauſe he underſtood by Ariſton that he was deep in Love with Cleorante; alſo he had an obſervant Eye over this Enterview: Truth is, he had ſo much ſatisfaction, as to ſee that Cleorante received his Rival very coldly.

In the mean, ſince Cerinthe and Euridamia had no Relations in the Bath, which had acquainted them with Cleorante's Conqueſt, they both of them looked upon Piſiſtrates as their own; ſo that they were both of them in their ways hugely civil unto him. Piſiſtrates on his ſide was the ſame; but he knew then very well, that theſe two Ladies, whom heretofore he thought to have fallen in Love withal, ſhould now never be but in the degree of Friends: And he perceived alſo, by the thoughts he had of Lycurgus, that he needed not to ask him of what Nature the Affection was which he had unto Cleorante, ſince he needed not to queſtion but it was Love. In the mean time Cerinthe and Euridamia finding Cleorante admirably fair that day, becauſe they knew not that ſhe had taken Piſiſtrates from them, they could not chuſe but commend her, whilſt Philombrotus and his Wife were talking unto Erophile. Truly, Madam, ſaid Cerinthe unto Cleorante, I do find you are ſo much imbelliſhed, that you perſwade me the Baths have indeed that Virtue which is attributed unto them. No, no, Madam, ſaid Piſiſtrates boldly, and interrupted her; Never aſcribe more unto the Baths than what's their due, for Cleorante returns, and never bathed; and that freſhneſs which you ſee upon her Cheek, is only an effect of her Youth, and her own Beauty; and I do proteſt, that out of a multitude of high Beauties which bathed every day, there was not one whoſe Luſtre ſhe did not dim. Since you went not to bathe your ſelf, replied Cerinthe, and bluſh'd for Anger at the Commendations which he gave Cleorante, it is to be thought, Madam, you went thither only to perplex the Hearts of all thoſe who ſaw you there. But you ſee, Madam, (replied ſhe, and pointed at Piſiſtrates, Ariſton, and me) that I have ſpared thoſe of my own Country; for they are too merry to have their Hearts wounded. Thoſe Wounds are ſo ſweet, replied I, ſeeing the non-plus of Piſiſtrates, that one may be glad to have them; and that Joy which appears in the Faces of Piſiſtrates, Ariſton, and me, is a convincing proof that you have not very much wounded us. On the contrary, replied Euridamia, and looked upon Piſiſtrates, I think it ſo glorious to be wounded by ſo fair a Hand, that it would be a difficult thing not to be joyed at it. However it be, (ſaid Cephiſe, not knowing the Intereſt which Cerinthe and Euridamia had in Piſiſtrates) I aſſure you there were not ſo many Men this Year unto whom the Baths have done good unto, as there are whom the Eyes of Cleorante have done hurt unto. For my part, ſaid Cerinthe, in way of Raillery, to try whether her Suſpicion were rightly grounded, I care not what hurt they have done unto the Men of Thebes, Delphos, Argos, or Megares, ſo the Athenians be free; but for them, I muſt confeſs, I would not have her bring them back Slaves. Piſiſtrates, Ariſton, and Silamis, do agree ſo well together, replied Euridamia, that there is no likelihood of their being Rivals. For my particular, ſaid Ariſton, I do declare openly, that I dare not be in Love with Cleorante, and am but only her Friend. For my part, ſaid Piſiſtrates, I will not ſo directly tell what I am, for me-thinks it is not handſom to tell, before all the World, whether one be in Love or no.

This Anſwer which Piſiſtrates made, was not interpreted after the ſame manner, for Cerinthe flattering her ſelf, did alter her Opinion, and thought that Piſiſtrates ſaid only ſo, becauſe he thought it not civil to tell a fair Lady to her Face, that he was not in love with her. Euridamia for her part, ſhe ſeeing no ſhare ſhe had in the Anſwer of Piſiſtrates, knew not whether the hidden ſenſe of his words related unto Cleorante or Cerinthe: But as for Lycurgus, the Looks of Cleorante did clearly evidence to him the obſcurity of Piſiſtrates his Diſcourſe; for this fair One turning her Eyes accidentally towards Piſiſtrates, Lycurgus ſaw ſhe took them off again in ſuch a manner, as made him judg, ſhe knew Piſiſtrates loved her more than he would tell: So that the very ſame words which extinguiſhed jealouſy in the Heart of Cerinthe, did kindle it in Lycurgus: They put Euridamia into doubt, and aſſured Cleorante of Piſiſtrates his Diſcretion.

In the mean time, Philombrotus and his Wife, who were talking with Erophile, beginning to walk towards their Houſe, and commanding ſome of their Servants to get the broken Coach mended, Cephiſe, Cleorante, Euridamia, Cerinthe, Piſiſtrates, Lycurgus, Ariſton, and I, did follow them; and Chance did ſo favourably order the Buſineſs for Piſiſtrates, that without any Exceptions, he helped Cleorante to walk; for it was the Cuſtom of the Country, for the Strangers always to go firſt: So Lycurgus led Cephiſe, Ariſton, Euridamia, and I Cerinthe. Truth is, ſhe ſpoke not much unto me, for ſhe had always ſomething to ſay unto Piſiſtrates, or unto Cleorante: Euridamia, for her part, ſhe entertained Silamis no better, and Lycurgus did not much divert Cephiſe. Truth is, Madam, as things ſtood, if we had ſtaid longer, we ſhould have been all weary: For though Piſiſtrates was not where he would be, ſince he was not at freedom, he thought himſelf nothing happy; and the preſence of his Rival, and thoſe two Friends who pretended to be his Miſtreſſes, did damp all his Pleaſures.

But being come into the Houſe of Philombrotus, they carried Erophile, Cephiſe, and Cleorante into a very fair Chamber, where they left them for a time at liberty to reſt themſelves. So that by this means Piſiſtrates was ingaged to be with Cerinthe and Euridamia, without Cleorante: Yet he carried himſelf well enough in this Diſcourſe, for ſince he always eſteemed them, and ſaw them both together, he ſpoke nothing which might make them think he was changed; and if they had ſeen him only out of Cleorante's Company, they would have believed him to be the ſame he was when he went from Athens. But they continued not long in theſe Thoughts, after Erophile, Cephiſe, and Cleorante came out of their Chambers, and went into a Parlor, which looked into a lovely Garden where Cerinthe, Euridamia, and all the reſt of the Company were: For as ſoon as Cleorante appeared, peared, Piſiſtrates went to her, and had ſo quite forgotten that Cerinthe and Euridamia obſerved him, as though ſhe had not been above half an hour out of his ſight, yet he ſeemed as glad to ſee her again, as if he had been Months from her: So that now the melancholy and merry Ladies began both to think one and the ſame thing, and concluded certainly that Piſiſtrates was in Love with Cleorante; for Cerinthe was vexed, and Euridamia was ſad, yet both of them had one equal Conſolation in the Adventure; for Cerinthe had rather loſe Piſiſtrates by Cleorante, than by Euridamia, and Euridamia had rather Cleorante ſhould get Piſiſtrates from her, than Cerinthe ſhould: Yet this poor Conſolation did not ſo much cheer them up, but that it might be eaſily obſerved there was ſomething in their Minds which did not pleaſe them; for Cerinthe's Raillery was a little too tart, and Euridamia's Melancholy would not give her leave to ſpeek: So that Cleorante having a diſcerning Wit, ſhe quickly perceived that theſe two Ladies pretended ſomething to the Heart of Piſiſtrates; and being full of curioſity to know the certainty, alſo knowing I was intimate with Piſiſtrates, ſhe ſo laid her Plot after Supper, that ſhe engaged me to talk with her, purpoſely to pump Satisfaction out of me.

On the other ſide, Cerinthe and Euridamia having a burning deſire to know all paſſages at Thermopiles between Piſiſtrates and Cleorante, they began to communicate their deſign, and to ſeek out ways to be informed: So that ſeeing Cleorante talk with me, Cerinthe fell into diſcourſe with Ariſton, intending to ſqueeze him, whilſt Euridamia talked with Cephiſe with the ſame Deſign: And ſince Philombrotus and his Wife talked low with Erophile, Piſiſtrates and Lycurgus were forced to talk together, though they had no great inclination to it: for Lycurgus knew well enough that Piſiſtrates was his Rival; and Piſiſtrates knew from Ariſton that Lycurgus was his: So that I do verily believe, Madam, never was Night paſſed with leſs agreeableneſs, where all the Company were rare accompliſhed Perſons. As for Piſiſtrates and Lycurgus, they were ſtrangely weary of one another : Cleorante was not over well pleaſed, becauſe I would not impart as much as ſhe deſired to know : Cerinthe and Euridamia were worſe ſatisfied, becauſe Cephiſe and Ariſton told them particularly many things, which made them think Piſiſtrates in love with Cleorante : But, Madam, the ſtrangeſt paſſage was, Ariſton had no ſooner told Cerinthe that he thought Cleorante had conquered the Heart of Piſiſtrates, but this malicious Lady, who knew not what Cephiſe had ſaid unto Euridamia, had a ſtrange impatience to let her know what Ariſton had told her, purpoſely to vex her, and to make her believe that ſhe cared not for it ; and indeed locking up all her Anger in her own Heart, and aſſuming into her Eyes her natural Blithneſs, ſhe took Euridamia apart, and told her as very good News, that ſhe knew by Ariſton, Piſiſtrates was in love with Cleorante.

But to drive her Malice a little further, ſhe ſpoke ſo loud unto Euridamia, that Lycurgus heard her, and if Piſiſtrates had not been in a deep ſtudy, he had heard her alſo ; for I heard her to the place where I was, though it was further off her than he was. In the mean time, Euridamia knowing well the Mind of Cerinthe, ſhe returned Malice for Malice, and did ſo aggravate unto her what Cephiſe had ſaid concerning the love of Piſiſtrates unto Cleorante, that ſhe netled Cerinthe, more than Cerinthe had her.

Thus theſe two Rivals in revenging themſelves upon one another, were revenged alſo upon him they had loſt ; for Lycurgus ſo well knew that Piſiſtrates was his Rival, that his Heart ſwell'd with Jealouſy and Hatred. In the mean time, after all theſe particular Conferences, a general Converſation began, which was no more pleaſing than the reſt, for ſince none ſpoke what they thought, it was very dull and drooping ; Nor did it laſt long, for as ſoon as Philombrotus made the motion unto Erophile of retiring betimes, becauſe ſhe ſaid ſhe would be ſtirring betimes in the Morning, none did oppoſe it, but every one willingly parted except Piſiſtrates, who could not ſo willingly part ſo ſoon from Cleorante. However, to compleat the Adventure, the Sun was no ſooner riſen, but Theocrite arrived, with Intentions to dine with Philombrotus; but in coming he met his Brother (whom Jealouſy had waked) walking in the way by which Erophile came the day before: So that lighting from his Horſe, he asked how Cerinthe did, whom ſtill he loved extreamly, though ſhe jeered him as much for his Gravity and Seriouſneſs, as ever ſhe did. So that Lycurgus having his Mind full of his own Vexations, and not being ignorant that his Brother had ſome jealouſy of Piſiſtrates, before he went to the Bath, he began to tell him who was in the Houſe. How? cried out Theocrite, extreamly vexed to find a Man there whom he thought to be his Rival, is Piſiſtrates here? Yes, (replied Lycurgus) he is, but it has pleaſed Fortune to make him more my Rival than ever he was yours: Then you are fallen in love with Cerinthe ſince I was here, replied Theocrite with as much wonder as grief: No, no, replied Lycurgus, but Piſiſtrates is fallen in love with Cleorante, whilſt he was at the Bath with her. Alas Brother, replied Theocrite, I muſt needs ask you pardon for not being able to grieve at your Miſfortune, for I find it ſo great a Happineſs to hear that Piſiſtrates is not my Rival, that I am not able to grieve at any thing: For a melancholy Man (replied Lycurgus churliſhly) you are the moſt ſenſible of Joy that ever I ſaw, ſince you can rejoice at my Miſery. When Piſiſtrates hath been as long your Rival as he hath been mine, anſwered Theocrite, you will pardon my Joys to find none. The truth is, perhaps you will not be ſo miſerable as I was, ſince he may chance find Cleorante not ſo kind as he did Cerinthe. Alas Brother, ſaid Lycurgus, there is a great difference between Cerinthe and Cleorante; for the firſt is capable neither of Hatred nor Love, and you had no reaſon to fear that Piſiſtrates could win any more upon her than any other, further than diverting her, which you could not do, becauſe your Humour was oppoſite unto hers. But as for Cleorante, though ſhe have ſome ſuitableneſs of Spirit with Cerinthe, yet ſhe has not ſuch a Heart, for I am ſure ſhe knows how to love and hate, and I am in danger to be the moſt miſerable Man in the World.

As Lycurgus ſaid ſo, Piſiſtrates, Ariſton, and I, came where they were: So that we were obliged to ſalute Theocrite, whom we had not ſeen before. But, Madam, the wonder was, this grave and melancholy Man accoſted us with a ſmile, and I obſerved it as a thing ſo extraordinary, as I came to Piſiſtrates and told him, that certainly Theocrite hath divined that he ſhould not be his Rival. In the mean time, ſince we knew that Erophiles's Coach was mended, and that ſhe would go betimes, we took the way towards the Houſe, where we found all the Ladies together, whom Theocrite ſaluted with ſuch a kind of Air, as was much leſs grave than was accuſtomed; yet I think Cerinthe had took no notice of him, had not I told her (as a thing extraordinary) that I had ſeen him almoſt laugh. Truly, ſaid ſhe, in the humour I am in, I ſhould be very glad if Theocrite could become as merry as Piſiſtrates, and Piſiſtrates as melancholy as Theocrite. Fie, Madam, ſaid I unto her, and ſmiled, I beſeech you why would you wiſh Piſiſtrates to be melancholy? Truly Piſiſtrates, replied ſhe, and laughed alſo, hath done nothing that concerns me: But I am ſo much obliged unto Theocrite, that the leaſt I can do for him, is to wiſh him merry and joyful. Seriouſly (ſaid I unto her) if you would once make him ſo by marrying him, I think he would be no longer melancholy. But the worſt for him is (replied ſhe) my Affection muſt precede his Mirth, and I would have it contrary, and ſee his good Humour precede my Affection. But, Madam, it was very obſervable, Theocrite was the leaſt melancholy of all the Company, though he was as melancholy a piece as ever lived; for Cerinthe being vexed at the change of Piſiſtrates, ſhe was not as ſhe uſed to be: Euridamia her Melancholy was double; Cleorante was angry to ſee that Lycurgus ſhould by his Looks and Words give out ſome Expreſſions of Jealouſy; nor was Piſiſtrates in any Joy, not only becauſe he was a little gravell'd between Cerinthe and Euridamia, but alſo becauſe Lycurgus continued his Affection unto Cleorante. As for Cephiſe, Ariſton and my ſelf, we were ſo afraid to diſoblige any one by laughing too much at all Paſſages, that to avoid it, we put on faces of Gravity and Sorrow as much as poſſibly we could. But at laſt we parted, yet not without Lycurgus, who feigning ſome earneſt buſineſs at Athens, returned with us, and was ſtrangely troubleſom unto us; though he was a Man very well accompliſhed, yet we were weary of him, becauſe he hindered us from laughing at all our Obſervations. Moreover, Piſiſtrates and he being never in the ſame opinion, they were ſo ſharp once in their Arguments, as we feared they would have quarrelled. But at laſt, the Cloud being blown over, we came to Athens, and after we had carried the Ladies to their Houſes, we all parted. In the mean time, ſince Euridamia and Cerinthe were long abſent, the Love of Piſiſtrates to Cleorante did grow ſo violent, and he ſo accuſtomed himſelf to ſee her, to love her and none elſe, that it had been a very hard matter to have made him change his courſe of Life: But, Madam, it was very obſervable, that Cerinthe being returned to Athens before Euridamia, and hearing that Piſiſtrates ſtirred not out of Cleorante's Houſe, that he made her many great Feaſts, and that all the World believed him in love with her, ſhe became the moſt indulgent Friend that ever was unto Euridamia: For ſhe writ unto her the next Morning, and ſo continued every Poſt whilſt ſhe ſtaid in the Country; and certainly ſhe wanted not matter, for not a day paſſed, but Piſiſtrates preſented Cleorante with ſome notable Diverſion or other, or elſe that he had not ſome wrangle with Lycurgus: So that Cerinthe thinking (and with reaſon) that ſhe could not get better Information than from a jealous Lover; ſhe treated Theocrite as kindly as ſhe could, purpoſely to make him her Spy, and tell her all he knew of his Brother, colouring her Curioſity with her deſire of knowing all Cleorante's Ways: So that Theocrite being very glad of ſuch a Commiſſion, did tell her, not only all he knew concerning his Brother, but all that he could imagine expedient to ſet Piſiſtrates further from her Heart.

Thus by this means Cerinthe did daily make great Relations unto Euridamia of all paſſages between Piſiſtrates and Cleorante, ſending her a moſt exact Deſcription of every thing, even to the very leaſt Circumſtance, purpoſely to be revenged upon her, ſince ſhe could not be revenged neither upon Cleorante nor Piſiſtrates; for conſidering that had it not been for Euridamia, ſhe had captivated Piſiſtrates before he went unto the Bathes, ſhe was a moſt extream ill Wiſher unto her: not that Cerinthe was of any humour of ever loving much, or grieving much for ſuch a loſs; but yet ſhe was ſo ſorry for it, ſo vexed, and ſo aſhamed, as one may almoſt ſay, that without either Love or Jealouſy, ſhe carried her ſelf, as if ſhe had two Paſſions at once in her Soul. In the mean time, ſince the return of Cleorante, Piſiſtrates took many Occaſions to ſpeak of his Love, and ſince he pleaſed her infinitely better than Lycurgus or any elſe, ſhe did not treat him unkindly; and though ſhe did not receive his Affection ſo well as he wiſhed, yet it was not out of any Averſion, but only out of Modeſty and Prudence; for certainly ſhe did infinitely eſteem him. Moreover, Madam, you muſt not imagine Piſiſtrates one of theſe eternal Sighers, who do nothing but pule and complain, and torment themſelves; nor one of thoſe who are continually talking of their Love, and nothing elſe; but on the contrary, he never talked of it long, nor but in two Faſhions, either in bare Gallantry and Mirth, or in making ſuch earneſt Proteſtations, expreſſed in ſuch affirmative Terms and Paſſionate, as there was no doubting of what he ſaid, ſo ſincere and vehement was he always in his diſcourſe.

In the mean while, as ſoon as Euridamia was returned out of the Country, Cerinthe gave her a viſit, purpoſely to ſee whether the news ſhe ſent her had wrought her deſired Effects upon her Cheeks and Eyes: Yet ſhe did not receive the pleaſure of her Hopes; for Cleorante being come thither, ſhe ſeemed ſo fair that day, that I do believe both her Rivals would in their Hearts confeſs they ought to yield unto her, and that Piſiſtrates had a good excuſe, though they had ſome right to accuſe him of Inconſtancy. However, though doubtleſs they knew that Cleorante was worthy of Piſiſtrates his Love, yet they thought him blameable, though to ſay truly, he was not; ſince he never had more than a good Inclination to love them, but never had profeſſed any particular Affection unto either of them. On the other ſide, Cleorante diſcovering at laſt the Thoughts of theſe two Ladies, ſhe thought her ſelf the more obliged unto Piſiſtrates, whoſe Love ſhe now received, both out of Honour, and out of Acknowledgment; yet in her talk to him, ſhe did not acknowledg either that he loved her, or ſhe him; and I do think that ſince the firſt time there were ever any Lovers, there was never diſcourſe like that they had one day, and which Piſiſtrates told unto me the day after.

For Piſiſtrates being one day after Dinner alone with Cleorante, proteſting that he loved her beyond all humane Expreſſions: Truly (ſaid ſhe, and interrupted him) I do not think you know well whether you love me or no: For to tell you truly, ſome days I think you love me much, and other days you make me believe you neither do, nor ever did love me. I ſee, Madam (ſaid he unto her) that you ſpeak this only becauſe you take delight to vex me: But, Madam, let me tell you, that what you ſay in Raillery, I can ſay in Seriouſneſs: For truly I muſt confeſs (if I may without Preſumption) that ſometimes I think you do eſteem me, and I ſee in your Eye a kind of amorous Glance which bids me hope: But ſometimes again, I think you to be abſolutely indifferent; and therefore, Madam, you would do me the greateſt Favour in the World, if you would be pleaſed ſeriouſly to diſcover the ſecret of your Heart unto me, that I may ſee upon what bottom I ſtand. Did I certainly know (replied ſhe, and ſmiled) upon what terms I am in your Heart, I could eaſily acquaint you upon what terms you are in mine; and to tell you truly, my Thoughts do ſo abſolutely depend upon yours, that I do not know whether I have any Affection unto you, or only Indifferency ; and therefore I muſt firſt know what Affection you have unto me, before I truly tell you what Affection I have to you. The way to know it, Madam, replied he haſtily, is to examine all my Actions, all my Words, and even all my Looks, and ſee whether all theſe do not tell you that I love you : For I do proteſt, Madam, I will not go out of your Chamber until you have poſitively told me whether you think I love you or no, and tell me alſo, how I am in your Opinion. To teſtify that I will do you Juſtice (ſaid ſhe, and lauged) I will examine all that you have done, and do you examine all that I have done, to the end we may both know what to think of one another : And indeed, Madam, they began to ſpeak of themſelves, as if they had ſpoken of ſome in whom they had no intereſt, and to examine their own Thoughts as really, as if they had not known them.

But after Piſiſtrates had forced Cleorante to confeſs, that ſhe had cauſe to think he loved her, yet ſhe would not ſay ſhe loved him, but ſaid, that though ſhe did think he loved her, yet he loved her only for himſelf, and that his Affection was byaſſed, and not unintereſted. Ah, Madam (ſaid he) I am eaſier to be contented than you are, for I proteſt I ſhould be ſo far from taking it ill you ſhould love me for your own ſake, that I ſhould think it much more glorious to love me ſo, than if you loved me for my ſelf only. You are ſo ſimple, ſaid ſhe, that I know not why I ſhould anſwer you. You are ſo pittileſs, Madam, (replied he) that I can ſay nothing, but tell you, That if you will not tell me upon what terms I am in your Mind, I will do all I can to delude my ſelf, and think that I am not upon ſuch bad terms as I imagined. But, Madam, without any further Repetition of this Conference ; In concluſion they agreed not to hate one another, and Cleorante not point-blank ſaying ſhe loved him, yet made ſuch a handſom choice of her Terms, that ſhe let him underſtand ſhe was glad he loved her : yet they had many little Jarrings, during which, he would ſeem as if he would return unto Cerinthe or Euridamia, but he quickly turned again to Cleorante; and though he gave ſome Minutes of Jealouſy unto Theocrite, he gave whole Months unto Lycurgus. In the mean time, Cerinthe having a crafty Wit, did ſo contrive the matter, as ſhe infuſed ſome ſparks of Jealouſy into Piſiſtrates, for ſhe had got Cleorante to a Feaſt, and ſpoke not a word unto her; and the Lady who invited her kept the Buſineſs very ſecretly. In the mean time, Lycurgus was the Man who made the Feaſt, though Cleorante knew not of it, when ſhe promiſed to be there, yet Cerinthe had not that full Satisfaction which ſhe expected: For, Madam, though Piſiſtrates was for ſome Hours a little jealous, yet out of a kind of pride, he would not ſeem to be ſo; for he was perſwaded, that whoſoever is jealous long, muſt of neceſſity have an ill opinion either of themſelves, or the Perſon loved. But, Madam, the oddeſt thing in Piſiſtrates was, I made him confeſs that his Jealouſy was daily, and without any new Accidents either from his Rival or his Miſtreſs, he was daily and hourly jealous, more or leſs, according to the ebb or flow of his Humour. Moreover, the quarrels which Piſiſtrates ſometimes had with Cleorante were ſo ſhort, that he had no ſooner declared War, but he negotiated for Peace; and he was ſo accuſtomed to love Cleorante, and to ſee her, that oft-times he would go unto her without any Intention, and when he had Buſineſs in another place: But, Madam, to aggravate this Accuſtomancy, as far as Imagination can go, I muſt tell you it is certain, that the leſſening of his Jealouſy was his accuſtoming himſelf ſo much to the ſight of his Rival, that he was hardly jealous at all, and that which would have augmented it in another, did leſſen it in him. However, though one ſingle Paſſion was not enough to oblige Piſiſtrates to hate his Rival Lycurgus, with whom Cleorante charged him to live civilly; yet two Paſſions did unite themſelves together, to move him unto it; for he underſtood that Lycurgus did afreſh endeavour to ſtir up the old troubles of Athens, which had put all the Attique Country in diviſion : So that Ambition being joyned to his Love, Lycurgus became intolerable to him, and to oppoſe him both in the one and the other, he cajoled and bandied with thoſe of his Faction, who were no ſmall number : For, Madam, be pleaſed to know, there were always three Factions amongſt the Attique People, which were always ready to rebel as ſoon as they found Commanders to countenance them : Thoſe towards the Sea always made one Body by themſelves ; thoſe of the Plain made another, and thoſe of the Mountains and Tradeſmen did always unite themſelves as ſoon as there was any diviſion in Athens. But, Madam, that which moſt perplexed Piſiſtrates was, that endeavouring to diſcover how Lycurgus cajoled amongſt thoſe of the Plain, he underſtood alſo that the Maritine Parts were alſo up, but all his care could not find out what moved them thereunto. Beſides this, there was another thing which did much diſquiet him : For though he did much endeavour to reconcile himſelf with Megacles the Father of Cleorante, yet he could not oblige him to renew cordially with him, though he did live civilly enough : So that he knew not how, either to enjoy his Miſtreſs, or to ruin his Rival. But his greateſt fear was, leſt Megacles ſhould unite himſelf with Lycurgus, for if he had, then he had been unhappy both in his Love, and in his Ambition, ſince his Party would have been thereby more weak, and he ſhould have loſt his Miſtreſs. You may imagine, Madam, whether that Piſiſtrates had not Buſineſs enough.

On the other ſide, Lycurgus being reſolved to get Piſiſtrates baniſhed, purpoſely to ſend him further from Cleorante, he did ſecretly inſinuate into the Minds of the People, that Piſiſtrates aſpired unto Tyranny ; and Theocrites, ſet on by Cerinthe, did hinder him as much as he could. As for Euridamia, ſhe being more prudent than Cerinthe, ſhe diſſembled her Thoughts, and cured her ſelf of her Weakneſs by that of her Friend. In the mean time I perceived Piſiſtrates had ſomething in his Mind which he would not impart unto me; yet he told me all that related unto Cleorante, but I could not ſee he had any reaſon to be unquiet at thoſe Paſſages, but was upon rather better terms with her than ever; yet for all that, he would not diſcover the bottom of his Heart unto me; and though I was the Confident of his Love, yet I was not of his Ambition; for knowing that I loved the tranquillity of my Country very well, he did not think I would approve of his Thoughts. Furthermore, ſince he knew I was ignorant of the Deſigns; he foreſaw, that if once things came to Extremity and Arms, then it would be no fit time to marry Cleorante: So that deſiring to diſpatch that before things were more imbroiled, he went unto her and asked her leave, that he might imploy all the Friends he had in Athens, to perſwade Megacles unto his Marriage with her: As for Erophile, he was ſure ſhe would willingly conſent unto it: And to prepare the Mind of Cleorante unto his Demands, he ſpoke unto her with as much tenderneſs as Love it ſelf could inſpire, and ſo earneſtly, that indeed the Heart of Cleorante was moved; and ſhe confeſſed that his Affection had moſt ſenſibly obliged her, and would anſwer him as far as Decency and Modeſty would permit: But when he preſſed her to conſent he might preſently marry her, ſhe changed colour. Alas Piſiſtrates, ſaid ſhe unto him, What do you ask? I ask, Madam, ſaid he unto her, to be happy. Say rather (replied ſhe) you ask not to love me any longer, but voluntarily to loſe all the Sweets that my Converſation can give you: For truly Piſiſtrates, Love may go beyond the Grave, but not beyond Marriage; and therefore I am perſwaded, that whoſoever would love always, ought not to marry the Perſon loved; and there is no more reaſonable Obſtacle to hinder the thoughts of Marriage than to know one loves: Eſteem in marriage doubtleſs is neceſſary, but there needs no violent Paſſion: Love may grow between People who marry, and may laſt after their Marriage, but it cannot long ſubſiſt, when as it is Love before Marriage; Experience hath ſhewed it a thouſand times, that Fruition gluts; and therefore Piſiſtrates ſince you love me, and ſince I ſhould be glad you ſhould always do ſo, talk no more of Marriage, at leaſt ſtay until my Father will force me to marry another; for in that caſe, come what Miſery will, I had rather hazard the ſeeing your Love die, than to live with any other than you. Your language, Madam, replied Piſiſtrates, hath ſomething in it, both ſo ſweet and ſo ſharp, that I know not whether I ſhould commend your Goodneſs, or complain againſt your Rigour. Truly, ſaid ſhe, you have no cauſe to complain, ſince I do not entertain one diſadvantagious Thought of you: But I muſt confeſs, I am ſo fearful to ſee that change in you, which I ſee in all Lovers once married, that I cannot fear any thing in the World more; for all Men that ever I ſaw, no ſooner become Husbands, but they ceaſe to be Lovers. And I have known ſome alſo, who have ceaſed to be civil unto thoſe who formerly they adored, and who care not a ſtraw for their Miſtreſſes, as ſoon as they are their Wives. I know, Madam, ſaid he unto her, that it ſometimes happens as you ſay, but I am ſure it will never happen ſo to me. So every one before they marry, think, replied ſhe; and therefore you can give me no ſecurity of your Affection. I muſt confeſs, ſaid ſhe unto him, that I am perſwaded you will love me as long as we are in the ſame condition we already are: but I am perſwaded alſo, that you would not love me either more or leſs, if you ſhould marry me: yet I do not tell you, that I will never marry you, for I have already told you, that rather than marry another, and be obliged to break with you, I would hazard the loſing of your Affection. Moreover, though I were not in this mind, yet I would not adviſe you at this time, to make any ſuch Propoſition to my Father, for he is of late ſo froward and unquiet, that I think it would be a hard matter to make any Propoſition which would pleaſe him. Since this laſt Reaſon, Madam, replied Piſiſtrates, is full of ſolidity, I cannot gainſay it; but for the other, I will oppoſe it with all my ſtrength, and proteſt unto you, with as much Sincerity as Love, that whenſoever I ſhall be ſo happy as to become your Husband, I ſhall then vow my ſelf your eternal Lover. However, Piſiſtrates for all this, was forced to obey Cleorante, and not ſpeak unto Megacles in a time when he was ſo melancholy, leſt he ſhould receive a perverſe Anſwer. But, Madam, things being in this condition, Solon returned to Athens, where he was not ſorry to find Piſiſtrates in Love, becauſe he hoped that Paſſion would choak his Ambition. Yet he was extreamly ſad, when going to viſit Euridamia (who as I told you was his Couſin) he ſaw Cleorante: For, Madam, be pleaſed to know, Solon found her ſo prodigiouſly like a Daughter of his, named Policrite (who married unto a Prince of the Iſle of Cyprus, called Philoxipe) that her Mirrour could not repreſent a more near and lively Reſemblance. Now, Madam, the cauſe of his Sadneſs was, becauſe on a time when the famous Epimenedes was at Athens, he told him, by a Spirit of Divination, that his Wife, who was then great with Child, ſhould be delivered of a Daughter, and that he ſhould not educate her at Athens, becauſe if ſhe lived there, he would be in danger of ſo much Sorrow, as to ſee her make the Tyrant of her Country fall in Love with her. So that Solon ſeeing Cleorante at Euridamia's, and ſeeing her great reſemblance with Policrite, he was extreamly ſurprized at the Love which Piſiſtrates bore her; or he conjectured, and with reaſon, that ſince he loved Cleorante, he would alſo have loved Policrite, whom ſhe ſo perfectly reſembled; ſo that beginning to fear that Piſiſtrates would make himſelf Maſter of Athens, he began to have a vigilant Eye over his Actions. Yet he ſpoke not then of his Fear, nor of the Cauſe: but ſince that, he expreſſed himſelf unto many of his intimate Friends. However, this famous Man commended the Beauty of Cleorante very highly: and as ſome told him, that his Laws had united the Hearts of the Athenians a long time; he turned towards her, They have done you wrong, Madam, (ſaid he unto her) for I am perſwaded, that to keep the peace of Athens at this preſent, is to have all the brave and ambitious Gallants to think of nothing, but how to conquer your Heart, and not to think of ſowing Seditions amongſt the People; therefore (added he, preparing to go away) I commit them all into your Cuſtody, in hopes to find them all more amorous than ambitious, and no other diſorder in the Town, but between Rivals: And I do proteſt unto you (ſaid he, and ſmiled) that if you do not inſpire them all with the Love of their Country, I will attribute unto you, all the Evils they ſhall commit: and complain againſt you, more than they ſhall of your Severity. Solon ſpoke this with ſuch a noble Air, and ſo becoming ſuch a Man as he was, that none could comprehend that there was a double Senſe in his Words; And Cleorante anſwered as unto a bare Civility, proteſting unto him, that ſhe had not ſo much vanity as to think ſhe could do that which his Laws could not. However, Madam, Solon went from her, and went away, in a deep ſtudy, for he had ever found Epimenides ſo true in all his Predictions, as he extreamly feared he would not fail in this. Moreover, he was very inquiſitive into the Actions of Lycurgus, Theocrites, and Piſiſtrates; and underſtood how thoſe of the Plain, thoſe of the Sea-ſide, and thoſe of the Mountain, were up in Arms: ſo that he plainly ſaw all humane Prudence was moſt uncertain; for he now apprehended that the love of Piſiſtrates, of Lycurgus, and of Theocrites, was the true cauſe of all the Athenian Diviſions, though it did not appear ſo in the Eyes of the People, and conſequently that he was in the wrong, when he rejoiced to hear that Piſiſtrates was in Love; and that he had ſaid, that as long as the Gallants of our City were Slaves to the Beauties, they would never think of becoming our Maſters. The worſt was, his Travels had weakned him, and his Age would not let him act with the ſame vigour for the Common-Good, as formerly he had; for he had not ſtrength enough to make Speeches in publick, yet he was ſo induſtrious, as he was able to calm this Storm, which threatned the Common-wealth, and in order to that he ſpoke unto all the Ring-leaders of the Parties, and addreſſed himſelf firſt unto Piſiſtrates, to perſwade him unto Quietneſs, and not to aſpire unto any higher Glory, than to be the Protector of the Athenian Liberty. Piſiſtrates did outwardly receive the Admonitions of Solon ſo well, that any other but he would have thought he had no hidden Ambition in his Heart, nor any further Deſign, than to oppoſe Lycurgus; yet old Birds are not catch'd with Chaff, nor could Solon be deceived, for he made no Queſtion, but either out of the Hatred to his Rival, or Love to Cleorante, or elſe Ambition, he aſpired to be Maſter of Athens; ſo that Solon uſed all the Arguments that Eloquence and Reaſon together, had moſt prevalent and perſwaſive to diſſwade Piſiſtrates from it, who not directly oppoſing what he ſaid, he aſſur'd him only in general without any particularizing, that he would never do any thing which would hurt the Athenians, proteſting that all his Aim was to thwart Lycurgus.

On the other ſide, Solon, who knew the bottom of the Buſineſs, did ſpeak unto the Rival of Piſiſtrates, perſwading him to think no more upon Cleorante, but to ſacrifice that Paſſion for the tranquillity of his Country, aggravating ſo eagerly the grandure of the Crime in thoſe who begin Sedition in a State, as it was impoſſible for any Man to ſay more. For (ſaid he unto him) the Fire which you kindle, will not extinguiſh when you would have it; and the heart-burnings which are between Piſiſtrates and you, paſſing into the Hearts of all thoſe who follow your ſeveral Factions, will divide Brothers againſt Brothers, Fathers againſt Children, Servants againſt Maſters, and make ſo great a diſorder in Athens, that you cannot chuſe but abhor your own Actions, when you ſhall ſee the ſad Conſequences of them. Moreover, do but conſider that one of theſe two muſt needs follow, you muſt either prove a Slave unto your Rival, if his Party prove ſtronger than yours, or elſe you muſt be the Tyrant of Athens, if your Party prove ſtronger than his: Judg then, I pray, in the choice of theſe two, Tyrant or Slave, it be not much better to continue a good honeſt Citizen. Cleorante (added he) is not the only fair one in all Athens: If you do but well conſider all the Miſeries which fall upon a State divided, you will find the enjoyment of Cleorante (who loves your Rival better than ſhe does you) will never recompence the vaſt number of Crimes which are commited during the Diſorders which you have cauſed. The truth is, Madam, Solon's Arguments ſo wrought upon Lycurgus, as he told him, provided Piſiſtrates would renounce the Poſſeſſion of Cleorante as well as he, then he would ceaſe being his Enemy. But Solon knowing very well that Piſiſtrates would never be brought to that, he thought upon another Expedient, which was, to go unto Megacles, and perſwade him to make a publick Declaration, that he would never give his Daughter either unto Piſiſtrates or Lycurgus. But Megacles having ſome hidden Deſign, received the perſwaſions of Solon ſo ill, as it was eaſy to ſee he had a ſhare in the Diviſions of Athens; and indeed he diſcovered that it was he who was the Patron of the Maritine Rebels; but for all his diſcovery, things grew higher and higher. In the mean time Piſiſtrates was extreamly perplexed to find out who it was that made the third Party in Athens; for though Solon knew it, yet he told not him, conceiving better to have three revolted Factions, than one; and he uſed all his Wits to keep any two of them from joining: he could not apprehend that Piſiſtrates and Lycurgus would ever comply, becauſe Rivals will never be of one ſide; but his fear was, that Megacles ſhould fall into one of them; yet after better information of things, that fear was alſo frivolous, for he underſtood that though Megacles would, yet the Maritine People would not conſent, but forſake him: and the truth was, there was ſuch a Feud between the Maritine People, and the Plains, as they would never unite: for being a duller ſort of People than the other, and more mutinous; the Maritines have a fancy, that they are Men who hold up the Glory of Athens, and are able to do it by force; ſo that ſcorning the other, there can never be any good correſpondency between them; ſo that Solon, though not able to reunite all the City, yet had this conſolation at leaſt, that none of the three Factions could correſpond and unite with one another.

On the other ſide, Cerinthe ſtill put Theocrite upon Lycurgus, purpoſely to be revenged upon Piſiſtrates; and ſince his Gravity did better ſuit with that Imployment, than with Gallantry, his Negotiation with Lycurgus, better pleaſed him, than diſcourſing of his Love. Furthermore, Philombrotus who knew not the Secret Deſigns of Piſiſtrates, and who thought, that he ſtirred only in oppoſition of thoſe who diſturbed the Publick Peace; he went unto him, and offered himſelf, with all his Friends; and, to acquaint him, That Megacles was the Chief of the Maritine Faction; adding, That, he was ſure, they were more oppoſite unto him, than unto Lycurgus. You may judg Madam, how Piſiſtrates was ſurprized, when he underſtood by the Father of a Lady, whom he loved not, that the Father of her he did love, was the Patron of a Faction oppoſite unto his: And, what a ſtrange Combate there was in his Heart, betwixt his Love and his Ambition. At firſt he would not believe it; but, afterwards, Philombrotus did ſo particularize things unto him, upon his own knowledge, that he did not doubt the Truth: He hath told it ſince, that his firſt thought was, to ſacrifice his Ambition unto his Love, and to lay aſide all Faction; but when he conſidered, that his Rival's Party was puiſſant, and that it was impoſſible to joyn his Faction with that of Megacles; he thought it more expedient, that his Ambition ſhould ſerve his Love; and, ſo he would not contend any more with himſelf: Yet, making it a ſcruple of Generoſity, to make uſe of the Father of Cerinthe and his Friends, conſidering upon what terms he was with his Daughter; he did not accept of that offer which Philombrotus made him, nor did he flatly refuſe it, leſt he ſhould fall in with one of the either two Factions, and entreated him, to give him all Intelligence he could. But, after he was gone, Piſiſtrates was extreamly afraid, that Cleorante ſhould take it ill, when ſhe knew the truth. However, he would not tell her, that he was of a Faction contrary to Megacles, and Lycurgus both: But, to take a middle Courſe, that Cleorante might not be incenſed when ſhe knew the paſſages, he employed one of his Confidents, to propound unto Megacles an Union of their two Factions, though he knew it a thing almoſt impoſſible to be effected; but he did it only, to have ſome excuſe for himſelf, if Cleorante ſhould offer to accuſe him.

And indeed, this Propoſition unto Megacles ſerved only to make him think, that his Ambition was the only means to ſatisfie his Love: for, Megacles told the Man who made the Motion, That he had no Faction, nor did he think Piſiſtrates had any; but ſince it ſeemed he had, he would deſire him to come no more at his Houſe, becauſe he would not have it ſaid, he had any friend, who was a troubler of the Common-Wealth. You may eaſily imagine Madam, how ſad Piſiſtrates was, when he was debarred from ſeeing Cleorante, eſpecially, when meeting him at a Friend's Houſe, the next Morning after by chance; ſhe told him, That her Father had charged her not to ſee him; and asked him the reaſon of it? But, after he had acquainted her with the Propoſition he had made, and the cruel Anſwer he had received: I beſeech you Madam, (ſaid he unto her) be not ſo unjuſt as Megacles, and do not hate me. Certainly, I ſhall not hate you, unleſs you give me cauſe (replied ſhe,) but let me tell you, I ſhall extreamly complain againſt you, if you be an Enemy to my Father: I wiſh to the Gods, he would not bandy any Faction in Athens; but, ſince I cannot hinder him, I muſt conjure you not to oppoſe him. I do not deſire you ſhould unite with him; but, I deſire you, to do any thing that may preſerve Peace. Alas, Madam, (ſaid he unto her,) ſince Lycurgus ſtrives all he can to embroil the State, and ruine me, I know not what to ſay; all I can promiſe is, only to oppoſe my Rival without any thoughts of hurt unto Megacles: But withal, let me tell you, Madam, That, if Fortune do ſo imbroil things, that I cannot enjoy you, unleſs I be the Tyrant of Athens, I ſhall endeavour it, rather than ſuffer Lycurgus to enjoy you. Ah, Piſiſtrates, (ſaid ſhe unto him,) theſe are ſtrange Expreſſions. My caſe is ſo, (replied he) that the moſt innocent wiſh I can make, is, That I were powerful enough to be revenged upon Lycurgus; and, to force Megacles to let me love you: But, as for him, Madam, I beſeech you, fear nothing, ſo will you only leave Lycurgus to my revenge. I cannot allow it, replied ſhe, but content your ſelf, that I do not defend him; carry your ſelf towards my Father, as you may not drive me to the neceſſity of never ſeeing you again, and of ſeeming to hate you, though I do not; for, Piſiſtrates, deceive not your ſelf, but be confident, that I will never become yours, without the conſent of him, who hath moſt due to diſpoſe of me. Perhaps, I have engaged my Heart unto you a little too far, without his permiſſion; but believe it, I will not make good my faults by ſeconding them: And, though I did love you more than I ought, yet I can take up, and do ſo no more. Thus Madam, the meeting of Piſiſtrates and Cleorante paſſed. Much more had they to ſay unto one another, but ſince Cleorante came out, without her Mother's knowledg, they parted ſooner than they deſired, and with much ſorrow. On the other ſide, Cerinthe hearing, that Philombrotus offered to comply with the Faction of Piſiſtrates, ſhe was exceedingly grieved; for, ſince ſhe had much contributed by the means of Theocrite, to make Lycurgus powerful, and to animate him againſt Piſiſtrates; ſhe ſaw ſhe had tranſacted againſt her own Father; and conſequently, wrought her own Ruin. But, though to ſee her Father ſerve Piſiſtrates was very much againſt her mind; yet ſhe knew not whether ſhe ſhould forbid or command Theocrite to go on: for to tell him, he ſhould continue on as he doth, is to work her Father's and her own Ruin; and to forbid him, was to fortify the Faction of Piſiſtrates, or at leaſt, weaken his Enemies; ſo that ſhe was as much perplexed, as Cleorante, who had at leaſt ſo much ſatisfaction as to know, that ſhe had no hand in the Diſorders which were ready to break out.

Furthermore, Theocrite very deſirous to ruine Piſiſtrates, ſince thereby he was more in the Favour of Cerinthe, and did his Brother ſervice; yet, he began to fear, that if Lycurgus ever married Cleorante, Piſiſtrates would then return unto Cerinthe, and ſo from his Brother's Rival, he would become his. As for Lycurgus, all his Plots were, how to ruin his Rival. But, whileſt the Souls of all theſe were ſwelled with theſe tumultuous thoughts, I did ſometimes viſit Euridamia, who being cured of her weakneſs, did ſpeak of things paſt unto me, with as much ſincerity, as ſhe did of Changes preſent, with confidence. At firſt, ſhe thought, that I knew of all the Plots of Piſiſtrates: But afterwards, I told her ſo ſeriouſly, that I was only the confident of his Love; that ſhe believed me, and talked to me afterwards, as unto one who loved the Tranquillity of my Country; ſo we condoled together the Miſeries which we imagined it was like to fall unto. For, every one whiſpered, that ſome ſad ſtory was plotting; and, which ere long would break out: And, there was then ſuch a ſtrange diſmayedneſs in the Minds of all thoſe, who took none of theſe three Factions, that they could not endeavour the remedy of thoſe Miſeries they foreſaw. They imployed whole days in telling one another all were undone, and that Common-Wealth was ready to be ruin'd, but they went no farther: And, whileſt all the Factions did cavil with every one of their Parties, all thoſe who were of no Faction, lock'd themſelves up in their own Houſes, unleſs they went ſometimes to condole with a Friend, who was of their Opinion. As for my ſelf, ſince I ſaw Piſiſtrates was not willing to open his Heart unto me; and knowing Ariſton was the only Confident of his Ambition, as I was of his Love, I asked him no farther, nor did he impart any farther, not talking any more with me concerning Cleorante; becauſe, as the ſtate of Things then ſtood, he could not talk of her, but of other paſſages alſo, which he would not have me know, becauſe he knew I was an enemy to all Novelty; and had often heard me ſay, That I had rather obey a Tyrant who reigned peaceably, than begin a War to ruine him. However, Piſiſtrates being a Man of huge Parts, of all thoſe who ſtirred in the Common-Wealth, he ſeemed leaſt buſie; yet acted as high as any other: 'Tis true, the Grandees of each Faction had their Meetings more in the Night, than the Day; ſo that, I can aſſure you, Piſiſtrates, Lycurgus, and Megacles, hardly ſlept all the while.

Things ſtanding on theſe terms, Piſiſtrates having reſolved upon a Conference ſecretly, with ſome new Seditious Perſons, who were out of the Town, he intended, (after he had paſſed away moſt of the Night, in going from houſe to houſe, to make ſure of his Faction,) to go out of Athens in a Coach by break of day, and ſo he did, without any with him, but one ſervant. But, Madam, when he was about fifteen Furlongs from the Town, he was ſet upon, by four Men, againſt whom he did ſo couragiouſly defend himſelf, that they could not kill him; for they eſpied ſo many coming towards them afar off, as they durſt not ſtay it; and, ſeeing Piſiſtrates bleed ſo extreamly faſt, doubtleſs they thought his Wounds Mortal, though they were not. But a Country Fellow who ſaw the paſſage ſome hundred paces off, did tell me ſince, That Piſiſtrates did do even Miracles at that time: But, he ſeeing himſelf all bloody, and perceiving he was not dangerouſly wounded, he would, if he could, draw ſome advantage from the Misfortune: So that taking his Coach, he went back to the Town, in a fit condition to move the People, for he was bloody from top to toe. And, he came unto the Town very luckily, for there was a great Number of People gathered together in a great Place within Athens, which he croſſed over; all which were of his Faction. So that when Piſiſtrates had told the People, that his, and the Common-Wealths Enemies, had brought him unto that Condition, there began a great murmuring againſt Lycurgus, and Megacles, amongſt the People. Many of the two contrary Factions turned on Piſiſtrates his ſide: And the Object was ſo pitiful, and moved the Hearts of the People ſo much, that in a quarter of an hours ſpace, Piſiſtrates had a bundance of Men of all ſides, ready to take up Arms in his Defence. In the mean time, when he ſaw the People much moved, he went home to get himſelf dreſſed, but he was followed with a huge Herd of People, who encreaſed ſtill, every one relating the Accident according to his Fancy or Paſſion. Some ſaid, Megacles wounded him with his own Hands. Others ſaid, It was Lycurgus. And others again, that it was Theocrites. Yet there were ſome who ſaid, That Piſiſtrates blooded himſelf, only to move the People to compaſſion; but his own Party were ſo far from believing this, that they gave no faith to the witty quibble which Solon put upon him, when he met him in that pickle, and ſaid, That he played the part of Ulyſſes in Homer but very ill; for, you, (ſaid he) wound your ſelf, to delude your own Citizens; but he wounded himſelf, to deceive his Enemies.

But, Madam, neither Solon, nor any elſe, was hearkned unto; and this wiſe Law-maker did ſtrive in vain to lay the Storm; yet he did cauſe an Aſſembly at Prituuea, the place where they uſed to conſult upon Publick Affairs: There he alſo conſulted to ſee whether there was any Remedy againſt ſo great a Tumult: As for Lycurgus and Megacles, their care was to keep themſelves from being ſurprized, and to purge themſelves of an Act that was imputed unto them; ſo that Megacles was at the Pyrean Gate, in the Head of a great number of his Faction; and Lycurgus was by the Temple of Minerva, with many of his Friends. In the mean while the General Council being aſſembled, Ariſton who was there, ſpeaking very vehemently againſt thoſe who would have killed Piſiſtrates, and rehearſing all the good Services he had done for the Common-Wealth, particularly, the taking of Megares and Nyſea: He ſaid, after all this, that it was but fit that the Common-Wealth ſhould allow him a Guard for the ſafety of his Perſon: which Motion was approved of, by the major Vote; yet Solon did moſt eagerly oppoſe it, by Orations unto the People, with incredible vigour: yet all his Oppoſition was in vain; and the Council not having the boldneſs of Solon, durſt not be againſt the People, who ſaid, Piſiſtrates ſhould have a Guard, and that without limiting him to any number; and indeed ſo he had that very ſame hour, and Ariſton made choice of them.

But, Madam, you may well imagine in what a condition Cleorante and Cerinthe were, during ſo great a Tumult: As for the firſt of them, ſhe was as much troubled as any one poſſibly could be; for one of her Women had told her, that her Father had killed Piſiſtrates, and that he himſelf was like to be ſerved ſo by the Friends of Piſiſtrates: and therefore, Madam, it may well be conceived how ſad a Perſon ſhe was, whoſe Lover was dead, who though her own Father had killed him, and was alſo in the ſame danger himſelf; yet ſhe was quickly better informed concerning Piſiſtrates: but ſince ſhe heard he was wounded, and knew not what would become of her Father, ſhe ſtill remained much troubled; yet ſhe could never believe that her Father would ever be a Murderer, nor did ſhe much ſuſpect Lycurgus: and I am verily perſwaded, that this wicked Act was done by ſome reſolute Men, whoſe Zeal to Liberty became Fury; and Piſiſtrates himſelf was of that Opinion.

As for Cerinthe, you may alſo imagine, that ſhe had many diſquieted thoughts, for ſhe knew that Philombrotus was gone to Piſiſtrates, whoſe Party ſhe was an ill-wiſher unto, tho ſhe would not have Piſiſtrates periſh in it. In the mean time the Wounds of Piſiſtrates being but ſlight, though he had loſt much Blood, he preſently appeared in Publick; but he appeared with Guards, whoſe Number did every day increaſe; and hearing that Lycurgus and Megacles were treating together, and perhaps would unite, and make him loſe at once both that Sovereign Authority unto which he aſpired, and Cleorante alſo, he prevented them, by ſeizing upon a Caſtle which commanded all the Town.

But, Madam, ſince he thought no leſs of being Cleorante's Maſter, as Maſter of Athens, he gave order, that as ſoon as ever he was in the Caſtle, ſome Men ſhould go into the Houſe of Megacles, and ſeize upon his Miſtreſs, with her Mother. But Erophile and Cleorante being quicker in their Courſes than the Men who had that Order, they were not to be found; for Megacles no ſooner heard that Piſiſtrates had ſeized upon the Caſtle, and that all his Friends were up in Arms, but he thought of flying, and ſent in all haſte to his Wife and Daughter to come unto the Pyrean Port, where then he was, yet ſhe did not obey him; for the Tumult was ſo great in the Town, that her Coach could not paſs, and therefore ſhe reſolved to take Sanctuary in the Temple of Minerva, where ſhe might be ſafe, and where ſhe and Cleorante ſtaid amongſt the Nuns; And indeed there ſhe was received with Cleorante, and ſhe ſent to acquaint Megacles with her Reſolution, ſo that ſince he could do no otherwiſe, he retired. Lycurgus, for his part, he hearing that his Rival was Maſter of Athens, went to the Houſe of Megacles to ſeize upon Cleorante; but not finding her there, he was grieved to the Soul that his Miſtreſs was in his Rival's Power: And Theocrites was no leſs, ſince he was to be abſent from Cerinthe by his going out of Athens. However, both Lycurgus and he had no other courſe to take, but to retire, for the Tumult was ſo great through all the Town, as never was the like known; all the Men who were of the oppoſite Parties did fly with equal haſte; thoſe of the victorious Party ſeized upon all the Publick Places; and all the Citizens, who loved Peace, did ſhut themſelves up in their own Houſes, and durſt not oppoſe the loſs of their Liberty: Yet Solon, in the heat of this great Tumult, went into the Streets, exhorting the People to take up Arms, and prevent their Slavery, and ſhake off the Yoke which would be impoſed upon them. He chid them for their baſe tameneſs of Spirit, and neglected no Argument which might move them to oppoſe Piſiſtrates; but all was in vain, for the People were more willing to enter into Fetters, than take up Arms for their Liberty. So that after this Solon went home, and told all he met, that after all his Endeavours, he had gotten this ſatisfaction at the leaſt, that he was the laſt Man that would enter into the Athenian Slavery.

ry. Some of his Friends adviſed him to fly, but he would not, ſaying, he could never ſerve his Country in flying, but might happily by ſtaying.

In the mean time, though Piſiſtrates might well have reſted ſatisfied with ſeeing his Rival fly, and all his Enemies out of Athens, yet for two days he thought himſelf very miſerable; for he thought Megacles or Lycurgus had carried Cleorante with them: but at laſt having diſcovered that ſhe was in the Temple of Minerva, he went to viſit her, as ſoon as he had taken all neceſſary Orders for the Security of Athens; and to let her ſee, that though he had uſurped Sovereign Authority, yet he did not intend that his Government ſhould be Tyrannical; and he ſent to ask Permiſſion to ſee Erophile and Cleorante, as if he had been only a ſimple Citizen: Alſo he ſent unto Solon, and aſſured him, that the Alteration of Government ſhould not change any of thoſe Laws he had made, but that he would be the firſt who would obſerve them. But, Sir, Solon anſwered Piſiſtrates ſo generouſly and ſharply both, that one of his Friends ſaid, he did himſelf wrong in ſpeaking as he did; for, truly, ſaid his Friend, what do you truſt in, that you ſhould ſpeak ſo boldly? In my Age (anſwered he) for I have ſo ſhort a time to live, that I hazard little in hazarding it; and I ſhould loſe much more if I ſhould loſe my Honour, by flattering my old Friend in his humour of Tyranny.

In the mean time Piſiſtrates being then in a condicition not to be denied any thing, the Governeſs of the Nuns, in the Temple of Minerva, conſented to his Requeſt: 'Tis true, he ſaw none but Cleorante, for Erophile was not well. At firſt Cleorante made ſome ſcruple at ſeeing Piſiſtrates, but her Mother commanding her, to the end ſhe might ſpeak for her Father, ſhe willingly obeyed. To give you an exact Account of all theſe two ſaid, Madam, is more than I can do; for they ſaid ſo much, that I believe themſelves would have a hard task to remember all; yet I underſtood that Cleorante received him very faintly; ſhe chid him for his Ambition, and ſaid, had he been more in Love, he would have been leſs Ambitious. Madam, (ſaid he unto her) you do not well underſtand things if you believe all you ſpeak, for, truly, though I was weary of obeying ſo many bad Commanders, yet I do proteſt, if Lycurgus had not made any Attempts, I had reſted in quiet: But, Madam, when I ſaw my ſelf in a condition to loſe you, and to become a Slave to my Rival, it was time to fly unto the laſt Refuge. Moreover, Madam, It was not long of me that Megacles ſtaid not in Athens, for I uſed all means poſſible to comply with him; and had I not known that he fell in Treaty with Lycurgus, and that you were to be the Hoſtage in the hand of my Enemy, Athens had yet been in the unhappy condition of being governed by a rude Multitude. However it be, ſaid Cleorante, my Father is exiled Athens, he ſpeaks of you as his Enemy, and looks upon you as a Man who hath ruined the Liberty of his Country; therefore, without further examination of the Matter, I require three things from you: Firſt, Not to attribute what you have done unto that Affection you had unto me: The ſecond, To let my Mother and me go out of Athens unto my Father: And the third, To content your ſelf with driving out your Enemies, and not to take away the Liberty of the Athenians. I ſhall think my ſelf exceedingly miſerable to deny you any thing, Madam, (anſwered he) but truly ſo it is, I cannot conſent unto any of theſe; for truly I cannot, without a groſs Lie, ſay, that it was my Ambition more than Love which made me Maſter of Athens; nor can I permit you to go out, ſince then you would certainly fall under the Power of my Rival, with whom Megacles hath doubtleſs concluded the Treaty which he began; nor can I put my ſelf out of that Authority which the Gods have put into my Hands, ſince there is my only hope of moving Megacles to conſent unto my happineſs, in letting you be the partaker of it: So, Madam, though I had no Ambition, and though I were not perſwaded as I am, that the alteration of Government is advantagious unto the Athenians, yet my Love only is enough to deſire things ſhould be as they are: for, to be ſerious, I had rather be the Tyrant of Athens, than to loſe my hopes of enjoying you, or to ſee you in poſſeſſion of my Rival. But to teſtify, that my Love tranſcends my Ambition, ſince you are ſo zealous for the Athenian Liberty, I am ready to go out of it, upon condition it may be with you. Yes, Madam, after I have made my ſelf Maſter of the moſt famous City in all Greece: After I have driven out all my Enemies, and put my ſelf in a condition to make all the Athenians happy in governing them better than they were before: yet I will forſake all, provided you will follow my Fortune, and let us live together in ſome Aſian Kingdom: for, I confeſs, Madam, I have ſuch an averſion againſt all divided Authority, that I had rather be the Slave of a Great King, than to be the greateſt Citizen in any Common-Wealth: and therefore, Madam, it reſts only upon you, what I muſt reſolve upon. The Remedy which you propoſe, replied ſhe, being worſe than the Diſeaſe I deſire to cure, I will not accept of it, for, thanks be to God, I have no hand, either in my Father's Miſery, or in any of your Actions: But I ſhould have a great ſhare in them all, if I ſhould follow your Fortune, without the conſent of thoſe who have a right to diſpoſe of me.

In the mean time, I have a great deal of reaſon to complain againſt you, for denying me every thing I ask. Ask me any thing, replied he, which will not hazard the loſing of you; and if I do deny it, be it what it will, hold me for the baſeſt of all Men living: But, Madam, if it do not conduce to the keeping of you, I cannot hearken unto it. Moreover, I beſeech you, Madam, let not this Title of Tyrant, which my Enemies have aſperſed upon me, hinder you from thinking me worthy the being your Slave, promiſing you to uſe all my endeavours to bring Megacles unto Athens: And I will ask no other Condition, but his conſent unto my Happineſs.

After this, Cleorante uſed all her Arguments to perſwade Piſiſtrates, not only as the Daughter of Megacles, but as a Citizen of Athens. But the Love and Ambition of Piſiſtrates being in that Buſineſs inſeparable, ſhe could obtain no farther of him, but Liberty to ſtay where ſhe was, until Megacles changed his Mind. But when Piſiſtrates afterwards asked leave to ſee her every day, ſhe denied him, and ſaid, ſhe would not bring her ſelf into ſuſpicion of knowing his Deſigns: And indeed ſhe was in ſo good earneſt, that as much a Maſter of Athens as he was, obey her he muſt; but as it was with an ill will, yet ſince he feared nothing ſo much as to diſpleaſe her, he contented himſelf with hearing from her every day: And indeed Piſiſtrates and Cleorante, did carry themſelves ſo prudently in their Affections, that the general Voice of all Greece did not attribute any Love unto the Uſurpation of Piſiſtrates, nor unto the Hatred between Lycurgus and him.

In the mean time, this new Soveraign of Athens behaved himſelf with ſo much moderation, as if he had never deſired any Soveraign Authority, but only to make the Laws of Solon better obſerved, and to render Juſtice unto all according to their Demerits. Solon alſo went often to viſit this great Man; and he confeſſed, he wanted nothing but the being born the Son of a King, to have made him one of the greateſt Princes in the World. And Solon afterwards ſaid, that if the People of Athens could but forget that they had been long without a Maſter, they might be the happieſt People upon Earth.

Piſiſtrates ſo carried the Matter, that Solon after aſſiſted him with his Counſels; and an Accident fell out, which made Piſiſtrates voluntarily ſubmit to be puniſhed for infringing one of his Laws.

In the mean time he remembred the Eſteem which he ever had of Cerinthe and Euridamia, and highly favoured all thoſe of that Family. On the other ſide, Megacles and Lycurgus united themſelves together, and ſo carried the Matter by Bribes, that one Night one of the Gates ſhould be delivered up unto him. After which they ſurpriſed the Caſtle, and forced Piſiſtrates to go out of Athens, though he did as much as any brave and valiant Man could. Thus the Conquered became Conquerors, and the Conqueror was the moſt miſerable Man in the World: 'Tis true, his Rival was not ſo happy as he hoped; for as Megacles did intend to call for his Wife and Daughter out of the Temple of Minerva, purpoſely to marry Cleorante the next day unto Lycurgus. Cleorante, with her Mother's leave, (who hated Lycurgus, and loved Piſiſtrates) claimed the Priviledg of the Temple, which is a place inviolable for all thoſe who retire thither. And Cleorante ſent her Father word, ſhe was reſolved to ſtay there. Many Men thought that Megacles conſented to it, and would never have promiſed his Daughter unto Lycurgus, but becauſe he ſtood in need of him. But however it was, Lycurgus might complain as long as he would, and preſs Megacles to keep his Word; yet Cleorante would ſtay in the Temple.

In the mean time, Theocrite went to Cerinthe, and asked a Recompence for having brought her Deſigns ſo well to paſs; but ſince the Diſorders of Athens did not pleaſe her, ſhe entertained him as coldly, as if he had not done what ſhe had deſired him. On the other ſide, Megacles and Lycurgus did ſo ill agree together, and their Government was ſo Tyrannical, that they horribly hated each other, and ſo did all the People, in ſo much as all the People ſaid aloud, That if they muſt obey any one, it ſhould be Piſiſtrates, and repented of the Change. Megacles hearing this, and being advertiſed that Lycurgus intended to take Cleorante out of the Temple, and that he intended to get Piſiſtrates baniſhed for ever, and to render the Ancient Liberty to the Athenians, he was almoſt at his Wits end.

On the other ſide; Being retired with a great number of his Friends about Athens, he was in a deſperate Condition; yet he was much comforted by the Reſolution which Cleorante had taken: but for all that, he was as much perplexed as any ambitious Lover could be when all ſucceeds ill. For my part, I being ſick during the time of theſe Diſorders, I was of no Side, but reſted in quietneſs to ſee how Fortune would decide ſo great a Difference. In the mean time, not a day paſſed, but ſome quarrel, or ſome diſorder or other happened in ſome quarter of Athens; for beſides the Inclination of the divided People thereunto, certainly the Friends of Piſiſtrates did much contribute to them: For my part, I underſtood that Ariſton came diſguiſed into Athens, and cauſed many Commotions, in one of which Theocrite was killed; but it was very obſervable, that Cerinthe was ſo little grieved at it, that when Euridamia came to comfort her, ſhe cruelly ſaid, that ſhe was glad of it, for ſhe gained more by his Death in loſing his Viſits, than ſhe did loſe by loſing his Affection.

But diſorders encreaſed every day; Megacles and Lycurgus jarred more and more, and all things were in ſuch a pittiful condition, as every one had great Fears that the Town would be Cantoned, and the People fall to kill one another. In the interim, Erophile who wiſhed with all her Heart that her Daughter were married unto Piſiſtrates, did not loſe the leaſt opportunity to effect it, and perſwaded her Husband to comply with him. Megacles having no other ſide to take, conſidering the ſtate of his Affairs with Lycurgus, he complied with her deſires more eaſily than ſhe imagined; for Megacles knew, that though he ſhould force his Daughter to marry Lycurgus, yet he could never endure he ſhould ever raign in prejudice of himſelf; nor was he ignorant, that being deſcended from Alemeon, whom the Athenians never loved, it would be a hard matter for him to raign, conſidering the ſtate of things. In the mean time, ſince he knew how to recant from that extream averſion which he ſeemed to have againſt Piſiſtrates: Some ſaid, that to have a colour for it, he gave out that Minerva had inſpired him with ſuch a thought, and in order to that, he hired a huge big Woman, who was very fair, to dreſs her ſelf like unto Minerva, and to ſit in a gilded Chair ſome few Furlongs from Athens, that afterwards ſhe ſhould come unto the Walls at Sun-riſe, which is the time that moſt People uſe to go and come out of the Town,and that four Trumpets going before her Chariot, ſhe ſhould tell every one that ſhe was Minerva, and that ſhe commanded all the Athenians to receive Piſiſtrates, and obey him. However it were, or whether this were true or no, yet it is moſt certain, Madam, that a great talk went one Morning about the Town, that Minerva had appeared unto many Athenians, and had commanded them to receive Piſiſtrates, and obey him: Megacles himſelf ſaid ſhe had appeared unto him as well as unto others. This Fancy working upon the Spirits of People more than Reaſon could, it united the People of the Plain, them of the Mountains, and them of the Maritine Places all-together; ſo that then all the People asked for Piſiſtrates, and thoſe who ſome days before called him Tyrant, and had baniſhed him as ſuch an one, did now look upon him as a Legitimate Prince, ordained by Minerva. In the mean time Megacles ſent to treat with Piſiſtrates, though Lycurgus oppoſed him, and the very ſame day that Piſiſtrates entred into Athens in triumph, his Rival went out at another Gate, and he was received with ſo many Acclamations of the People, and ſuch Joy, as I could not chuſe but admire at the lightneſs of Men. But to compleat his Happineſs, he became both at one time the Lord of Athens, and Poſſeſſor of Cleorante, whom the next day he married with much Satisfaction, and within eight days he ſetled Athens in ſuch a quiet condition, as a Stranger newly come could never believe it was in ſuch a pittiful condition as before it was; nothing was to be ſeen but Feaſts and Thankſgivings: all the diſcourſe of the Town was upon the Generoſity, Liberality and Goodneſs of Piſiſtrates, for he was an Honourer of all the Arts, and of them who practiſed them: He founded a huge Library at Athens; he gathered together the Books of Homer, which time had a little diſordered: He married Cerinthe unto Ariſton, who was fallen in love with her, and Euridamia unto a Couſin of Cerinthe's, ſo that all the diſorders which his Love and Ambition had cauſed, being appeaſed, Athens was more quiet than ever, and Piſiſtrates the happieſt Man in the World; eſpecially in that his greateſt Enemies confeſſed, that he did deſerve his Happineſs.

Silamis having ended his Story, he was highly applauded by all his Hearers: After which, they diſcourſed upon the inconſtancy of things, and the lightneſs of the People, who never ſpeak of their own Minds, which always depends more upon the Opinions of others than their own, or elſe more upon their giddy Fancies, than upon right Reaſon. But ſince it was late, and ſince Cyrus intended to take his leave of Ariminta before he returned to the Camp, he left Oneſile, and went to the Queen of Pontus, where he found Anacharſis charmed with the Solidity of her wit, to whom Cyrus alſo bad adieu very quickly, becauſe his Love required that he ſhould go in all haſte, to give Orders requiſite for the March of his Army. Yet he left her not before he had ſome diſcourſe concerning Spitridates, and concerning Mandana, which ſo much took up his Mind, that he never wanted matter to talk of: However, Silamis being brave and gallant, he left Oneſile and followed Cyrus, who ſeemed much obliged unto him, for ſtrengthning his Army with ſo brave an accompliſhed Man as himſelf.

But this Prince was no ſooner come to his Tent, than Hidaſpes entred as Gobrias was with him. As ſoon as Cyrus ſaw him, he wondred where he had been, and at his long abſence, for ſaid he unto him, I was ſtrangely amazed to ſee the King of Aſſyria without you, when after you had delivered him, he came unto me at the Tomb of Abradates, and told me he knew not what was become of you; and therefore you muſt acquaint me with all Paſſages. Sir, replied Hidaſpes, I ſhall ſay nothing of what I did with Arſamones, nor of the ſurpriſal of the Caſtle where the King of Aſſyria was kept, for I do believe you are not ignorant of them. But give me leave to tell you, that after this Prince was delivered, and we going towards Cumes where we thought you were, and coming upon the Frontiers of Galatia, we went through a Wood before it was day, for the King of Aſſyria's impatience, cauſed him to ſet out above three hours before Aurora appeared: So that wandering in this Wood which was very thick, when the Sun roſe, I was all alone by my ſelf; and I had not gone above a thouſand Spaces, but I heard a noiſe on my right Hand; imediately after I ſaw two Women, one ſeeming to be Miſtreſs unto the other, in whoſe Face much Fear and Grief appeared; ſo that going gently towards them, I ſaluted them as civilly as I could, intending to ask them, whether they ſtood in any need of my help. But, Sir, this fair lamenting Lady, gave me no time to do it; for knowing me, ſhe ſpoke firſt, and asked help; as ſoon as ſhe ſpoke, her Voice made me know her much better than my own Eyes. So that then knowing her to be the fair Arpaſia, Daughter to the wiſe Gobrias, before whom I ſpeak, I lighted haſtily from my Horſe, and went to her with all due Reſpects: How (ſaid Gobrias, and could not forbear) did you find my Daughter in the Wood, whom I left in a Caſtle with an Aunt, who hath lately writ unto me, that Arpaſia was with her? Is Arpaſia (ſaid Cyrus) that Daughter whom I found with Gobrias, at the beginning of the Aſſyrian War, who I thought to be one of the greateſt Beauties in the World? Yes, Sir, (replied Hidaſpes) the very ſame you mean, who no ſooner ſaw me light from my Horſe, but ſhe acquainted me in ſhort, that ſhe had been carried away by one called Aſtidamas, who being purſued by his Rival which had fallen upon him, was forced to leave her under a Tree with her Woman. And whilſt they fought with extream Animoſity, ſhe got into the thick of the Wood unſeen, and happily ſhe found a Cave into which ſhe entred, and ſtayed a whole Day and Night there, during all which time, ſhe ſtill heard a noiſe: But never any ſtir ſince the Sun did riſe, fearing leſt ſome wild Beaſts and Famine ſhould force them out; they came to the high-Way-ſide where I was, and covered themſelves with Leaves, waiting till any came whom they thought would help them, and they thanked the Gods for ſending me thither.

Is it poſſible (ſaid Gobrias) that Aſtidamas ſhould carry away my Daughter, the Son of my Siſter-in-law, who hath a million of Obligations upon him? and who could never commit ſuch an act, unleſs he were the moſt ungrateful and baſeſt Man in the World? Yes, Sir, (anſwered Hidaſpes) but he is puniſhed for his Crime, by another who is no leſs innocent than himſelf, for he was killed by a Man of good Rank, named Licander, with whom he was fighting, when the fair Arpaſia got into the Wood; yet ſhe was ignorant of his Death till after ſhe ſpoke with me, but came to know it preſently after; for being in a ſtrange Amazement to imagine how I could ſecure her Perſon, being alone, and having but one Horſe; as good luck was, as I was talking with her, an empty Coach came by, and talking with the Coachman, I underſtood that it belonged to a Lady of Quality, who had lent it unto one of her Friends, and was returning back, and that this Ladies Houſe was not above fifteen Furlongs diſtant from the place; ſo that without more ado, I deſired Arpaſia to go into the Coach with her Woman, and to entreat a Lodging with the Lady who owed it, until ſome courſe was reſolved upon. Since no better courſe could be thought upon, ſhe willingly conſented, and I promiſed ſuch recompence to the Coachman, as he was very glad of the Employment: So, the fair Arpaſia went into the Coach, and I promiſed her to die, rather than ſhe ſhould receive any wrong. But, Sir, after we had gone three or four Furlongs, we ſaw five or ſix dead Men, and amongſt them Aſtidamas. The fair and ſad Arpaſia grew pale at the ſight, who turning her Head aſide from this ſad Spectacle, ſhe told me that her Raviſher was amongſt thoſe dead Men: Since he is dead (ſaid I unto her) you need not fear him. Alas Hidaſpes (cryed ſhe) though Aſtidamas be dead, yet all my Enemies are not. And indeed, Sir, ſhe had no ſooner ſaid ſo, but a very handſom Man, followed by four others coming out of a thick Wood, no ſooner ſaw her, but coming up to the Coach: Why, Madam, ſaid he unto her, do you ſhun your Deliverer? If you will merit that name, Sir, (ſaid ſhe unto him) let me paſs under the conduct of Hidaſpes, and follow me no farther; for truly Licander, I would not be under your Power. Since I have been a long time under yours, Madam, (replied he) you have no reaſon to fear me, but may well permit me to be your Guard: And indeed, Madam, (added he, and looked fiercely upon me) I am reſolved that a Perſian ſhall not rob me of that Glory, nor will I let the King of Aſſyria's Conqueror obtain that Honour which you have denied me, ſince I have at this preſent more right unto it than he. Since all the King of Aſſyria's Subjects (ſaid I unto him) are only Slaves unto the Prince whom I ſerve, you have no right unto the Daughter of the valiant Gobrias, who is at this time under his Protection: and therefore I muſt tell you, that I will not leave her, until I have conducted her unto the place where ſhe deſires to go.

Since you are ſingle, ſaid he unto me, and I have Company, I know not how to anſwer you; but I am ſure you ſhall not follow me long. If the fair Arpaſia do not not forbid me (replied I) I will follow you as long you follow her: At theſe words Arpaſia being ſo good, as to fear leſt he ſhould make uſe of the Advantage he had of me, and fearing alſo to fall under his Power; ſhe began to uſe all her Rhetorick to perſwade him unto her Deſires, but all in vain. So that coming to a part of the Wood, where were ſeveral ways, Licander would needs force the Coachman to drive the way he deſired, and not that way which went to his Ladies Houſe. And not being able to ſuffer the violence which this unjuſt Lover offered unto the fair Arpaſia, though I foreſaw my certain ruin, yet I drew my Sword, and went ſtraight to Licander, whom I ſlightly hurt in the left Arm the firſt thruſt I made. Licander ſtanding in a poſture of Defence, did very gallantly charge his Man to ſtand ſtill, ſaying he himſelf would conquer me. But, Sir, he was ſo ill obeyed, that for all his charge, they fell all upon me at once; yet I was ſo happy and quick, that in charging through them, I wounded one ſo dangerouſly, that he fell amongſt our Horſes feet; but yet I had three upon me, and Licander ſeeing one of his fallen, did not charge his Men then from falling upon me; all I was able to do, was to wound another of my Enemies, for whilſt I was making at a third, Licander gave me ſuch a blow, that I fell down as dead: After which I could only hear the Cries of the fair Arpaſia, and could not ſee any farther of the Paſſages; yet I underſtand ſince, that Licander forced the Coachman to drive the way he deſired. In the mean time, my loſs of Blood, and my Sorrow was ſuch, that I was not able to relieve Arpaſia, that it made me inſenſible; and I returned not to my ſelf, till ſome Shepherds finding me in that pittiful Condition, carried me unto that Ladies Houſe, unto whom the Coach belonged. She being a Woman of great Virtue, ſhe had a great care of me. But my Mind running moſt upon Arpaſia, after I had thanked her for her favours, I told her in ſhort all the paſſages, acquainting her with the quality and merit of Arpaſia, and deſired her to ſend ſome of her Servants and relieve her if poſſible; or if ſhe had not upon a ſudden Men enough to do it, yet at leaſt to ſend one to follow them, and know the place where the Raviſher carried her, confeſſing ingenuouſly to you, that I had then no thoughts of the Aſſyrian King. But, Sir, this Lady not being able to ſatisfy my firſt deſire, yet ſhe did the ſecond, and immediately made choice of a witty and bold Fellow, whom I informed which way the Coach took, and ſo away he went with Intentions to follow, till he had lodged them in ſome place where they were likely to ſtay. After this, Sir, I ſuffered incredible Miſeries, for my Wounds being very great, and being in a place where the Chirurgeons were not very good, I was in a hundred dangers of Death; yet I ſent unto you, Sir, but ſince you have not received my Excuſes why I did not follow the King of Aſſyria, certainly ſome Accidents have befallen the Meſſengers I imployed. But yet (ſaid Cyrus, and interrupted him) do you know no more concerning Arpaſia? And have you no Intelligence (added Gobrias) of the place where Licander carried her? Yes, Sir, replied Hidaſpes, for the Man whom the Lady ſent after them, did play his part ſo well and cunningly, that he got himſelf ſome days into the ſervice of Licander: But to be ſhort, the Man returned, and I underſtand by him, that Licander being heretofore acquainted with the Prince Atergatis in Aſſyria, had at firſt a deſign to chuſe the Court of Arſamones for his retreat, becauſe Atergatis was there, but hearing that there were ſome diſorders about the King of Aſſyria's Liberty, he altered his Mind, and embarqued on the Euxine Sea, when the Tempeſt did caſt him upon Colchides, where he ſtayed, and where he ſaid he would ſtay a long while; alſo the fair Arpaſia falling ſick, it was unlikely he could ſtir though he would. So, Sir, hearing this, and ſince I had ſome hopes of being able ere long to ride on Horſe-back; alſo preſently after hearing of the Princeſs Mandana's carrying away, and of the King of Aſſyria's Death, and alſo of your March towards the Maſſagettes, I confeſs my Deſign was to go towards the place where Arpaſia was, to ſee if I could get her out of Licander's Hands, knowing, Sir, that to do any ſervice unto thoſe you loved, was to do ſervice unto your ſelf: But when I came there, I heard to my ſorrow, that Licander reſolved to go unto Thomiris, and paſs over Araxis, and indeed I followed him as far as I could, unleſs I would be taken by the Enemy, and until I ſaw there was no hopes of delivering Arpaſia, but by delivering the Princeſs Mandana; for I underſtand ſince, that Licander and Arpaſia, are now with Thomiris. I am very glad, replied Gobrias, that there is any hopes my Daughter may be delivered by the Conqueror of Aſia. I aſſure you, anſwered Cyrus, that I look upon this Advantage as one of the ſweeteſt Fruits of my Victory if I get it; and next after the Liberty of Mandana, Arpaſia's ſhall be my greateſt Joy. In ſaying ſo, Cyrus obſerved Hidaſpes, and remembring that he had heretofore ſuſpected him of being in love with that fair one, he thought now that he was not then miſtaken, ken, for he thought that it was more than only Generoſity which made him ſo zealous; yet he had no leiſure to make any Reflection thereupon, for having many Emiſſaries abroad, and Spies amongſt the Enemies, one of them returned and acquainted him, that the Army of Thomiris did daily encreaſe, that Terez an old experienced Souldier was there, though very lame of his old Wounds; that Octomaſades was come up with thoſe Troops which the Prince of the Callipides permitted him to levy in his Country, when his deſign was to make Ariantes King of the Iſſedons: And now ſince Ariantes had made his Peace, he brought them for the Service of that Queen: He further told him, that Agatherſes came to him with a huge Aid from Iſſedon; that the Scythian Kingdoms had alſo ſent in very gallant Regiments, and that Aripithes came up with an Army the more conſiderable, becauſe the Sauromites were a warlike People: But the worſt of all was, Ariantes was ſooner ſound of his Wounds than was hoped, and in all likelihood, the Fort of Sauromates would be ſooner ſet upon than Cyrus could hinder them; and indeed the very next Morning he had certain Information that the Enemy began the Siege; alſo he received Intelligence at the ſame time out of the Frontiers of Media, that Ciaxares was dead: though this news did extreamly trouble him, yet he thought it of ſuch importance, as not to divulge it, leſt it ſhould damp the Courage of his Souldiers, ſo that he ſhut up all his Sorrows in his own Breaſt: In the mean time he took order for every thing, and deſired Anacharſis to ſtay with the Queen of Pontus, and the Princeſs of Armenia, to the end if he had any need of him, he might ſend thither to him: But Cyrus knowing very well that bold Reſolutions ought to be taken up with very few, he conferred only with Mazares, and opening his Heart unto him, and told him that though he did not call a Councel of War, yet he was reſolved to give Battle; ſo that Mazares being of his opinion, and deſiring no more but to know more certainly the Paſſes which Cyrus had not viewed, becauſe his meeting with Thomiris hindred him to go far enough into the Wood: This Prince reſolved to march as if the Deſign only were to relieve the Fort of Sauromates, and that in the mean time Mazares ſhould march on with ſome Troops, not only to view the Paſſes, but alſo relieve the Place if he could, and enable Feraulas to hold his Enemies in play awhile; and in order to this, the day following, the whole Army of Cyrus began to march, as if only to relieve the Fort of Sauromates, which truly was a difficult Buſineſs, becauſe this Fort, though near a Forreſt, yet ſtood in the midſt of a Plain, invironed with Wood, ſo rugged and boggy, that it was impoſſible any ways to avoid theſe long narrow Paſſes: 'Tis true, that ſide towards Araxes the Wood was not above twelve or fourteen Furlongs through, but after a very narrow and difficult Paſs, it did inceſſantly enlarge it ſelf, and one might diſcover the Plain, yet this way was very naught, for the Plain being all Boggs, by reaſon of abundance of Waters which flow from ſeveral Parts, it was impoſſible to march in Ranks, and would be very difficult to paſs by Files; it is true, in coming near to the Fort, all theſe Difficulties ceaſe, for the place is more ſandy and dry, and there was room enough to draw up two great Armies into Battalia. In the mean while Mazares following the Reſolutions which Cyrus and he had taken, he marched ſo haſtily with his commanded Party, that the Prince Ariantes was but new ſet down before the Fort of the Sauromates, when he came to the beginning of the Wood. Now did the Prince call into his Heart the Love of Glory, and the Love of Mandana, and reſolved to carry in Relief to the place, to the end Feraulus might hold his Enemies in play, till Cyrus forced them either to fight or retreat; yet ſometimes when he thought that the happy ſucceſs of the Enterprize would reflect more upon his Rival than himſelf, and that Victory would make him the Poſſeſſor of Mandana, he would give a ſtop unto his Horſe and go ſoftly; but thinking better upon it, and his Vertue ſurmounting his Love, he recollected himſelf, and by extraortraordinary haſte regained the time which that ſpark of Jealouſy cauſed him to loſe; and indeed he did that which almoſt none other but himſelf could do, and he was no ſooner come unto the entry of the Wood, but he drew a hundred and fifty Horſe out of that little Party which he commanded, and appointed them to get into the Fort, and in order to that, he commanded them to go on the back ſide of the Wood, that they might be unſeen, and expreſly forbad them to attempt getting in, until they heard him give a hot alarum to the Enemies Camp with all his Troops, and then to take that time to get into the Fort if they could; and indeed Mazares did ſo happily paſs the narrow Way which the Enemy could not have time yet to guard, that in the midſt of the Night he fell upon the main guard of the Maſſagettes, and ſo ſharply, that he drove them as far as their Camp, where the Alarum was ſo high and general, that the hundred and fifty Horſe in ambuſh, did eaſily get into the Fort. 'Tis true, there was a ſmall guard of Maſſagettes which did oppoſe them, but they eaſily forced through them, and into the place, into the which they entred without the loſs of one Man. In the mean while, aſſoon as Mazares underſtood by the ſignal, which the Fort of Sauromates made, according to Appointment betwixt them, that the Relief was entred, he began to think of making his Retreat, and the ſooner becauſe he knew that all the Cavalry of Thomiris's Camp were in Arms: Doubtleſs this retreat vas very difficult to be made, and certainly had been full of danger, if Mazares had not made extraordinary haſte; but in retreating, Day beginning to break, he obſerved the importance of the Paſſage, and moſt prudently judged, that upon this difficult Paſſage, did depend the good or bad Succeſs of the War. Thus the deſign of Mazares being happily executed, as it was boldly attempted, he went to give Cyrus an accompt, who received him with a thouſand Welcomes, commending him as highly for what he had done, as it was poſſible one Rival could commend another, as (maugre all his Power) Mazares was unto him: But after Mazares had given him an account of his Actions, Cyrus acquainted him, how ſince his departure he underſtood, that Thomiris had left Mandana in the Tents-Royal with a very ſtrong Guard; that the Princeſs of Bithynia, and the Princeſs Iſtrina had liberty to ſee her; that Thomiris was come into the Army; that Ariantes commanded under her Orders; that the valiant and wiſe Terez (as ill as he was of his Wounds which he received in the Battel which Agatherſes heretofore got againſt Ariantes) was Lieutenant-General of this Army; that all the flower of Bravery amongſt all the Maſſagettes and experienced Officers were there, and were hugely numerous: He told him farther, that Ariantes had divided his Troops into ſix quarters round about the Fort of Sauromates, that he had placed his greateſt ſtrength on that ſide toward Araxes, and that he never offered to draw any Lines, or caſt up any Ditches about the Fort, becauſe he hoped he ſhould carry it in a ſhort time: He told him that Ariantes had placed his Courts of Guard very judiciouſly, as he might judg by that which he found at the advenue of the narrow Paſſage towards Araxes; adding that this Prince had ſo well ordered his Sentinels and Scouts, that it was impoſſible to enter into the Plain which was compaſſed about with a Wood, but he would be acquainted with it.

But, after Cyrus had told Mazares all he knew, he added, that without more ado, he abſolutely muſt give Battel: And indeed, calling a Council of War that very hour, he told all the Officers of his Army, what Mazares had done, and what farther he knew; telling them afterwards, That he was abſolutely reſolved, to Relieve the Fort of Sauromates: And, to that end, he thought it abſolutely neceſſary, to advance in all haſte unto that Paſs, by which they muſt go unto their Enemies: For, truly ſaid he unto them, If the Maſſagettes ſhould attempt to defend it, they will be forced to unfurniſh their Quarters, and by conſequence, leave us one paſſage free to relieve the Fort; and if they do let us paſs without fighting us, we ſhall then get into the Plain without any difficulty; and, ſhall be able to give Battel upon equal terms and advantages. Alſo, (added he, to bring them to his Opinion,) though we ſhould not then think it convenient to give Battel, yet we ought to do as I ſay, ſince thereby we ſhall be ſtill gaining ſeveral Quarters, and fortifying them, and thereby force the Enemy to change theirs, and leave us ſome paſſage to relieve the Fort. After this, Cyrus to bring them more eaſily to his mind, acquainted them, with the Intelligence he had received, concerning the Death of Ciaxares: Adding, That this ſad News, was a great reaſon to induce them unto a quick diſpatch of the buſineſs; for truly, (ſaid he, with an admirable grace,) his Death, if it be poſſible, ought not to be known unto our Souldiers, but upon the Place of Combat, after the Victory is gotten; at leaſt, I am ſure, we muſt not ſuffer the Fort of Sauromates to be taken in ſight of our Army; but rather, hazard Periſhing, than receive ſuch an Affront, and retard the Liberty of Mandana, by being too wiſe. Cyrus having done ſpeaking, all his Hearers were of his Opinion; and, Creſus himſelf was of that Opinion alſo; though, at the paſſage over Araxes, he apprehended much danger in hazarding Battel: But, ſince he thought, that the Maſſagettes would be Maſters of the ſtrait Paſſage, ſince the Action of Mazares, and would diſpute it; he did not oppoſe the Opinion of Cyrus, becauſe he thought it would never come to a deciding Battel, but, only ſome great Skirmiſhes at the entrance into the Wood; during which, they might perhaps, put ſome conſiderable Relief into the Fort: and, ſo the whole Army not being Engaged on this ſide the difficult paſſages, Cyrus himſelf would be conſtrained out of his own prudence to retreat, and not engage his Army to Fight in diſadvantageous Quarters. So, there being no Conteſt, Cyrus reſolved, that his Army ſhould Advance that very hour, unto the Place which the Inhabitants of the Country call, the Plain of Gelons; (becauſe a People of that Name, were once heretofore there beaten,) and the day following, he marched ſtrait towards the Enemy. But, before he departed, he began to give out all requiſite Orders, to regulate the March of every Regiment; to diſtribute the ſeveral Quarters unto his Officers; to reſolve upon the general Order of the Battel; and, exhorted all his Men to fight ſo couragiouſly, that they might come off with Glory, from a buſineſs of ſo much Danger; that all they had gone through before, were nothing, in compariſon of it, by reaſon of thoſe difficult Paſſes where the Enemy was to be fought withall. 'Tis true, The joys which Cyrus ſaw in all his Troops, when he departed from the Plain of Gelons, ſeemed, to preſage a Victory: For certainly, though all his Souldiers had been aſſured of Victory, they could not have marched with more chearfulneſs, than they did now, in going to ſhare in the Dangers, unto which the greateſt Prince in the World was going to expoſe himſelf unto. In the mean time, Cyrus was reſolved, That his Army ſhould fight in two Brigades; that, theſe two Brigades, ſhould be ſeconded with á Body of Reſerve, which Hidaſpes was to command: That, Aglatidas ſhould be in the Head of the Infantry: That, Creſus, and the King of Hircania, ſhould command the Left-wing; And Mazares under him, the Right; Where the Prince Artamas, Intaphernes, Atergatis, Gobrias, Gadates, Merſiles, Intathyrſes, Perſodes, and all the reſt of the Heroes, who had no Employment, ſhould Fight near his Perſon. But, Cyrus, who was as Great a Captain, as Valiant Souldier; he believed, becauſe in all likelihood, he ſhould Fight the Maſſagettes in thoſe difficult Paſſes; therefore it was expedient to line his Cavalry with ſome Infantry; and to that end, between every Squadron, he placed an hundred Archers, appointing afterwards, all the reſt of the Archers to be the Guards of Creſus, the King of Hircania's Guards, and his own: Alſo, the Aſſyrian Cavalry to be upon both ſides of the Right and Left-wings. But, to the end nothing might clogg him, he ſent his Baggage to the ſide of Araxes; and afterwards, marched in the Head of his Army, which ſeeming to be guided by one Soul in every part, came to the entrance of the Wood; and, Orders were ſo wiſely given, and exactly Executed by all, that not one Souldier was to be an Inch out of his Rank. Cyrus began now to be in hopes of Happy Succeſs; and, the Idea of Mandana did ſo wholly take up his Mind, that fears of any approaching Dangers had no room in his thoughts. But, whileſt this great Prince was Advancing with all poſſible Heroick Heat, and employing all his Cares for the Relief of the Fort, Ariantes under the Order of Thomiris, was vigorouſly endeavouring to take it, before his Rival could arrive: And indeed, he followed on ſo cloſe, and Aſſaulted it ſo often, that it is to be imagined, that without the Relief which Mazares had gotten unto it, it could never have held out ſo long, as to give Cyrus time enough to execute his Deſignes: For, it was ſo ill furniſhed with all manner of Neceſſaries to ſuſtain a Siege, that it was impoſſible for the Valour of Feraulas to have defended it: Alſo, Ariantes thought it ſo inconſiderable, that he would never trouble himſelf with making any works about it, though he had learned very well under Cyrus, how to make formal Sieges. Moreover, ſince the Maſſagettes have no Townes, but live all in portable Tents, Thomiris, and Ariantes, could not get any information of Cyrus his March, nor of his Number: For all the Peoyle about Araxi, fled away as ſoon as Cyrus paſſed the River, ſo as there could not be any certain intelligence given, nor was the Army of Cyrus thought to be ſo numerous as they were: and they were ignorant of his ſtrength, until they heard, the Army was entred into the Wood, and ſeemed reſolved to paſs through thoſe Straits, ſo as they were forced to be tumultuous in their Reſolutions, and knew not well, whether they ſhould defend thoſe Paſſes, or expect their Enemy in the Plain, and there end the difference by a deciſive Battel. Ariantes Opinion was, to give a ſtop unto Cyrus in theſe Paſſages; and in order to that, to line the Woods with part of their Infantry, and to back them with a good Body of Cavalry; for, by this courſe it was impoſſible that Cyrus ſhould come to execute his Deſigns: Alſo, whileſt they were thus amuſing his Army, they might eaſily take the Fort with a few Forces: for, he had certain Intelligence, it could not hold out above two days. The Sage and Valiant Terez, concurred with the Opinion of Ariantes, Agatherſes, Octomaſades, and all the old experienced Blades were of the ſame mind: But, Thomiris thinking it better to fight Cyrus in her Country, than to defend theſe Paſſes; ſhe was not of their opinion, but ſaid, the Deſign was diſhonourable, and was as good as nothing, for her Army to do nothing, but take a poor Fort, ſince they were in the Head of a puiſſant Army: She ſaid, It was much better for them to give Battel preſently, than to ſtay till the Maſſagettes were more informed of their Enemies Valour: And, that it was more advantageous for them to fight far off Araxis, and in a Plain in the middeſt of a Wood where the Enemy was ignorant of the Paſſes, then near the place where they had a Boat-bridge over the River. Ariantes yet oppoſed her as much as ever he could: but ſhe without any farther hearing, or giving any reaſon, ſhe told him peremptorily, it ſhould be ſo: and accordingly it was reſolved, To let the whole Army of Cyrus paſs into the Plain without any ſtop or oppoſition. Truth is, though this reſolution of Thomiris had not been followed, yet they had been forced to take it; for, whileſt the intereſt of Thomiris and Ariantes moved them to different Opinions; and whileſt they were debating what to do, or not do, the Forlorn Hope of Cyrus his Army, appeared cloſe by the Maſſagettan Camp: So that then Ariantes ſeeing no way but to aſſemble all their Quarters, and to think of nothing but Fighting, and to loſe no time, Thomiris and Ariantes ſent in poſt haſte to Aripithes to make haſte, and joyn with them. But to omit nothing which a great Captain could do upon ſuch an important occaſion, you muſt know, that Cyrus, when he departed from the Plain of Gelons, towards the entrance into the Wood, he marched in Battalia upon two Banks, until he came to the entrance of the ſtrait Paſſes, and to run into nothing raſhly, he ſent Mazares to view them; and he made choice of him for that imployment, becauſe he had been already ready in the Woods, when he relieved the Fort: But, this gererous Rival unto Cyrus, finding theſe Paſſes defended only with a Guard of fifty Horſe, he eaſily beat them off, and returned to tell this Prince, that he might eaſily be Maſter of theſe Paſſes, provided he made haſte. So that now it was apparent there would be a Battel, ſince the Enemy did not guard the Paſſes; and ſince Cyrus would Engage them beyond the Wood. Creſus now was of another Opinion, and uſed all his Argument to alter the Deſign. But, Cyrus having told him in few words, his reaſons why he would Fight, commanded him to go immediately unto thoſe Forces which he was to command. The zeal which Cyrus had to Fight, and quickly to deliver Mandana, was ſo high, that fearing ſomething ſhould be an obſtacle unto his reſolution of Fighting, he would not follow what the dictates of his prudence hinted unto him: but on the contrary, out of his exceſs of Love, and deſire of Glory, would needs Advance ſo near the Enemy, that it ſhould be impoſſible to diſ-engage himſelf from a general Combate. 'Tis true, ſince Myrſiles, Intaphernes, and Atergates had their Miſtreſſes with Mandana, they did not contradict a Deſign which would haſten their Liberty, nor did Artamas and Indatherſes thwart it. Cyrus then having fixed upon this bold and generous Reſolution, he went with all the Cavalry of his Right-Wing, unto a little Hill, which was near the Enemy, and there he ſtayed; aſſoon as he was there, he diſpatched Order upon Order to the reſt of his Troops, to make all poſſible haſte after him. In the mean time, Cyrus knowing the Rules of War very well, he alſo knew that his Love of Mandana, and deſire of Glory, having drawn him ſo near the Enemy, before his Army was joyned, he had extreamly endangered himſelf, and all his Army; for, it is moſt certain, that if the Maſſagettes had at that time fallen upon him with all their Cavalry, it had been impoſſible for him to have withſtood their Force; but to carry the matter as well as he could, and avoid the danger in which he was with Glory, this great Soul ſtood in ſuch a reſolute poſture, and ſo handſomly placed thoſe few Forces he had, that he wholly covered the top of that Hill on which he ſtood; ſo that by this means the Maſſagets could have no knowledg of what Forces he had behind, and not imagining that ſo inconſiderable a Party as appeared, ſhould ever advance alone, ſo near them; they conceived, that it was ſeconded with the whole Army, and therefore had no mind to give the Aſſault: yet, they did intend to Charge through the Body, to ſee what was behind it, and therefore they made ſeveral Skirmiſhes, but all being with bad ſucceſs, they gave over, and reſted, until they had aſſembled all their ſeveral Quarters into Battalia. Chriſantes, who was next Cyrus, wondered at his Deſign, and was in perpetual fears till the reſt of the Forces came up, for he plainly ſaw, that if Ariantes had known in what condition he was, he were utterly ruined; when he looked towards the Enemies Army, he ſaw them ſo hugely Numerous in compariſon of his ſmall Party, that it might well be ſaid, Ariantes might have vanquiſhed them with a wiſh; and when he ſaw the Forces of Cyrus ſo far off, that there was no appearance of them, he was even deſperate: But at laſt, Fortune being reſolved that this great Prince ſhould never periſh by an act of Courage, wherein yet ſome prudence was, things happened better then his hopes; ſo that both ſides ſtaying till their Forces came up, they both drew into Battalia: The Forces of Cyrus paſſed the Straits without any diſorder, thoſe of Thomiris came up, and joyned, and both ſides choſe their Ground with equal advantage. That ground which Cyrus choſe to make his Camp of Battel, was large enough to range his whole Army in that order he was reſolved they ſhould Fight; indeed, he had choſen a riſing Ground which looked over all the Plain; eſpecially, from the mariſh Ground which was upon the left hand unto the entry into the Wood, which not being thick in that place, his Squadrons might well enough range themſelves in it: on the other ſide, there was another riſing Ground oppoſite unto that which Cyrus was poſſeſſed of, of an equal height, where the Maſſagetts quartered, ſo that between theſe two Armies, there was ſuch an equal deſcent, which made a kind of a little Plain, as thoſe who were experienced in the Art of War did know, That the firſt aſſaulter was in danger to be overcome. Moreover, before the Right-Wing of the Maſſagettes, by a little River, was a very high and thick Wood, which reached to the bottom of the Valley; ſo as it was to be imagined, that Briantes to make uſe of that advantagious Scituation, would place there ſome Archers, which would extreamly gall Cyrus when he came to Fight. Thus you ſee, what Ground Cyrus and Ariantes choſe for the two moſt Warlike Armies in the World to Fight upon, and where the Poſſeſſion of the rareſt Princeſs upon Earth was to be diſputed: In the mean time, they had leiſure enough to poſt themſelves, and did draw up in great order and quietneſs; for, both being reſolved to give Battel, they never skirmiſh'd, but thought only of the main Battel.

Thus theſe two great Captains drew up their Armies and Forces as they came up, as if they had been agreed ſo to do; yet the truth is, the Artillery of Thomiris her Army, did much more hurt unto the Army of Cyrus, than that of Cyrus did upon hers, becauſe ſhe had many more of them; and indeed the invincible Cyrus could not diſplay the Wings of his Army, nor ſtretch out his Batcalions without great danger of the Enemies Artillery and Engines; yet his high Reſolution made all his Troops ſo ſtout, that maugre all the Miſchief of theſe Engines, they ſtood firm to their Stations, though they ſaw many of themſelves kill'd and wounded, amongſt which the valiant Araſpes received a hurt upon his Thigh: but after incredible Toil, and indefatigable Vigilancy, Cyrus had the ſatisfaction to ſee that his whole Army had paſſed the ſtrait Paſſages; that the Body of his Reſerve, after they had got out of the Woods, went to poſſeſs the Place which he appointed them, and that he had time enough to fight, ſince the Sun was above two hours high; ſo that though this valiant Prince knew very well, by reaſon of the deſcent into the Valley, it was more difficult to aſſault, then to be aſſaulted, yet his impatient zeal of fighting for Mandana's Liberty, and his own Glory, perſwading him, that it was not advantagious to give his Enemies any longer time to make good their Ground, but that it was much more glorious to aſſault than be aſſaulted.

So that always uſing to follow the Dictates of his own great Heart, when they were not flatly againſt the Rules of Prudence, he gave Orders to advance and fight; yet for all this, and much againſt his mind, he altered his Intention, by reaſon of ſuch a ſtrange Accident as was like to have proved fatally ſad unto his whole Army, and caſt him into ſuch a Danger, as all his Valour and Prudence could not repair; for the raſh headlong valour of the King of Hircania, had like to have cauſed ſuch a Misfortune, as was not poſſible for him to foreſee; for ſince the left Wing of Cyrus his Army was towards the boggy Grounds, this Prince could not believe but that it was there ſecure, and that the Enemy would make no Attempts upon it, ſo that he himſelf was always in the right Wing, as in the place where he expected moſt danger: Moreover, ſince he knew himſelf to be the Soul of his Army, and would truſt none but himſelf with things of higheſt importance, he was extreamly buſy in obſerving the Motions of the Maſſagettan Army, that he might regulate his Deſigns accordingly: Cræſus for his part ſeeing there was nothing like to be attempted upon the left Wing which he was to lead, he came to be with Cyrus, and relied wholly upon the King of Hircania: but this King being extreamly vexed that Cræſus ſhould be preferred before him, becauſe he thought him to be a vanquiſhed King, he had a great deſire to ſhew ſome high Exploit in his abſence; alſo he bore an ill will unto Mazares, becauſe he thought Cyrus by his means treated Cræſus ſo well, and bearing a huge Envy unto him for that noble Enterprize of relieving the Fort of the Sauromates, he reſolved to perform ſome ſuch glorious Act, as ſhould tranſcend all others.

In theſe thoughts he imagined, that if the left Wing, which he was to command, could croſs over the Bogs, he ſhould be able to do great Service, by getting behind the Wood; being perſwaded that the Maſſagettan Army being in fear of Cyrus, could not oppoſe his Deſign: ſo that being prepoſſeſſed by his Paſſions, which tyrannized over his Heart, he never conſidered the dangerous Conſequences of that March, but went towards this mariſh Ground with all his Cavalry, and a great part of his Infantry, not ſo much as ſending Cyrus any word of it. Thus, by this raſh Attempt, which was againſt all military Orders, he did hazard the Glory of the greateſt Prince upon Earth, and likewiſe endangered the loſs of Mandana's Liberty for ever.

Cyrus who knew nothing of what the King of Aſſyria had done, had given the general Order to march toward the Enemy; and being always accuſtomed to be immediately obeyed, all the ſeveral Bodies of which his Army was compos'd, did even begin to move, when he was acquainted with what the King of Hircania had done; however, he no ſooner heard it, but without any uſeleſs Complaints, which could not remedy ſo great an Evil, he cauſed his Army to make a Halt, and went himſelf with incredible haſte to ſet things in order again: But in his going, O how vexed was he againſt that Prince, and what diſturbance was in his Thoughts, who one minute before was full of hopes to conquer, and now in danger to be conquer'd, and that eaſily: and indeed, during this croſs Conjuncture, Cyrus had reaſon to fear that the Maſſagettans would take advantage of this great diſorder, for a huge Army might be ſeen upon a ſudden to ſtagger, and one might here ſee the Maſſagettans ſound their Trumpets, and beat their Drums, and move in Battalia, as if they intended to fall upon the Army of Cyrus.

Now did he think the diſmal Anſwer of the Sybil would be fulfilled, that he ſhould infallibly fall into the Power of Thomiris: That Mandana's Liberty would be loſt, and that his Rival would preſently enjoy her. Yet ſince his great Soul did not ſink under the burthen of this Injury, he beſtirred himſelf to remedy the Diſaſter; and to that end, he cauſed ſome Troops of the ſecond Brigade to advance, and ſupply the place of thoſe whom the King of Hircania had carried away and left void. But though Cyrus did beſtir himſelf with as much Prudence as Quickneſs, yet certainly, if Ariantes had then aſſaulted the Army, Cyrus, that Prince who never before had been conquered, had now loſt the Victory, and perhaps his Life. But the Heavens did more favour him, than to let him loſe his Glory by the Fault of another. And Fortune, who uſes to favour great and Heroique Attempts, would not let the Maſſagettans ſee the Advantage which was offered them, for they did not perceive what the King of Hircania had done: And the incomparable Cyrus had ſo quickly filled up all the void Places, which thoſe Troops who went into the Bogs had quitted, that not one of the Commanders of Thomiris's Army did ever obſerve it; and the Motion of their Army was cauſed only, becauſe they would enlarge their Battalia, and make room for their ſecond Diviſion to draw up more conveniently; So that making a ſtop within four hundred Paces of Cyrus his Army, it was evident they had no deſign to fall on.

On the other ſide, this great Captain, deſiring at any rate to reduce things into right order, did ſend to the King of Hircania ſuch expreſs and poſitive Orders to return in all haſte with his Troops, and cauſed it be ſpoken ſo earneſtly in the preſence of his Men, what danger the whole Army was expoſed unto, that whether he would or no, they would obey: and ſo they did; for the Troops which he conducted, did ſo quickly obey, and croſſed the Bogs ſo haſtily, that they were preſently on their firſt Ground. Thus, by the wiſe conduct of Cyrus, the whole Army was in ſuch Order as he deſired, before 'twas night. This Prince had ſo much Command over himſelf, that he received the King of Hircania's Excuſe extreamly well, leſt if he had not, he ſhould not be ſo well ſerved the next Morning, as he deſired to be. Yet he was vexed to the Soul to ſee this croſs Adventure had retarded fighting: But ſince there was no remedy, he took care for the ſafety of the Camp, as Ariantes did for his. So that both ſecuring themſelves, by ſeveral Courts of Guard, a huſht Silence was in both theſe huge Armies, which were overſhadowed with Night: yet the common Darkneſs was leſſened by reaſon of many Fires which the Souldiers made in both Camps, which were ſo near each other, that thoſe who ſtood upon the Hills, a little diſtance off, could not perceive any Interval which parted them: But the wonder was, the Night was not diſturbed with either true or falſe Alarum from either ſide; but all were in as calm a ſilence, as if it were in the moſt ſolitary Deſart: yet the Camp of Cyrus ſaw through the Enemies Army ſome artificial Fires, which thoſe who defended the Fort of Sauromates did continually caſt up, which made it manifeſt that they were aſſaulted; and that the ſilence which then reigned was not a ſilence of Peace, which would not be broken after Sun was up, unleſs by the harmony of Birds. Truth is, there was not a Souldier in both Armies which did not certainly know that there would be a general Combate the next day: for the ſcituation of both Camps was ſuch, as was equally impoſſible to retreat without the danger of a Defeat by being forced to fight in Diſorder and Confuſion. For, being both incloſed within a Plain, compaſſed about with Wood, one might well ſay, that both Nature and Fortune did contribute unto a neceſſity of fighting. But Cyrus, being incomparable in all things, did teach his Men, by his own Example, that brave Men muſt expect great Dangers in ſilence, and without unquietneſs. Therefore as ſoon as he had viſited all the Courts of Guard, which he had placed for the ſafety of his Camp, he paſſed the reſt of the Night in a Tent, which ſtood in the Head of his Infantry: he commanded alſo that they ſhould wake him, an hour before day: as if he had thought his deſire of Glory not enough to do it; yet his Men could not obey him; for as haſty as they could be, he was before them. And Mazares, Myrſiles, Intaphernes, Atergatis, and Artamas, were no more ſluggards than that valiant Prince whom they followed. But though the Night had been huſht and quiet, yet Aurora was tumultuous: The Fires of both Camps extinguiſhed as the Stars did; And there was then in both Camps a noiſe compoſed of ſo many ſeveral Noiſes, and ſuch an Ecchoing Murmur, as all the Field was fill'd with it. The Birds themſelves, (except ſuch as live upon what Death allows them, and always follow Armies) did forſake the Woods all about: and as the Night ſpake the ſoft language of Peace, the break of Day ſpoke in the thunder of War, which as grim as it looked, yet had ſomething of delight in it.

In the mean time, as quick as the Sun's Courſe is, yet Cyrus had given his laſt Orders before it appeared in our Horizon; and gave them with ſo much judgment, and made thoſe who received them, to underſtand them ſo well, as if he had inſpired both Spirits and Hearts fit to execute them: his whole Army moved together in an inſtant all at once, and kept ſuch evenneſs, as they came cloſe to the Enemy without the leaſt diſorder, though they went with ſuch an impetuoſity, as the preſence of Cyrus uſed to inſpire into all his Troops; and which, without any raſhneſs, only made their vigour and impatience of fighting to appear.

In the mean time, on that ſide towards the right Wing, there was a tall and thick Wood, which the valiant and experienced Tirez had lined with a thouſand Archers, who began the fight; yet found he not that Advantage which he expected: for Cyrus foreſeeing that the Maſſagettans would not leave that place unlined, he cauſed a party of Horſe to fall upon that thouſand Archers, and placed ſome Foot alſo amongſt his Horſe, between every Squadron: So that theſe Archers being vigorouſly charged, they were forced to yield: yet ſaved not themſelves by flying, for they were every Man of them killed upon the place where they lay in Ambuſcado. But the prudence of Cyrus moving him to think that his Troops might be ſquander'd in the Wood, he commanded Mazares to wheel about the Wood to the right Hand, with his firſt Brigade, to prevent that Diſorder. So as this Generous Rival obeying him, Cyrus, in the Head of the ſecond Brigade, and towards the left ſide of the Wood, advanced towards the Enemy, with all the Gallants of his Army: and advanced with the ſame Valour, wherewith he had vanquiſhed others. In the mean time Mazares, who was as valiant as amorous, and who was well knowing in the Art of War, wheeled about the Wood without any Diſorder; and to loſe no time, he cauſed the Body which he commanded to draw towards the right Hand, to the end he might aſſault the Maſſagettans on the Flank, whilſt Cyrus aſſaulted them in the Front.

The ambitious Octomaſades, who commanded the left Wing of the Maſſagettans, was extreamly ſurprized, when contrary to his expectation he ſaw himſelf aſſaulted on two ſides; for he was confident in the thouſand Archers which Terez had placed in the Wood, through which he knew any muſt paſs before they could come and aſſault him on that ſide: yet for all his Surprize, he behaved himſelf like a Man of Courage: and though he might be taxed with want of a little Foreſight, yet could not be accuſed for want of Valour. And indeed he did very gallantly reſiſt ſome Squadrons which aſſaulted him, but without ſucceſs: For as there is nothing ſo dangerous as to alter the Orders of Troops, in the face of a terrible Enemy; ſo upon the very firſt ſhock, Mazares broke many Squadrons of Thomiris, ſo that the Troops of Octomaſades tumbled one over another as ſoon as Cyrus charged them in Perſon; and fled with ſo much precipitation, as never was the like diſorder ſeen.

But ſince this valiant Prince knew that flying Enemies are already overcome, he never followed them; but deſiring to find a more noble Subject unto his Valour, he appointed Mazares to vanquiſh the Cavalry which he had already ſquandered, leſt they ſhould rally again; and went himſelf ſtreight unto the Enemies Infantry, againſt whom he did even Miracles, as afterwards you ſhall hear: But that you may better ſee, how Victory follows Cyrus, and none elſe, it chanced, that whilſt he had put to flight all that ſtood in Head againſt him, and thought it not fit to follow them; and whilſt he wheeled about his Squadrons againſt the Maſſagettan Infantry, not one of his Men being out of Rank, he conceived himſelf able to go behind the Army of Thomiris, and advantagiouſly fall upon that victorious Wing which had routed Creſus, whoſe Brigade indeed was the deciding Point of the Battel.

Thus it may well be ſaid, that his Prudence and his Valour were almoſt equal gainers, and forced Fortune to render Juſtice unto the equity of his Cauſe; and he routed them. However the eternally-renowned Cyrus did not quietly enjoy this great Glory which he had gotten, and well deſerved; for ſince his Rival was yet living, and Mandana not releaſed, he thought himſelf not at all happy. Yet he was joyed to hear that his Intelligence concerning Ciaxares was not true; yet thoſe Reports did not riſe without ſome Ground; for, doubtleſs, the King of Medes was ſo extreamly grieved at this laſt carrying away of Mandana, that he fell ſo extreamly ſick, as all in Ecbatan feared his Death, and all the Kingdom thought him dead. Cyrus was not joyed at this News only, becauſe he loved Ciaxares, though he had held him Priſoner: but alſo becauſe the Princeſs ſhould not be grieved at her Father's Death, at a time when ſhe was deprived of all Conſolation, and loaded with all Miſeries. And that ſhe might hear nothing of it, he made continual skirmiſhes upon all favourable Occaſions.

But after Cyrus had entirely defeated the left Wing of his Enemies (as I told you) and had aſſaulted the Infantry of the Maſſagettans, and aſſaulted them in ſuch Order and Vigour, without the leaſt Diſorder in his own, he alſo routed the Infantry of Callipides; thoſe of the Iſſedons; and quite defeated thoſe of the two Scythian Kings.

But when he was in this glorious Condition, wherein he might well hope to be quickly Conqueror; he ſaw, upon a ſudden, the pitiful State unto which his left Wing was brought; and plainly ſaw, that all did abſolutely depend upon thoſe Forces which were with him. So that to loſe no time, in following thoſe whom he had already routed, he thought only of conquering thoſe who had routed his Men. So that after he had, by his Looks, put freſh Courage into his Men, he forſook his new-got Victory, and went to fall upon that part of the Army of Thomiris which had routed his; and finding them all careleſs, and in ſuch a negligence as Victory uſeth to put them into, who know not how to uſe it after it is gotten, he entirely defeated them without much pain. And ſo it happened, that thoſe who eſcaped the Victory of Cyrus by flying, were met withal by Mazares.

Thus the illuſtrious Cyrus had the Glory to vanquiſh thoſe who vanquiſhed his, entirely to defeat the two Wings of his Enemies Army, and to have vanquiſhed a great part of Thomiris her Foot. There remained now, none but a huge Body of Infantry to fight with; which being compoſed only of Maſſagettans, were placed near the Artillery of that Army; and who ſeemed to ſtand in ſuch a reſolute Poſture, that it was eaſy to ſee that they would defend their Lives and Liberties with the laſt drop of their Blood. The Valiant Terez commanded this Body; but being very lame, by reaſon of former received Wounds, he could not ride, but always was carried in a little Chariot.

This old experienced Captain, being thus in the Head of theſe Maſſagettans, Cyrus aſſaulted them; and he made the more haſte, becauſe he underſtood by ſome Priſoners which were taken, that the Prince Aripithis was coming up with a Puiſſant Army of Sauromates; and that he was already in the Wood; alſo underſtanding that Mazares (who was in purſuit of thoſe he routed) had not met with Aripithes, he thought it beſt to fall on this Enemy before the other was joined: Yet he had but few Horſe with him, for they were all buſy in Pillaging after the laſt Victory. But for all that, or without ſtaying for the Body of his Reſerve, he couragiouſly charged the Enemy, though he had but few Horſe to back him. But after he had beaten all the ſeveral Bodies of Thomiris's Army; and not finding Ariantes, he charged this in hopes of meeting with him. However Terez ſeeing Cyrus come in with ſuch fury, yet moved not; but commanded his Men not to draw an Arrow until all their Enemies were within leſs than Arrow-ſhot: But when Cyrus was within that diſtance, Terez, that old Souldier, opened his Battalions, and gave ſuch a Volley from their Engines and Bows, that the Air was obſcur'd, and the Army of Cyrus extreamly galled; and if the extream Valour of that Prince had not held up their Hearts, thoſe who vanquiſhed others, had now been vanquiſhed themſelves. But as good Luck was, Terez had no Cavalry to repulſe them; and ſo ſince he could make no Advantage of their Diſorder, they did not recoil; but Cyrus did ſo encourage them, that he led them on again. But Terez having time enough to charge his Engines again, this ſecond Aſſault had no better Succeſs than the firſt: And it was the third time before the Conqueror of Aſia could break theſe fierce Enemies, though he did things which were abſolute Prodigies; and though the Princes with him did ſignalize themſelves by a thouſand Acts of Courage, yet all this reſolute Valour of theſe Maſſagettans, was uſeleſs to them; for Cyrus having cauſed the Body of his Reſerve to advance; and ſome other Troops whom he had ſent in purſuit, being returned, he compaſſed about this valiant Infantry on all ſides. So as theſe couragious Maſſagettans, having no way left but to render themſelves; and ſince they might do it with Honour they made ſuch Signs as thoſe uſe who demand Quarter; and the illuſtrious Cyrus deſiring to ſave the Lives of ſuch brave Men, advanced towards them to take their Words, and to give his; but ſince he advanced without making any Sign of giving Quarter, they thought he came to aſſault them; ſo that diſcharging their Engines and Arrows afreſh, all thoſe who followed Cyrus, ſaw that Prince in ſuch imminent danger, that out of their love to him, they fell upon theſe valliant Maſſagettans, without any Orders, and ſo aſſaulted them on all ſides at once, that they quite broke them, and diſperſed their Battalions. In the mean time, Cyrus moved with a generous Paſſion to ſee ſo many brave Souldiers like to periſh, his Action was as glorious in ſtriving to ſave them, as it was a little before in killing others; for, maugre all the Tumult and Confuſion, he ran into the midſt of the Conquered, and Conquerors, crying, as loud as ever he could, that Quarter ſhould be given to the Maſſagettans; menacing, with Heroick Fury, all thoſe who helped him to get the Victory, if they did not pardon the Conquered, and obey him. This Command was no ſooner heard, but preſently the Souldiers of Cyrus ceaſed killing; and the Maſſagettans charmed with the Clemency of their Conqueror, threw down their Arms, and flocked all about him, looking upon him then as their Protector, whom a Minute before they fought againſt as their Enemy. Indeed, there was not an Officer, who did not deſire the honour of rendring himſelf unto that Prince, and not a common Souldier who at leaſt longed not to come near him; and they ſeemed not ſorry for loſing the Battel, ſince ſo great and clement a Prince had gotten it; and their Actions were ſo ſignificative to expreſs the high Thoughts they had of this Heroe's Clemency, that words needed not to expreſs them; for, maugre the Tumult, which could not be appeaſed in an inſtant, they acknowledged that their Joy to ſee their Illuſtrious Conqueror did much comfort them for being conquered.

In the mean time, Cyrus knowing that Conquerors muſt never ſleep in the Arms of a Victory; as ſoon as he had ſaved the Lives of theſe valiant Maſſagettans, had given Orders for the ſafety of the Priſoners, and had commanded to have a care of the Body of the valiant Terez, who was killed at this ſhock; he intended preſently to rally his victorious Troops, purpoſely to relieve Mazares, in caſe he had met, and were repulſed by Aripithes; and to go himſelf and fall upon the Prince of Sauromates, romates, if he durſt come out of the Woods into the Plains.

But as he was buſied in rallying them together, Mazares, who had been in purſuit of his Enemies, arrived, and acquainted Cyrus, that Aripithis not daring to engage him in the Plain, kept ſtill in the Woods, where he had received into the narrow Paſſes, the Troops which he had broken; adding, that for all this, he purſued them haſtily, and underſtood by ſome Priſoners taken in the Woods, that the Forces of Aripithis, which had not fought, were retreated in ſuch confuſion, that one could hardly diſcern them from thoſe who defeated them. But can you not learn from thoſe Priſoners (ſaid Cyrus, after he had in few words commended Mazares for what he had done) the reaſon why I ſhould not meet with Ariantes all this day, though I have moſt carefully ſought for him? nor can you not learn where Thomiris was during the Fight? or in what place the Prince her Son fought?

As for Ariantes, Sir, replied Mazares, you were not likely to meet him, for whilſt you, Sir, were defeating the left Wing of his Army, he fought in the Right, and routed your left Wing; ſo that whilſt you were aſſaulting his Infantry, he left the Wing which he commanded, to help thoſe whom I purſued; but ſeeing he could not, and knew by thoſe whom you routed, that you had vanquiſhed his victorious Wing; he went to join with Thomiris, who ſtaid in that part of the Wood where Aripithis was to come. So that ſeeing no likelihood of Victory, they ſent Orders to thoſe Forces which were before the Fort, to retire, and they themſelves alſo are retired: Aripithis ſtaying far in the Wood with his Forces, I did not think good to engage him in the narrow Paſſes, but came to you, Sir, to tell you, that there is none who can diſpute the Victory with you; but as for Spargapiſes I know nothing.

Mazares had no ſooner done ſpeaking, but Cyrus deſiring to teach his Men by his Example, that all Bleſſings come only from Heaven; he fell down upon his Knees, and looking up to the Sun, which is the adored Deity of the Perſians, he gave thanks for the Victory: Thus he was ſeen victorious in the midſt of a Field full of dead and dying Men, under the homage of his Valour unto the God whom he adored. All his Troops, after his Example, did the like; and every one according to the Religion of his Country, did the like Gratitude for ſuch a ſignal Victory. Indeed, never was any more compleat, the whole Army of the Enemy was vanquiſhed, not a Squadron unſcattered and undiſperſed. Few of the Officers but what were either kill'd or Priſoners: The valiant Terez died in the Head of that couragious Infantry which fought the laſt. All the Enemies Engines and Batteries were taken, and ſerved for a Trophy of Glory unto the Conqueror: Their Baggage enriched all the Souldiers of Cyrus his Army: And in teſtimony of this great Conqueror's Victory, he encamped in the Enemies Camp; but his greateſt Glory was, that Myrſiles, Artamas, Intaphernes, Atergates, Gobrias, Gadates, Idathirſes, and all that were at this great Day's Work, did publiſh aloud, that Cyrus alone won the Battel.

And it is moſt certain, without any flattery of him, that the Prudence by which he guided his Valour, did get him the Day; for had he not reſtrained the Impetuoſity of his Courage, and the forwardneſs of his Troops, when he had broken the left Wing of his Enemies, Things had not ſucceeded ſo happily: for Creſus having led on his Troops with a little too much precipitation, they were preſently routed; not but that he did ſignalize himſelf upon that occaſion, and ſhewed much Courage: But yet after he had received a great Wound in his right Arm, and was carried out of the Fight, he had the ſorrow to ſee that Wing which he commanded quite put to flight; many Battalions of his Infantry torn in Pieces; all his Engines taken by the Maſſagettans; and indeed to have ſeen all his Men periſh, had not the Body of Reſerve advanced in the Reer to their Relief. Thus one would have ſaid, that the Victory had been on both ſides; for the right Wing of Cyrus, where he himſelf ſelf was, did rout the left Wing of Thomiris; and the right Wing of Thomiris, where Ariantes was, did rout the left Wing of Cyrus.

But whilſt this double Victory was on either ſide, the Infantry was not idle, for that of Cyrus advanced againſt that of the Maſſagettans. After all, the moſt pleaſing of his Thoughts upon this occaſion was, to imagine, that the noiſe of his Victory would reach Mandana; and that ſhe would thank him for what he had done to deliver her.

As he was thus enjoying the ſweet Fruits of his Victory, in thinking upon his Princeſs, Chriſantes came haſtily to him, and told him, that one of the Priſoners, who had the honour to be taken by his own Hand, was the Prince Spargapiſes. How! (ſaid Cyrus) the Son of Thomiris my Priſoner? Yes, Sir, (replied Chriſantes) but thoſe unto whom you committed all the Priſoners in guard, having obſerved that this Prince whom they knew not, had made more endeavours to eſcape than any of the reſt; and ſeeing that they had a great number to guard, they bound him for the more ſecurity; but a Maſſagettan, who had ſeen me heretofore with you at the Tents-Royal, not being able to endure the Son of his Queen to be in that condition, and conſidering that I could not know him, becauſe he was at Iſſedon, when you, Sir, were with Thomiris, he acquainted me who he was, in hopes of better uſage: But Spargapiſes hearing and obſerving that I underſtood his Language, he called unto me: Since I cannot conceal my ſelf (ſaid he unto me) I pray let Cyrus know how his Men uſe me like a Slave; and I deſire ſo much favour from him, as to be treated as a Priſoner of War, and not to be tied up as I am. This Prince had no ſooner ſaid ſo, but going to him, I endeavoured to let him know that you would be extreamly ſorry for the uſage he had received; and I would preſently have cauſed him to be unbound; but he who had the chief command of the Guard not being there, the Souldiers, who underſtood not what the Prince ſaid unto me, would not looſe him; ſo that I came in all haſte to acquaint you, Sir, that you may give Orders for it.

Cyrus no ſooner heard what Chriſantes ſaid, but he imagined that Mandana would be loaded with the ſame Chains Spargapiſes was, and that Thomiris would revenge upon her the hard uſage her Son had received; ſo that being both griev'd and vexed at what his Men had done, though he was very glad of ſuch a Priſoner, he ſent Hidaſpes with Chriſantes to cauſe him to be delivered, and to bring him to his Tent, commanding them to tell Spargapiſes, that he had rather have been bound himſelf, than to ſee ſo great a Prince as he in ſuch a condition.

Hidaſpes and Chriſantes, according to the Orders of Cyrus, went to Spargapiſes, and unbound him with their own Hands, after they had told him what Cyrus had ſaid. As long as they ſpoke, this young Prince (who was very lovely, though of a ſurly Deportment) did hearken to them without any interruption, but he hearkened unto them with ſuch a fretting look, as made it ſeem he took his Misfortune with much impatience; ſo that deſiring to comfort him, they added, unto what Cyrus had ſaid, that he might be ſure his Impriſoment would not be long; for (ſaid Hidaſpes unto him) if the Queen of Maſſagettes pleaſe, ſhe has one in her Power, whoſe exchange will quickly ſet you at Liberty. If I be not free before (replied he ſternly) Mandana be delivered, I ſhall not be free ſo ſoon as you imagine; but, I hope, for all that, I ſhall be free e're long, and Cyrus ſhall know, that it is not an eaſy matter to keep a Priſoner long, who has not the heart of a Slave, and that I am not unworthy of the favour which he does me. As he ſaid ſo, the Cords being quite looſened, he drew out a Dagger which none knew of, and ſtabbed himſelf to the Heart with ſo much fury and dexterity, that he cut it in two; ſo that falling immediately dead, between Hidaſpes and Chriſantes, they ſtood aſtoniſhed at the Act, and were ſo grieved at it, that they knew not how to relate the Accident unto Cyrus, yet relate late it they muſt; ſo that after they had left the Guard of the dead Body of this Prince amongſt them who guarded it living, they returned unto Cyrus, who was imparting unto Mazares his Joys at the having Spargapiſes in his Power, thinking this might further the Liberty of Mandana, or at leaſt manifeſt the Intentions of Thomiris amongſt her People. For indeed, ſaid he unto this generous Rival, I will ſend to morrow towards this Princeſs, to offer her Son in exchange of Mandana: And it is to be believed, that if ſhe will not reſtore her upon theſe Terms, the People will murmur, and that ſhe will not eaſily raiſe another Army to oppoſe us; and if ſhe do reſtore her, then the War is ended.

As Cyrus pronounced theſe laſt words, Hidaſpes and Chriſantes entred, and he asked them whether they had brought Spargapiſes? I would he were in a condition to be brought, replied Hidaſpes. Why, ſaid Cyrus, is he eſcaped? No, Sir, replied Chriſantes, but as ſoon as we had looſed him from his Manacles, he ſtabb'd himſelf to the Heart, and did it with ſo much courage, fury, and haſte, that none ever ſaw the Poniard till it was drawn out of his Heart. Alas, Chriſantes, ſaid Cyrus, what a moſt ſad Accident do you tell me! Alas, Hidaſpes, (cried out Mazares) why did you not hinder him? After this, theſe two Princes were acquainted with the Paſſage. Truly (ſaid Cyrus, after he knew it) I am extreamly deceived, for I thought to have enjoyed my Victory with ſome advantage, when Spargapiſes was in my Power; but, alas, I plainly ſee, Fortune is reſolved to make me eternally unhappy, and put me in hopes, only to throw me into deſpair: for, (added he, and looked upon Mazares) do but conſider a little the ſad Conſequences that may follow this Death, and certainly you will find that I am in danger to be the moſt unfortunate Prince in the World. But (purſued he, and ſpoke to Chriſantes) did this unfortunate Prince kill himſelf in the ſight of all the Priſoners? No, Sir, (replied he) for whilſt I was coming to you to tell you that he was your Priſoner, his Guards ſeeing I had treated him as a Perſon of Quality, had ſevered him from the reſt, and carried him into another Tent.

Well, Fortune, (cried out Cyrus) thou haſt now done thy worſt, for Thomiris will accuſe me of her Son's Death. That Accuſation is ſo unlikely, (replied Mazares) that I cannot ſee you have any reaſon to fear it. All that does beſal me is ſo extraordinary, (replied Cyrus) that I muſt prepare my ſelf for the worſt, and moſt ſtrange things. By what an odd way does Fortune poiſon all the good ſhe hath done me? and how uſeleſs hath ſhe made my Victory? For, truly, (purſued he, tranſported with Sorrow) I ſee her ſo reſolutely bent to perſecute me, that I fear I cannot enter to morrow into the Fort of Sauromates: Me-thinks I ſee all the Trees in the Woods metamorphos'd into Souldiers; that I ſhall find an Army more numerous than that I have defeated; that I ſhall never ſee Mandana delivered, and that I ſhall be beaten and made Priſoner by Thomiris. After this, Cyrus being a while ſilent, his Spirit began to return by degrees to its ordinary temper. Afterwards he commanded that all things neceſſary ſhould be prepared for ſending the Body of Spargapiſes unto Thomiris with all imaginable Honours; he had alſo a great care for the Funeral of Terez, and all the reſt; and he ſent Ortalques in all haſte to Anacharſis, to deſire him, that he would go and plead his Juſtification unto Thomiris, by accompanying the Body of her Son, hoping that the Wiſdom of this excellent Man would make her receive this Accident with more moderation. But in ſending Ortalques, Cyrus wrote alſo to the Queen of Pontus, and the Princeſs of Armenia, to make them ſharers, both in his Joys and Sorrows.

Furthermore, Feraulas ſeeing himſelf at Liberty, he ſent unto Cyrus, at the very ſame time when that Prince ſent unto him to tell him, that he would come the next day and lie in the Fort of Sauromates; which after a moſt unquiet Night's Reſt he did; and Feraulas received him with all Honours due unto a great Conqueror, and their Deliverer.

He was no ſooner there, but an Envoy from Thomiris deſired to ſpeak with him; and Cyrus verily believing that this Princeſs had ſent concerning her Son, he was grieved to the very Soul; yet ſince there was a neceſſity of giving him Audience, he commanded to bring him in. I come, Sir, (ſaid the Meſſenger unto him) to ask you, from Thomiris, whether the Prince her Son be your Priſoner? And to tell you, that if he be in your Hands, as ſhe believes he is, as you ſhall uſe him, ſo will ſhe uſe thoſe of yours, eſpecially the Princeſs Mandana; and to oblige you, Sir, to conſider very well of what ſhe ſays, She hath commanded me to tell you, that ſhe is not in ſo bad a Condition as you imagine her; for as ſhe returned to the Tents-Royal, ſhe underſtood that the Boriſthenites had ſent her a very puiſſant Aid, which was very near at hand; that the Gelons did the ſame; that the Androphageans did the like: and that all theſe Forces being joined with the Sauromates, who yet never fought, and to the reſt which ſhe had rallied, ſhe was able enough to revenge any Injury done unto her Son. Cyrus knowing that the Maſſagettans hold it a great Affront to interrupt thoſe who ſpeak from their Princeſs, he ſuffered this Meſſenger to ſpeak on, though at the very beginning of his Speech he had a great deſire to acquaint him with the ſad Fate of Spargapiſes: But ſince he would not give the leaſt colour of Complaint unto an Enemy, who complained but too much already, he heard this Meſſenger very patiently; but when he ſaw he had no more to ſay, I would to the Gods (ſaid he unto him) that I were able to treat the Prince Spargapiſes very well, and to teach the Queen of the Maſſagettans, by my Example, how to treat the Princeſs Mandana. But, truly ſaid he, (after he had told him, in ſhort, the Accident) ſince the Gods are not pleaſed I ſhould expreſs any reſpects unto that Princeſs, in the Perſon of the Prince her Son; yet without any reply unto her Menaces, I will ſend her the Body of Spargapiſes with all imaginable Honours: Therefore, Sir, I will give you your Anſwer within this day or two; that he whom I intend to ſend unto her with this ſad News, may go with you: and indeed ſo they did. Cyrus had a good mind to advance towards the Tents-Royal, and hinder the conjunction of theſe Forces; but ſince it was not poſſible for to win another great Battel againſt freſh Men, until his Army had a little refreſhed themſelves, he did not attempt it, and the rather, becauſe he was to paſs through more Woods, and more ſtrait Paſſes, before he could come to the Tents-Royal, than yet he had paſſed, ſo that there was an abſolute neceſſity of ſitting ſtill ſome days. In the mean while, Ortalques making great haſte, Anacharſis came ſooner than he could expect him; yet he no ſooner ſaw him, but he acquainted him with the Negotiation which he deſired him to undertake; and the next Morning he diſmiſſed the Meſſengers of Thomiris, with Orders only to tell that Princeſs Anarcharſis knew all his Thoughts, and to beſeech her to believe all he ſaid.

After which the Body of Spargapiſes was laid in a Coffin; which Coffin was put into a Chariot which had all the Mourning Ornaments, by which they honour'd thoſe who die in Wars withal. Cyrus himſelf followed this Chariot, with a great number of his Men in Mourning, and omitted nothing which might perſwade Thomiris that he would have treated her Son very well if he were living, ſince he honoured him ſo much being dead. But Mandana being always in his Mind, he gave Ortalques a Letter for her, and another for Gelonide, in hopes of her continuance in doing him all good Offices. Atargatis alſo wrote unto the Princeſs Iſtrina, and unto the Princeſs of Bithynia; Intaphernes alſo did the like; Gadates alſo wrote unto his Daughter very favourably, in behalf of Atergatis, of whom he had a better Opinion ſince he came into the Army of Cyrus; for ſince he would not formerly have oppoſed his Affection, but becauſe he hoped that at the end of the War, Iſtrina would have married the King of Aſſyria, this Prince being now dead, he thought very well of this Lover of Iſtrina's; unto whom, as I told you, he wrote a Letter by Ortalques. Myrſiles alſo charged him with a Letter to Doraliſſa, Feraulas another to Marteſia; Hidaſpes and Gobrias deſired him to enquire very carefully whether a Lady came unto Thomiris, whoſe Name was Arpaſia, conducted by a Man whoſe Name was Licander. Adonacris alſo writ by him unto Agatherſes, who he knew was with Thomiris, and thereby moved him to compoſe things as much as he could: And Anabris alſo writ unto all his Friends which he had in that Court to do the like. Thus Ortalques was charged with ſo many different Commiſſions, that he ſtood in need of all his Wit to acquit himſelf well of them all. Mazares had a good mind to ſend one unto Mandana; but he maſtered himſelf, and contented himſelf with thinking upon her, without moving her to think upon him.

In the mean time, Cyrus talked a long while with Anacharſis in private; after which, that ſage Scythian went with the Envoy of Thomiris, who went next the Chariot which carried the Corps of Spargapiſes. But as ſoon as they were gone, Cyrus gave himſelf wholly to fit his Army for an advance towards the Tents-Royal, in caſe Thomiris did not change her Mind, as there was no great likelihood ſhe would.

In the mean time Cyrus was in ſuch a miſerable Condition, as no ſigns of any Victory was to be ſeen in him. Thomiris and Ariantes ſuffered incredible Torment of Mind; and Mandana, though a Captive, yet had more ſweet Minutes than they all had; for ſince the Fame of Cyrus his Victory had reached her Ear, maugre all the Oppoſitions of Ariantes, ſhe was extreamly well ſatisfied, and talked merrily with Doraliſſa and Marteſia. The Princeſs Iſtrina, and the Princeſs of Bithynia, were joyed beyond meaſure, for they verily believed that it was advantagious for them that Cyrus ſhould be Conqueror; and the Fair Arpaſia, whom Licander had brought unto Thomiris, was in the ſame mind.

In the mean time, Ariantes uſed all his endeavour to rally that Army which Cyrus had routed; and gave all requiſite Orders for ſecuring and guarding the narrow Paſſes in the Wood, that his Rival might not advance towards the Tents-Royal, until all the Forces of Thomiris were joyned. Aripithis who bore a deadly hatred unto Cyrus, becauſe he was perſwaded, that if Thomiris had not loved him, he ſhould have been happy; therefore he endeavoured all he could to give a ſtop unto the Victories of that Prince. Yet he wiſhed with all his Heart that Mandana were out of the Power of Thomiris, and his Mind was ſo ravelled that he knew not himſelf what to wiſh. Since his Troops did not yet fight, he ſtayed at the entry into the Wood, to ſtop Cyrus if he advanced. So it hapned, that when Spargapiſes was killed, a Priſoner eſcaped, for this Accident made ſuch a noiſe, as the Priſoners were more careleſly guarded; their Souldiers lurking ſome Nights in the Woods, at laſt came to the place where Aripithis was. This Prince knowing he had been a Priſoner unto Cyrus, asked him what news: The Souldiers having but a confuſed knowledg of Spargapiſes's Death, ſaid, that that Prince was taken: That the Souldiers of Cyrus bound him, and carried him into a Tent ſeparate from theirs, and that a little time after it was ſaid he was dead; Yet adding afterwards, that the Souldiers of Cyrus ſaid he killed himſelf. Aripithis deſiring no more than to drive Cyrus out of the Heart of Thomiris, made uſe of this Report, to that end; Not that he did ſuſpect Cyrus would ever kill Spargapiſes: But knowing that Thomiris was of a violent Spirit; and that the Tale of this Souldier was ſomething probable, and enough to make that Queen think that Cyrus had treated her Son very ill; he moved this Souldier by large promiſes of Recompence, to tell Thomiris the ſame Tale he told him, and to chuſe his time when he ſhould be preſent. At firſt this Souldier heſitated at it: for the Valour and Clemency of Cyrus having gained his Heart, he was unwilling to infuſe any Suſpitions of Cruelty into Thomiris. But at laſt, Aripithis telling him, that it highly concerned Thomiris to know it, and joyning Menaces with his Promiſes, he undertook it. So that as ſoon as Aripithis came to the Tents-Royal, and was with Thomiris, this Souldier preſented himſelf, and told the Queen what he had told Aripithis: to wit, that the Prince her Son was taken Priſoner; that they bound him; that he was carried into a Tent by himſelf; and that preſently after it was reported he was dead, which made ſuch a hurley-burley, that in the interim he eſcaped. Thomiris no ſooner heard this from the Souldier, but Aripithis added, that he knew as much from two others, though he durſt not tell her. Is it poſſible (cryed out Thomiris) that my Son ſhould be dead? Dead by Orders from Cyrus? Is Cyrus capable of ſuch a bloody Act, againſt all the Laws of Honour or War? Is his hatred of me ſo high, as it makes him violate all manner of Rights? Since ſo, I muſt and will be revenged. As ſhe pronounced theſe words, one came and told her, that Anacharſis was come with the Meſſenger ſhe ſent to Cyrus; and brought the Body of the Prince her Son. She no ſooner heard this, but all in a Fury, ſhe went out, and paſſed from Tent to Tent, until ſhe came unto one which opened into a great Plain, as if ſhe would her ſelf go ſee whether this was true or no: But as ſoon as ſhe came into this great Tent, ſhe ſaw the Coffin in which the Prince her Son did lie. This ſad Object both grieving and amazing her, and her Mind being alſo highly incenſed to think that the Man whom of all the World ſhe loved beſt, ſhould kill her Son, ſhe was almoſt ſtark mad. She no ſooner ſaw the Coffin, but after ſuch a ſad Cry, as would have tendered a Heart of Stone, ſhe addreſſed her ſelf unto Anacharſis: How durſt you (ſaid ſhe unto him, with Eyes full of Fury) bring me any thing from the Murtherer of my Son? who certainly would never have ſent me his Corps, but becauſe he hoped it would be my Death. The Phraſe you give, Madam, unto that great Prince who ſent me to you, doth ſo ill and ſo little ſute unto him, (ſaid Anacharſis to her) that I am forced to interrupt your Majeſty, and to hinder you from wronging the Generous, and moſt illuſtrious Prince upon Earth. Ah Anacharſis (cryed ſhe) I muſt interrupt you: For I cannot endure to hear a Prince commended who has treated my Son ſo ill, who cauſed him to be bound like a Slave, and who has moſt inhumanly ſtabb'd him. I beſeech you, Madam, (replied Anacharſis) be pleaſed to receive the truth from my Mouth, and hearken not unto thoſe Lies which are belched out by the Enemies of Cyrus. For believe it, Madam, confidently believe it, that Cyrus never treated Spargapiſes ill: But on the contrary, ſent in all haſte to unbind him; and was grieved to the Soul when he heard that young and generous Prince had ſtabbed himſelf, as ſoon as ever he was unbound. Since I was not in the Tent where that unfortunate Prince died, replied ſhe, I cannot directly tell the Paſſages: But I am ſure that in all likelihood, Cyrus cauſed him to be killed. For he was bound, and none of the Priſoners beſides; he was carried into a Tent by himſelf; and as ſoon as two Men came to him from Cyrus, his Death was preſently publiſhed. Alſo though it be as you ſay; yet Cyrus is not innocent: for though my Son did not die by any order from him, yet the rigour which was uſed to him, did cauſe his Death: and therefore I charge you to ſay no more in his behalf; but command you to tell him from me, that I declare eternal War with him: That in revenge of my Son's Death, I will load Mandana with more Irons, than that unfortunate Prince carried. And that within a few daies I will ſend him back the Corps of that Princeſs whom he adores, in the ſame Coffin which brought my Son. As ſhe ſaid ſo, the Prince Ariantes coming to her, and hearing theſe Words, he grew pale with fear and wonder; So that his Love of Mandana moving him, he was neceſſitated to juſtify his Rival, leſt the violence of Thomiris ſhould become dangerous. Alſo ſhe had no ſooner pronounced theſe terrible Words, but Ariantes ſpoke to her with as much Reverence as Sorrow; You know, Madam, (ſaid he unto her) that Fate hath brought me into that condition, as I can never be a Friend unto Cyrus: but have many Reaſons to hate him: Yet for all that, Honour bids me tell your Majeſty, that I can never believe that Cyrus did either uſe ill, or kill the Prince Spargapiſes; for he is one that ſtands more upon his Glory, than to have his Hand in any baſe Act; and I muſt tell you, Madam, that Mandana being in your Hands, it is not credible he ſhould ever do ſuch a thing. I know (ſaid ſhe unto him) that this Prince had no reaſon for it, but I know better, that howſoever it was, he was the cauſe of my Son's Death, and if I cannot be revenged upon him, yet I ought, and will upon Mandana; and therefore (added ſhe, tranſported with Fury) I take it ill you ſhould ſet Limits to my Vengeance, and Juſtify the Murtherer of a Prince in preſence of his Corps, and unto whom you ſhould have been ſubject. For Heaven's ſake, Madam, (ſaid Anacharſis then) ſtifle all theſe thoughts, and let your Reaſon ſurmount your Sorrows; for I am moſt confident, that to morrow you will repent of this day's Thoughts. I have already told you (replied ſhe) that I will hearken no more unto you; yet tell Cyrus, that if within three days he will come and put himſelf into my Fetters, I will ſpare Mandana's Life; if he will not, I will take my courſe, and in lieu of ſeeing her in Triumph, as he hoped, he ſhall ſee her in Spargapiſes's Coffin. Anacharſis and Ariantes ſeeing her ſo incenſed, would have ſaid ſomething to appeaſe her Fury; who abruptly left them, after ſhe had given three Commands. The firſt, to ſet the Corps of Spargapiſes in one of her Tents, in the Hands of Religious Men: The ſecond to double the Guards upon Mandana: and the third, that Anacharſis ſhould depart that very minute, and not ſpeak unto any one living. And indeed this wiſe and victorious Scythian, was forced to obey this unjuſt Princeſs, and carry unto Cyrus the ſaddeſt news that ever he received, ſince Mazares told him at Synope, that Mandana was drowned.

PART X. BOOK I.

SInce Ortalgues was not with Anacharſis when he had audience from Thomiris, becauſe he was buſied in diſcharging himſelf of thoſe Letters which he took upon him to deliver; Thoſe who were to ſee Anacharſis depart that very hour from the Tents Royal, never thought upon him: So that Anacharſis with thoſe who waited upon the Corps of Spargapiſes, went away without Ortalgues. But when Anacharſis came to the laſt guard of the Maſſagettans, which was at the ſtrait paſſage in the wood; and began to think upon the Gulf of ſorrow which the ſoul of Cyrus would be plunged into, to reflect upon all the miſeries of this life, and to conſider the ſad conſequences which do commonly follow all violent Paſſions: How happy did he think himſelf, in that he had wholly ſubdued all his paſſions unto his reaſon? And that he was above the reach of fortune, in ſcorning all that ſhe was able to do unto him, and in applying himſelf only unto the love of virtue, and ſtudy of Philoſophy, yet he ſtood in need of all his wiſdom, to keep himſelf from murmuring againſt the gods whom he adored, for expoſing Cyrus unto ſo many diſaſterous adventures; But his greateſt care was, to find out ſuch words as might ſweeten that meſſage which he was to deliver unto him from Thomiris: Yet that labour was ſaved; for this revengeful Princeſs, imagining that Anacharſis would not deliver her meſſage in ſuch tearms as ſhe expreſſed, did ſend an emiſſary of her own unto Cyrus; not only to ſee that her meſſage was fully delivered, but alſo to know his preciſe anſwer. So that though this envoy from Thomiris did ſet out two hours after Anacharſis, yet making more haſte than he did, he overtook him, before he came to the Fort of Sauromates, where Cyrus was. Thus this wiſe Scithian had not power to leſſen his ſorrows, by concealing a little the fury of Thomiris; for he was ſure that this meſſenger would ſpeak her meſſage in her own words. However, this great and miſerable Prince no ſooner knew that Anacharſis was returned with a meſſenger from Thomiris, but his heart and ſpirits did begin to beat a turbulent and diſordered pulſe: hopes and fears did ſucceſſively raiſe and deject him.

There was then preſent with him, Mazares, Artamas, Atergates, Intaphernes, Hidaſpes, Araſpes, and Aglatidas. But though much inquietude and impatience appeared in all their faces; yet it was eaſie to diſcern, that Cyrus and Mazares had ſuch a curioſity to know the buſineſs of this envoy from Thomiris, as could not poſſibly proceed but from one and the ſame paſſion. Indeed, they had both of them ſuch a deſire to hear how that Queen received the news of her Son's death, and were ſo affraid leſt ſhe ſhould have ſome revenging reſolutions upon Mandana, as they expreſſed their ſorrows and their fears in every wrinkle of their faces. They did communicate their ſadneſs and impatiency by their very looks: Though Mazares did ſtill ſtrive as much as ever he could to hide ſome part of his reſentments, purpoſely to hide his love from his generous Rival, with whom he neither could nor would diſpute for Mandana, yet he had much ado. But at laſt Cyrus commanded that Anacharſis ſhould enter, and the meſſenger from Thomiris to ſtay in the next Tent until he was a little inſtructed what to ſay unto him. Come wiſe Anacharſis, (ſaid Cyrus to him, as ſoon as he appeared) how has Thomiris received you? Alas, Sir, (replyed he, and ſighed) I would the fidelity that I owe unto you would permit me to diſguiſe ſome part of that Princeſs's fury from you: But ſince you muſt know it, and ſince this meſſenger will not mince it, I muſt tell you, that this unjuſt Queen did receive me ſo unworthy both of you and her ſelf, that even the very worſt is to be feared, and nothing that is good is to be hoped for. Alas! Anacharſis (cryed Cyrus out) ſo there be nothing to fear concerning Mandana: Let fortune do her worſt, any way elſe, and I will freely abandon my ſelf unto the fury of Thomiris: But what's her grief? And what unjuſt revenge does ſhe draw from the death of Spargapiſes? Sir (ſaid Anacharſis then) ſince it is not impoſſible but her mind may change ſince I left her, I conceive it fit you know what this meſſenger will tell you, before I impart what ſhe commanded me to ſay unto you, for upon ſecond ſerious conſideration, I cannot believe ſhe can continue in ſuch unjuſt thoughts, but will even abhor her own injuſtice. Since you will not tell me what Thomiris ſaid (replyed Cyrus) you give me ſome cauſe to think that ſhe does intend the moſt horrid cruelty in the world; And that ſhe intends to loaden the Princeſs Mandana with the weight of her Irons. Anacharſis, being deſirous to make him fear the very worſt, did return him two or three (ſomething) indirect anſwers; to the end that fearing the worſt, he might apprehend leſs fears afterwards.

So that Cyrus imagining, that perhaps Thomiris intended to put Mandana to death, broke out into ſuch ſad expreſſions, as Anacharſis thought it time to tell him the truth: and ſo in few words he accquainted him, that Thomiris did accuſe him for killing her Son; and commanded him to tell him, that if he did not render himſelf within three days under her power, ſhe would ſend back the body of Mandana in the ſame Coffin, in which he ſent the body of her Son. Yet to your comfort, Sir, (continued ſtill Anacharſis) I muſt in all tell you that the Prince Ariantes does all he can to juſtifie you in the opinion of Thomiris, and you may be aſſured his diſpoſition is ſuch, as that he will oppoſe the fury of this incenſed Queen, as much as ever he can. Alas! Anacharſis, (cryed out Cyrus in a ſad deſpair) nothing can ſtop the revenge of ſuch an humour as Thomiris is of: And I ſee my ſelf in the ſaddeſt condition of any man in the world. For my particular (ſaid Mazares with much ſadneſs) I am perſwaded that Thomiris for her own intereſt will not put Mandana to death. But I am fully perſwaded (replied Cyrus) that ſhe will; only to be revenged upon me, unleſs I will ruine my ſelf: And I am fully reſolved to do it, rather than hazard this moſt excellent Princeſs. However I muſt hear what the Meſſenger from this cruel Queen will ſay: Then commanding he ſhould enter, this Maſſagettan told Cyrus, that Thomiris fearing Anacharſis ſhould not fully deliver his meſſage, ſhe ſent him, to let him know that if within three days, he did not render himſelf unto her, ſhe would put Mandana to death, and ſend him her Corps.

Tell your unjuſt Queen, (replied Cyrus ſternly) that within this three days ſhe ſhall have my anſwer: and tell her alſo, that if ſhe offer any violence unto the Princeſs Mandana, I will not pardon one of the Priſoners who are in my hands; and laying aſide that reſpect which hitherto I ever bore her, though ſhe was my enemy, I will moſt hotly purſue her, until I have revenged the Princeſs whom ſhe ſhall wrong: Yet I will hope, that you will find the mind of the Maſſagettan Queen changed when you are returned to her; and that ſhe will repent of her Injuſtice and cruelty, againſt a Princeſs who never offended her: But once more I charge you to tell her, it is her beſt to take heed of injuring the Princeſs Mandana: Aſſure her, it concerns the lives of all the Priſoners which are, or ever ſhall be in my power. After this, Cyrus having ing diſmiſſed the meſſenger, he was a while ſilent, conſidering what to reſolve upon. At firſt, he thought it beſt to march immediatly to the Tents Royal, to force the paſſes; and in the head of his Army, to ſave the life of his Princeſs: But afterwards conſidering that the more he preſſed upon Thomiris the more reaſon he had to fear Mandana, and that the nearer the Maſſagettan Queen was unto her ruine, ſhe would the ſooner haſten Mandana's, he knew not what to reſolve upon. But as his great heart adviſed him to fight, ſo his love perſwaded him, rather than to hazard his Princeſs, to put himſelf into the hands of Thomiris: Provided ſhe would releaſe Mandana, yet ſince it was not likely ſhe would releaſe her, though he ſhould put himſelf into her power, he rejected that thought as well as the reſt.

In the mean time, conſidering the ſtate of things, he muſt either ſubmit himſelf her Priſoner, or endanger the life of Mandana. So as not knowing what to reſolve upon, his mind was ſo turbulent, as not being able to encloſe his ſorrows in his own heart; for heavens ſake (ſaid he unto all the company) tell me each of you, what you think to be my beſt courſe, and what I ſhould do, not to hazard the life of my Princeſs? But I beſeech you, conſider only her, and never care what becomes of me: Adviſe me what I ſhall do to ſave her, and never conſider my Army, nor my Conqueſts, nor my life, for I am ſo far from all theſe conſiderations, that I do not value my own Glory, in competition of her ſafety. And though it be a ſhame for the Conqueror of Thomiris to take her fetters upon him, yet I am moſt ready to do it, unleſs you can find out ſome other way to keep my Princeſs from periſhing. I know there's none amongſt you who dare tell me, it is requiſite to receive fetters from the hands of a Queen whom I have conquered, but unleſs you find me out ſome better expedient, I ſhall tell it unto my ſelf: For my part, Sir, (ſaid Anacharſis) I conceive the beſt expedient is to draw the buſineſs out at length, by returning a dubious anſwer, and ſo gain time for the Prince Ariantes either to perſwade Thomiris unto reaſon, or elſe till he get himſelf into a condition able to give a ſtop unto her violences. Alas! wiſe Anacharſis (ſaid Cyrus) It ſeems you are ignorant of the height of that paſſion which poſſeſſeth me, ſince you think it poſſible I ſhould live, even but a few days, in ſuch a cruel incertainty. The truth is, (added Mazares moſt ſadly) minutes wherein the life of Mandana is feared, ſeem very long unto thoſe who are nearly interreſted in her.

Since I am well acquainted with the power of Love, (replyed Intaphernes,) I do eaſily underſtaud your meaning: but to ſpeak unto the buſineſs (as I do think) I can never believe that Queen, who had never made war, but only to make her ſelf loved, will ever give ſo great a provocation of hatred unto him of whom ſhe deſires to be loved, as this, to put the Princeſs whom he adores to death.

Since Thomiris is reported to be of a moſt haſty and violent temper, (replyed Atergatis,) what you ſay is no ſecurity for Mandana's life: But my greateſt hope is in the love of Ariantes: for ſince his paſſion hath been ſo high as to make him forget his duty unto the illuſtrious Cyrus: and ſo violent as to attempt ſo bold an act, as to carry her away before his face, doubtleſs he will be as forward and ingenious as to preſerve Mandana's life, and to find out a way of ſtopping the violence of Thomiris. Though he ſhould not, replyed Hydaſpes, yet I cannot believe that Thomiris will offer to make any attempts upon the life of the Princeſs Mandana: For being freſhly defeated, It were the moſt ſenſeleſs piece of imprudence in the world, to incenſe her Conqueror, by any ſuch cruelty, and therefore I cannot believe ſhe will ever offer it. Since ſhe receives freſh forces from ſeveral places, replyed Araſpes, the conſideration of the Battel loſt will not hinder her revenge: But, as the Prince Atergates moſt wiſely ſaid, Ariantes will give a ſtop, and doubtleſs oppoſe her with good ſucceſs:

For his Cauſe will appear ſo juſt, that I do believe all the Subjects of Thomiris would turn Rebels, if ſhe ſhould command them to put the Princeſs Mandana to death. For my part (ſaid Aglatidas, and addreſſed his ſpeech to Cyrus) I am very well acquainted with all the reſentments that either love or jealouſie can infuſe, and I cannot believe that the Maſſagettan Queen will ever put the Princeſs Mandana to death, but only gives out this thundring threatning, to keep you, Sir, from advancing towards her, until her freſh forces be come up, and joyned unto the reſt of her ſhattered Army.

I muſt confeſs, if ſhe were too hard preſſed upon, deſpair might perchance move her unto any thing: And I do believe that if you were in her power, the life of Mandana would be then more in danger than it is: But as the ſtate of things ſtand, I cannot think ſhe dares revenge her ſelf upon a Princeſs, whoſe death would turn all rational men living to be her enemies. I ſee, (replyed Cyrus,) that you give me your opinions, of what I am to fear or hope for, but I do not ſee that you tell me, what I ought to do; yet ſomething I muſt do: I am engaged to anſwer this unjuſt Princeſs; and I muſt anſwer ſo as may not endanger Mandana. The propoſition which the wiſe Anacharſis made, replyed Artamas, ſeems to be moſt expedient, for a dubious anſwer will give you time to argue with this furious Queen, and will give the Prince Ariantes alſo leaſure to contrive the ſafety of Mandana. Oh Heavens, (cryed Cyrus out) unto what a miſerable condition am I brought? ſince I muſt expect the ſafety of my Princeſs from a Rival whom I would have killed, and who muſt periſh unleſs I periſh my ſelf: No, no, I cannot reſt in this condition: I muſt uſe more violent remedies unto the miſery which torments me: For though I ſhould give an ambiguous anſwer unto this unjuſt Princeſs, yet after all, I muſt make it clear, and ſtill return unto the ſame point where I was. 'Tis true, Sir, replyed Anacharſis; but to bring you unto my opinion, let me tell you, Sir, that to ſtop the execution of any wicked act, eſpecially an act of cruelty, there needs no more but to defer the firſt motions of it, for I am confident that there are very few people in the world who are ſo extreamly wicked, as to continue long obſtinate in the intentions of any unhumane action. Moreover, be pleaſed to conſider, that Thomiris is not naturally wicked: The fury that is now in her mind is but a ſtranger, and therefore it's likely, that if one give her leaſure to examine the buſineſs, ſhe will not do what you do fear, ſince it is a thing oppoſite to her own intereſts. For if Mandana were out of her power, what ſurety had ſhe, if ſhe ſhould fall into yours? Whereas, ſhe having her, ſhe can make her peace when ſhe pleaſeth, and whenſoever ſhe is pleaſed to reſtore that Princeſs ſhe is able to diſarm you: Therefore, Sir, let it not too much trouble you; Do all that Prudence dictates unto you, and leave the reſt unto the gods, who will never ſuffer ſo virtuous a Princeſs as Mandana to dye a death ſo tragical. Alas, wiſe Anacharſis (replyed Cyrus) as great a confidence as I have in the Juſtice of the gods, yet I dare not truſt them with the life of my Princeſs, for their ways are above the reach of all men: And we do ſo often ſee the innocent become miſerable, and the wicked proſperous, that all Mandana's virtue is no ſecurity to me againſt the injuſtice of Thomiris: yet I will follow your Counſel, and when the time comes give ſuch an anſwer as you adviſe.

After this, Cyrus ſeeming as if he deſired to be alone, all the company retired, and left him at liberty to digeſt his own ſorrows. Yet they were no ſooner gone, but this terrible menace of Thomiris coming into his mind, it did ſo diſcompoſe all his thoughts that he knew not what to reſolve upon, and ſometimes he could ſee no way but to put himſelf into the power of the incenſed Queen: for when he fancied Mandana's body in Spargapiſe's Coffin, his reaſon roved, and this ſad imagination made him think Mandana really dead: yet his love ſuggeſting many tumultuous thoughts, he no ſooner reſolved upon one thing, but he preſently condemned it; and ſince he could find no way which was infallible ſafety for Mandana's life, he could not ſtay long in any one thought: And the niceneſs of his Paſſion made him think that Mandana had great reaſon to upbraid him hereafter, if he did not put himſelf in Priſon to releaſe her: But the greateſt difficulty was, how he ſhould be ſure of her ſafety, if he did aſſume her Chains: for Thomiris would not releaſe her until he was in her fetters, and there was not reaſon he ſhould aſſume them before ſhe was at liberty. But alas! (added he) this unjuſt Princeſs did not ſay ſhe would releaſe Mandana if I put my ſelf into her power, but only ſaid, that ſhe would not put her to death: Fie, fie, cruel Thomiris (purſued he) can you threaten a Prince ſo cruelly, who when he could have killed you, did let fall the point of his ſword? and who out of his reſpects to you, did injure his love? unjuſt Princeſs! Can Mandana be in your power and you not love her? Can you think me culpable for being faithful to her? Can you know her and threaten her life? Is it poſſible any ſhould be ſo cruel as to obey you, if you ſhould command them to take away her life? Yet Anacharſis heard this diſmal menace from your own mouth: and I have heard it from your Emiſſarie. After this, the ſoul of Cyrus being ſadded with this diſmal thought, his mind was full of confuſed fancies, which refuſing and diſordering all his faculties, he had not ſo much liberty, as to reaſon the matter aright for a long while: But at laſt, theſe dull Clouds beginning to diſſipate, and the eyes of his reaſon ſeeing clearer, he looked upon things as he ought to do, and ſaw no way more rational than that which Anacharſis adviſed him unto. Yet ſince this Counſel did more ſatisfie his reaſon than his love, he did ſomewhat more than it, and ſent Teraccles ſecretly unto Ariantes, to tell him, that he committed the life of Mandana unto his Guard; proteſting unto him that his own Perſon ſhould anſwer for hers, if Thomiris put her to death: And to ſhew the height of his love, he fully reſolved, according as Thomiris ſhould ſay, after the ambiguons anſwer which he would make her, to put himſelf into the power of that Queen, Provided ſhe would both ſpare the life of that Princeſs, and releaſe her: So that his heart being at ſome reſt after this reſolution taken, he found himſelf able to think upon what anſwer he ſhould ſend unto Thomiris, which might ſpin out the time to a length. And after he had well thought upon it, he reſolved to ſend Chriſantes the third day, to tell this unjuſt Princeſs, that before he would put himſelf into her hands, it was requiſite he ſhould know what ſecurity ſhe would give him for the life of Mandana, declaring unto her, that there was no other, than to ſet her at liberty, and ſend her to the King of Medes. But to have two ſtrings unto his Bow, he intended to advance with his whole Army, the ſame day which Chriſantes departed, and quarter himſelf at the very entrance into the wood, to the end, the anſwer of Thomiris might be more moderate. But though this Reſolution was the moſt reaſonable which he could take, yet he was not ſatisfied with it: and he thought that there was a better courſe to be taken, though he knew not what it was, ſo as relapſing into his complaints, he was in a very miſerable condition.

Mazares for his part, his ſufferings were incredible, and they were the more ſharp, becauſe he durſt not let them be ſeen, leſt by ſhewing his ſorrows, he ſhould ſhew his love. Intaphernes and Atergatis were full of inquietudes; for they conceived that if buſineſs were more intangled, the Princeſs whom they loved would not be overſafe in the hands of Thomiris. Gobrias and Hidaſpes, had the very ſame thoughts for Arpaſia, the firſt, concerned as a Father, the ſecond as a Lover. Myrſiles, in his affection unto Doraliſa, had much ſorrow, for ſince he knew Mandana loved her, his love made him fearful, that the revenge of Thomiris would fall alſo upon her: So that, whether out of intereſt and concernment, or out of compaſſion upon the miſeries of Cyrus, there were very few in the whole Army who were not ſufferers, and full of ſorrows. But the time when Cyrus was to return his Anſwer being come, Chriſantes and Feraulas, being ready to depart, the firſt unto the Maſſagettan Queen, and the other ſecretly unto her Brother, it was told Cyrus, that a man, taken at the entrance into the Wood, deſired to ſpeak with him from Ariantes: At this very word, Cyrus trembled, not only out of hatred to his Rival, but out of fears to hear ſome ſad news from the Princeſs Mandana.

So as being extreamly impatient to know what his enemy had ſent unto him for, he commanded him to be brought in, and as he was in this fearful impatience deſiring to know what he feared, this meſſenger from Ariantes came unto him, and ſpeaking in a low voice, did with much exactneſs and reverence, deliver his meſſage. Sir, (ſaid he unto Cyrus) the Prince Ariantes knowing your affection unto Mandana, was afraid leſt you ſhould do as the Maſſagettan Queen deſires, out of your fears to hazard Mandana's life. Therefore, in acknowledgment of his obligations to you, and out of his deſire to ſerve the Princeſs whom he adores, he hath commanded me to tell you, that you muſt be ſure to keep your ſelf out of the power of Thomiris, and as long as you did ſo, he would anſwer for the life of Mandana: But on the contrary of you did not, then perhaps he ſhould not be able to ſave her; but, Sir, leſt my meſſage ſhould be ſuſpected, I beſeech you keep me in your cuſtody, until the Servant of yours called Ortalgues, returns from the Tents Royal, and acquaints you with the ſtate of things, and what the Prince Ariantes hath done for the Princeſs Mandana. Since he is to return this night (added he) I ſhall not be long in cuſtody, but will aſſure you that when you ſee him, you will not doubt of the ſincere advice which the Prince Ariantes gives you, though he be your Rival and your Enemy.

Since I may very well doubt the honeſty of a Prince who once deceived me, in carrying away the Princeſs Mandana, (replied Cyrus) I will take you at your word; and ſince Ortalgues is to return this night, I will ſet you at liberty again to morrow morning. After this, Cyrus committed this Maſſagettan into the cuſtody of thoſe who brought him in, reſolved to ſtay the ſending of Chriſantes and Feraulas unto Thomiris that night, there being yet time enough to return the anſwer he had promiſed. Though this Meſſage from Ariantes might well have been a comfort unto him, yet his inquietude redoubled: for beſides his miſtruſt of a Rival's Meſſage, he was in extream impatience, until Ortalgues returned, ſo that he could not reſt in any place: And certainly, he had great reaſon to deſire the knowledge of what he longed for, becauſe paſſages at the Tents Royal might very well alter ſince the departure of Anacharſis and the Meſſenger from Thomiris. And indeed, that unjuſt Queen, had no ſooner commanded Anacharſis to depart without ſpeaking unto any, but Mandana's Guards were doubled: Ariantes unto whom the life of that Princeſs was ſo dear, had rather Cyrus ſhould enjoy her, than to ſee her die, and therefore, he went immediately, and made ſure of her Guards, and went to work ſo handſomly and happily, that unknown unto Thomiris he was more Maſter of Mandana's Guard, than Thomiris was a Miſtreſs. That which did much facilitate the deſign of the Prince, was, becauſe he who commanded thoſe forces which were deſigned for Mandana's Guard, had a brother who was Priſoner unto Cyrus: So that being concerned in the preſervation of this Princeſs's life, Ariantes made it appear unto him, that his Brother was loſt for ever, if Thomiris put Mandana to death: ſo that either out of a reſentment of honour, or compaſſion, or intereſt of his Brother, or friendſhip unto Ariantes, or all, he promiſed rather to dye, than Thomiris ſhould put Mandana to death. Ariantes being well ſatisfied with this, he went and plotted with all his Friends, and endeavouring to make ſure of ſome of thoſe Captains which had eſcaped from the Battel, he told them all that was poſſible to make them abhor this diſmal intention of Thomiris, and juſtified Cyrus as much as ever he could concerning the death of Spargapiſes, to the end that the deſign of his Siſter might appear the more unjuſt. Furthermore Ortalgues, who was concealed in a friend's Tent, all the time he was in the Tents Royal, he ſolicited the friend of Anabaris and Adonacris, to oppoſe Thomiris. So as there was a great hurley burley in their Court. Moreover, Ortalgues going to viſit Gelonide, he incited her to ſerve Mandana. But yet ſhe could not deliver thoſe Letters which he had for that Princeſs, only promiſed him to perſwade Thomiris unto reaſon with all the arguments ſhe was able to produce. Ortalgues in this great diſorder, could not deliver any of the Letters which he undertook, except thoſe unto Adonacris and Anabaris. And the preſervation of Mandana's life did ſo wholly take up his mind, that he could not think of any thing elſe. In the mean time, this unfortunate Princeſs wondered at the doubling of her Guards. Doraliſa and Marteſia, no leſs than ſhe. Yet they were grieved much more, when enquiring of one of the Guards the cauſe, he told them ſo, as expecting every minute when Mandana's throat ſhould be cut, theſe two generous minded Ladies were grieved beyond all comforts. On the other ſide, the Princeſs of Bythinia, and the Princeſs Iſtrina, having not the liberty to ſee Mandana, and enquiring the ſtate of things, they were exceedingly ſad. Arpaſia for her part, ſhe found her ſelf in a miſerable condition, by being in the Court of a Queen who was capable of ſo great a piece of Injuſtice. And Aripithis himſelf, who was the cauſe of all this tumult, was extreamly vexed to ſee Thomiris as full of love as fury, and to ſee that the meaſure of the one was the meaſure of the other.

Though all theſe ſeveral Perſons did ſuffer very much, yet all was nothing in compariſon of what Thomiris ſuffered. For Love, Hatred, Revenge, Jealouſie, and all Paſſions, did ſhiver her heart with ſuch violence, as I aſſure you ſhe was in a moſt ſtrange condition. The truth is, after the firſt fury was over, ſhe ſaw there was no colour to ſuſpect Cyrus of killing Spargapiſes, yet ſhe was very cautious of not divulging this thought: for having a deſign to revenge her ſlighted love upon Mandana, ſhe would ſtill have this ſad pretence for her Revenge to blind the eyes of the People: So that though ſhe could not ſee the hands of Cyrus ſtained with the blood of her Son, yet ſhe would ſhed the blood of Mandana, purpoſely to take away the cauſe of that Princes love; yet ſometimes ſhe doubted of his innocency, and looking upon him as the Murtherer of Spargapiſes, ſhe would make himſelf a ſacrifice upon the Coffin of her Son.

But after theſe temultuous Motions had ruffled her mind, thinking ſometimes that perhaps Cyrus would put himſelf into her power, part of her Fury cooled, and ſhe began to conſider what ſhe ſhould do to juſtifie Cyrus before the people, and juſtifie her ſelf before Cyrus. So that being ſometimes ſurpriſed with thoughts of Revenge and hatred, and ſometimes with thoughts of love, ſhe was aſhamed at her own weakneſs, and abhorred her own cruelty; but theſe good Intervals came not often, but commonly Fury was the Miſtreſs of her Reaſon. Conſider Thomiris, (would ſhe ſay) and be careful to keep up the great pretence thou haſt to be revenged of thy proud enemy, who hath ſo cruelly affronted thee: and though thou art ſure, he did not kill thy Son, yet ſtill look upon him as the cauſe of his death; for though he were innocent, yet he is culpable of ſo many others, that he deſerves thy hatred. Truth is, he is a trouble to thy tranquility, he hath cauſed thee to loſe all the innocency of thy life, and he hath made thee do things againſt thy own Glory. Purſue him therefore to death, and be revenged upon a Princeſs who is the cauſe of his ſcorning thee. Conſider that the paſſion which he raiſed in thy heart, hath ſent thy Son to his Grave: and that the fire of thy love hath kindled ſuch a War as nothing perhaps will extinguiſh but the blood of all thy Subjects. Sacrifice therefore Mandana as the firſt Victim of thy Revenge, and ſtay till Cyrus be himſelf in a condition to be ſacrificed as a Victim unto thy reſentments. But what am I doing (ſaid ſhe, and reprehended her ſelf) and what do I ſpeak in my fury? I talk of ſacrificing a Prince, who whether I will or no, does reign in my heart, and who no ſooner would be in my power, but I ſhould be abſolutely in his? Can I ſee Cyrus a Priſoner and look upon him with eyes and heart of hatred? Yes, yes, I can, for ſince he comes into my Chains only out of his love to Mandana, doubtleſs I ſhall hate him more than ever I loved him: After this, Thomiris being reſolved to give way unto her fury, intended to move the hearts of the People by the Funerals of Spargapiſes; to the end ſo ſad an object might animate the Maſſagettans to revenge the death of their Prince, and indeed this ſad Ceremony moved many tears. Aripathes in particular was in deep mourning, and ſo was Ariantes: But after the Ceremony was ended, Ariantes followed Thomiris to her Tent, and having made ſure of many friends, particularly of Octomaſades and Agathiſes, he talked to her very boldly in favour of Mandana, moving her to ſend her back unto Cyrus: So as this Princeſs being exaſperated, ſhe anſwered him very ſharply: but Ariantes was reſolute and cared not; therefore he went on, and told her all that was fit to be ſpoken, both for her own Glory, and the preſervation of that Princeſs whom he loved. For I muſt profeſs unto you, Madam, ſaid he unto her, that ſince ſhe never had been in your power but for me, I will do all that I am able to get her from you, if you offer to attempt any thing againſt her. Since you are able to do but little (ſaid ſhe very ſharply to him) I ſhall not much value what you do: In the mean time, I charge you to ſee me no more till I ſend for you; I will obey you, Madam, replied Ariantes, but I pray take it not ill if I do ſtop you in all you ſhall attempt againſt Mandana. If Cyrus do put himſelf under my power (replied ſhe) you need not fear that Princeſs: If he do not, I ſhall follow my own advice, and not yours.

After this, Ariantes having left her, ſhe went into a Tent which was her Cloſet, and called for Aripithes, purpoſely to give him ſeveral orders for oppoſing Ariantes, if he ſhould attempt any thing: but it was too late; For this Prince had not only got almoſt all the Officers and Souldiers on his ſide, but he had alſo ſent unto thoſe Forces which were coming up, to make ſure of them alſo, if need were. Moreover, Aripithes, though glad to be imployed by Thomiris, yet he was very fearful leſt Cyrus ſhould become her Priſoner; imagining that if ever Thomiris ſaw him, all her fury would die. Alſo he being advertiſed that Ariantes had many friends, and that this reſolution of Thomiris to put Mandana to death, did incenſe all men of any honour; he plainly ſaw that he was Maſter only of that body which was under his command: And this act of Cruelty ſeemed ſo horridly ſtrange unto all the World, that he durſt not abſolutely truſt unto that neither.

In the mean time, the wiſe Gelonide, knowing that there was no thwarting the great fury of Thomiris at firſt, yet now thought it time to ſpeak, and endeavour to reduce her unto Reaſon: Therefore ſtriving to inſinuate her ſelf handſomely into the mind of the enraged Queen, ſhe did not vehemently contradict her, but on the contrary excuſed her violencies by ſome ſhallow reaſons; ſo that ſhe might afterwards, without incenſing her, produce more ſolid Arguments to perſwade her. And indeed, when ſhe was alone with Thomiris, ſhe complained againſt the lamentable condition into which Fortune had brought her, and pitied her that ſhe ſhould be brought unto ſuch a cruel neceſſity, as to be revenged upon ſo great a Prince as Cyrus was. For though Gelonide did wiſh with all her heart, that Thomiris did not love that Prince, yet as the caſe ſtood, ſhe thought no way better to reſtrain her hands from the blood of Mandana, than by the intereſt of her love. Therefore fetching a compaſs, the better to arrive at her end, truly, Madam, (ſaid ſhe unto her, after much other diſcourſe) you are much to be pitied in your ſeeking Revenge upon a Prince who is ſo much in fortunes favour, and ſo much eſteemed by all the World: For though they ſay, Revenge is ſweet, yet I am perſwaded that a Soul truly generous cannot ſeek revenge without abundance of Repugnancy, eſpecially when it muſt be ſteeped in blood: However, Madam, (added ſhe very cunningly) I hope your Soul hath changed its paſſion, and though it be troubled with the diſquiet conſequences of hatred, yet it is freed from the conſequences of Love: Alas, Gelonide, (replied ſhe) I am more miſerable than you imagine me, and this firſt Paſſion hath not driven the other out of my heart. But I beſeech you, Madam, (replied Gelonide) what likelyhood is there you ſhould love Cyrus ſtill? for if you did, you would never ſtrive to make him hate you by perſecuting Mandana, for I am moſt confident that Cyrus would hate you much leſs for perſecuting himſelf, than for perſecuting her whom he adores: and therefore, Madam, if you do not hate that Prince, think ſeriouſly upon what you do, and if you will be adviſed by me, in lieu of menacing the life of that Princeſs, you ſhall protect it, and force that Prince by your gegeneroſity, to confeſs you merit his eſteem, if not his affection. But I am moſt ſure, Madam, that if you ſhed the blood of this Princeſs, and do not hate Cyrus, you will make your ſelf the moſt miſerable woman in the World: and therefore conſider well upon it, if you do hate him, then I grant you may ſatisfie your revenge by the moſt cruel and fatal ways. But if you do not hate him, give a ſtop unto your fury, and conſider that if you do put Mandana to death, Cyrus will do the like to you. And though 'tis poſſible the love of Cyrus may die with this Princeſs, yet he will be ſure to be your Enemy if you did put her to death. Honour doth ſo engage him to make war upon you, that though he ſhould hereafter love you, yet he durſt not entertain any peace with you. Therefore, Madam, ſound your heart to the bottom, and take heed leſt thinking to entertain only hatred, you find it to be all love. I have heard ſay indeed, that theſe two paſſions, as oppoſite as they are, yet do ſometimes ſo diſguiſe themſelves in ſuch fallacious ſhews, as they cannot be known from each other; and when one hath thought he acted by dictates of hatred, it was indeed by dictates of love. Alas Gelonide (ſaid the Queen) I have to my ſhame found all this to be true: For I muſt with a bluſh confeſs that Cyrus is not out of my heart, and if I did not love him ſtill, I ſhould not ſeek revenge upon Mandana: However I do carry it, as if I would revenge the death of my Son, though to ſpeak truth, my heart doth not accuſe him for it: Yes, yes, Gelonide, ſince I muſt open my heart unto you, I do look upon him as ungrateful towards me, and not as if he were the Murtherer of Spargapiſes. Thus at the very ſame time, whilſt I tax him in publick with this horrid crime, I do juſtifie him in the Cloſet of my heart as much as I can. Since it is ſo, Madam, replied Gelonide, you muſt carry it otherwiſe, and not put your ſelf into ſuch a State, as it will be impoſſible for you to be happy, if Fortune ſhould wheel about: For, Madam, if you do not proceed to the very laſt extremity, who knows but you may hereafter have Cyrus in your power: he may chance be your Priſoner of War, and may perchance become fettered in your Chains by Love, if you uſe Mandana well; at leaſt this Prince will eſteem you more, and may happily in the end do Juſtice both unto your Merit and your Affection: Who knows alſo whether thoſe Forces which are coming up to joyn with yours, may not get you the advantage over Cyrus, as now he hath it over you? And whether Ciaxares may not be brought to demand Peace upon no other condition, but to exchange Cyrus for Mandana? And who knows whether this happy peace may not ſatisfie the paſſion of Ariantes and you both? There is ſo little probability in all you ſay (replied Thomiris and ſighed) that I cannot flatter my ſelf with any thoughts of it: However, Madam, replied Gelonide, though it be not probable, yet it is not impoſſible. But if you put Mandana to death, it is abſolutely impoſſible that Cyrus ſhould either love you, or make any Peace with you? Ah Gelonide, replied ſhe, you are a great ſtop unto my Revenge. Why will you hinder me from the enjoyment of the only pleaſure that I can ever hope for? yet I find your words make a deep impreſſion in my heart, and my fears to incur the hatred of Cyrus, reſtrain me from hating Mandana. I wiſh with all my heart, Madam, replied Gelonide, that I were able to eaſe your Majeſty of your ſufferings, but ſince I cannot, yet I would perſwade you, if you love Cyrus, not to provoke him to hate you, by ſacrificing Mandana unto your revenge. For by that means I ſhould preſerve your glory, and perhaps ſomething ſatisfie the paſſion which reigns in your ſoul. As for my Glory, replied Thomiris, I value it not, for ſince I do not eſteem my ſelf, I care not whether others do eſteem me, or no. As Thomiris was ſpeaking this, an old Officer of hers, who had ever been very faithful and affectionate to her ſervice, came to tell her how he was very certainly given to underſtand that Ariantes was Maſter of all her forces, and that he had ſent unto thoſe who were coming up, that he who guarded Mandana was wholly at his Command; and that the People in general began to fear the anger of the Gods, if ſhe ſhould put this innocent Princeſs to death; that they began to murmur, and perhaps they would rebel, if ſhe perſiſted in her deſign.

Since this advice came from a man whom ſhe knew moſt faithful, it made ſome impreſſion upon her ſpirits: and Gelonide's diſcourſe having prepared her Soul to receive it well, ſhe thanked him for it; and after ſhe had diſmiſſed him, ſhe began to conſider unto what a miſerable condition ſhe had now brought her ſelf, and to examine ſeriouſly what Gelonide had ſaid: Alſo conſidering that if ſhe ſhould put Mandana to death, it would then abſolutely be impoſſible Cyrus ſhould ever love her; her heart began to relent, and repent of what her Fury had hurried her unto: yet ſince ſhe did not think it impoſſible but Cyrus might ſubmit himſelf her Priſoner, to deliver his Princeſs, ſhe did not repent of the Meſſage which ſhe had ſent; yet ſhe reſolved that if he did not, then to ſeek out for ſome pretence to moderate her fury, though ſhe did not very well know how to recall things, ſince they had gone ſo far. She asked Gelonide how ſhe ſhould follow her advice, in caſe Cyrus ſhould not ſubmit himſelf her Priſoner? Alas, Madam, ſaid Gelonide, Violence, and Vices need pretences; but an act of Virtue and Goodneſs never needs any: And therefore if your Majeſty reſolve to change your mind, you ought to undeceive Ariantes immediately before things break out into a flame: For who knows whether that Prince having a pretence to accuſe you of cruelty againſt the perſon he loves, will not make uſe of thoſe whom he arms againſt you, to pull the Crown from off your head, as formerly he would have done? Diſarm your ſelf therefore, Madam, that you may diſarm him: and if you will follow my advice, tell him plainly, that you never had any intentions, to do as you ſeemed, but only to get Cyrus into your power, and ſo ſooner end the War, and better ſecure the poſſeſſion of Mandana unto him; you may alſo tell him, Madam, that the reaſon why your revenge is not executed upon Mandana, is only in conſideration of him. No, no, (ſaid Thomiris unto her) I cannot tell him ſo, for I have already told him the contrary: All I can ſay to him, is, that for the love of him I altered my mind. But Gelonide, when I have told the Prince my Brother ſo, what ſhould I ſay unto Cyrus, and all thoſe who know I have ſent unto him? you may ſay, replied Gelonide, that you never would have uſed ſuch ſharp menaces, but only to procure peace unto the people, but ſince you found not your expected effects, you never intended to ſtain your reputation, by any action of cruelty. Thus, doing nothing againſt the intereſt of your own paſſion, you will get much glory unto your ſelf. I know not whether I ſhall get any or no (replied Thomiris, and ſighed) but I am ſure that I deſerve none; and ſee, I am the moſt culpable, and moſt miſerable perſon upon the earth. In the mean time, ſince I have already ſaid, that I thought Cyrus had killed my Son; How can I now ſay, that I have changed my opinion? Since you only ſaid it in the heat of your paſſions and ſorrows (replied Gelonide) no ſollid heed will be grounded upon your words, and all the world is ſo perſwaded, that it could never be, that though ſuch a thing were, yet they will never accuſe you. After this, Thomiris falling into a deep ſtudy, and ſeriouſly conſidering the danger unto which ſhe was expoſed, eſpecially what Gelonide ſaid, concerning the hatred of Cyrus if ſhe put Mandana to death, ſhe reſolved to ſend for Ariantes immediately. At firſt, this Prince was amazed at this command, and ſome would have perſwaded him from obedience, out of their fears this Princeſs ſhould arreſt him: But Ariantes being confident in his friends, eſpecially in him who guarded Mandana, went unto Thomiris with much boldneſs. When he came to her, he askt her, whether ſhe ſent for him, to tell him that ſhe had changed her mind? and ſhe anſwered him ſo cunningly, that any but himſelf would have been deceived by her diſcourſe; and would have believed that ſhe had no other conſideration in reſtraining her revenge, but what ſhe ſaid ſh had. Yet Ariantes underſtood well enough, that i was her paſſion which was the principal cauſe o the alteration in her mind, but he made no ſhe of it unto her, and was willing to take upon himſelf all the obligation. Alſo ſhe added, that ſh never had any intentions to put Mandana to death but only to oblige Cyrus to ſubmit himſelf unde her power. However, though ſhe ſpoke with a bundance of ſeeming ſincerity, yet Ariantes kne very well, that ſhe bore an extream hatred unt Mandana: and that though Cyrus ſhould readily ſub mit himſelf, yet ſhe might ſacrifice the Prince whom he adored, if ſhe were not hindred b force. So then fearing leſt Cyrus in a Raptur of his paſſion ſhould do as Thomiris deſired, he re ſolved to prevent him. However, a reconciliatio was made between Thomiris and Ariantes, and be fore they parted, they reſolved upon what ſhoul be ſaid unto the people, what Cyrus had anſwer ed, and upon what their expected forces ſhoul do, when they were come up.

After which Ariantes leaving the Princeſs, h went immediately unto his Tent to diſpatch awa a Meſſenger unto Cyrus, but as he was inſtruct ing him, what he ſhould ſay unto his Rival, h was told Ortalgues deſired to ſpeak with him: In deed, this truſty Servant, by the advice of Gel nide, came to tell the Prince, how he had ſtaye in the Tents Royal, and deſired him for a pa to return unto his Maſter, beſeeching him f his own glories ſake, to do him ſo much hono as to give him ſome aſſurance of the Prince Mandana's life: For truly, Sir, (ſaid he) knowi already what you have done for her, I have ſom reaſon to hope, that though you did it not f the intereſt of that great Prince unto whom I be long, yet you will give me leave to carry th joyful news unto him, of your being her Pro tector and Deliverer.

Ariant

Ariantes being much taken with the boldneſs of Ortalgues, he received him very well, and very obligingly told him, that he ſaw Cyrus was every way happy, even in his Domeſtiques: Afterwards told him, that though Cyrus was both his Enemy and Rival, yet he would neither be ungrateful nor wicked, but would ever acknowledge the Obligations upon him, ſince the time he was Anaxaris, by the aſſurance he would give him of Mandana's ſafety, as long as ſhe was under the Queen his ſiſters power; and the better to perſwade him unto a belief of it, he told him as much as in any handſomeneſs he could, what he had done for the preſervation of that Princeſs, he alſo told him that he might go unto his Maſter; but to avoid ſuſpition, the man, whom he intended to ſend with him ſhould go by himſelf.

In the mean time, Ortalgues after he underſtood that the meſſenger of Thomiris was returned, and underſtood from Gelonide, the good ſtate of every thing, he departed without rendring the Letters which he took upon him to deliver: But he went in the Maſſagettan habit, and with an order from Ariantes, leſt he ſhould be ſtayed by his forces. So as this faithful ſervant arriving juſt as the meſſenger from Ariantes was telling Cyrus that he would come, he overjoyed that Prince when he told him all that Gelonide and Ariantes ſaid unto him; and when he ſaw Mandana's life was in no danger: So that deſiring to ſhare his joys amongſt his deareſt friends, eſpecially unto Mazares, though his Rival, he ſent for him, alſo for Anacharſis, Artamas, Myrſiles, Intaphernes, and Atergates: Yet the three laſt were very angry their Letters were not delivered, but for all that were very glad to hear that their Miſtreſſes were well. In the mean time, Cyrus altered the anſwer which he would give unto Thomiris, yet he did not alter it without ſerious examination, whether he ſhould build upon Ariantes and Gelonide or no: But when he conſidered that Ariantes was in love with Mandana, he concluded upon an abſolute neceſſity of believing him, becauſe he was concerned in the life of this Princeſs, ſo that being confirmed in this reſolution, he told Ariantes his meſſenger, as he diſmiſſed him, and rewarded him with a rich preſent, that the proceedings of his Maſter were ſo generous, that he would for ever eſteem him; and did not deſpair, but hereafter he ſhould be beholding to him, for ſetting the Princeſs Mandana at liberty, but in the mean time he conjured him for his own Glories ſake, to continue her Protector; and to acquaint him with any thing which may ſecure the life of that Princeſs: For truly (ſaid he unto the meſſenger of his Rival) I do ſo highly eſteem Ariantes for what he hath done, as if he ſhould ſend me word, that Mandana were in danger, unleſs I came and aſſumed the Fetters of Thomiris, I think I ſhould take his word.

On the other ſide, this great Prince charged Chryſantes to tell the Maſſagettan Queen, that he had more confidence in her virtue, than to fear Mandana's life, and that he was confident of her ſafety under her power, nor ſhould he doubt his own, were he under her power alſo; which if ſhe deſire, ſhe muſt firſt remit Mandana into the King of Medea's hands, adding, that what ſhe before ſent to him, he believed was ſpoken in the height of her ſorrows: and could never think that ſhe had any bad intentions againſt the life of that Princeſs, and therefore he had no more to ſay, but to crave pardon for not believing her meſſenger; and to make amends for that fault, he would engage himſelf by oath, to treat all his Priſoners as well as if they were in their own army.

Chryſantes having received theſe inſtructions went unto Thomiris, but though Cyrus anſwered Ariantes by his meſſenger, yet he would have Feraulas accompany Chriſantes, to deliver his mind unto his Rival, and ſo theſe two faithful ſervants unto a moſt illuſtrious Maſter, went to acquit themſelves of their charges. The anſwer of Cyrus unto Thomiris being all ſweetneſs, and civility, and ſhe not knowing how that Prince had been informed of the true ſtate of her ſoul, either from Ariantes or Gelonide, ſhe was exceedingly joyed, eſpecially becauſe the paſſion of her ſoul made her believe, that Cyrus was not ſo much in love with Mandana, as ſhe imagined, ſince to redeem her, he would not hazard himſelf: So as this imagination flattering her mind, ſhe received Chryſantes very favourably, and told him, that ſhe began to think that Cyrus was not culpable of her Son's death: Adding that ſhe would endeavour to clear him, and if ſhe found him innocent, he needed not to fear Mandana's life.

In the mean time, ſhe hoped ere long to have him in her power, and within this few days to have as great an advantage over him, as he had got over her. But ſhe having a deſire to gain a little time until her Forces were come up, ſhe propounded unto Chriſantes a ceſſation; to treat (as ſhe ſaid) concerning the liberty of ſome Priſoners, hinting of many things in her diſcourſe which induced him to think, that perhaps ſhe deſired this time to conſider and overcome her ſelf, and to reſtore Mandana to liberty, ſo that he parted with promiſe to acquaint his Maſter with all ſhe ſaid. Feraulas for his part went unto Ariantes, who gave a very civil anſwer unto the meſſage of Cyrus, but as cunning as Feraulas was, it was impoſſible for him to get a ſight either of Mandana, Doraliſa, or Marteſia, yet he ſaw Gelonide, and ſhe was as favourable to him as poſſible.

But ſince the Captain of Mandana's guard was more the creature of Ariantes than unto Thomiris, the Princeſs was moſt ſtrictly guarded: Yet he underſtood that they were ſerved with much reſpect, and that ſhe had no other trouble but her ſolitude, and the viſits of Ariantes, which were very tedious to her, though he behaved himſelf with as much ſubmiſſion as if he were her ſlave: But though Feraulas had not leave to ſee Mandana, yet he ſaw the Princeſs of Bythinia, the Princeſs Iſtrina, and the fair Arpaſia, unto whom he preſented commendations from Gadates, Intaphernes, Atergates, Gabrias and Hydagres, in whom they had ſeveral concernments. Yet they had not liberty to write; but they charged Feraulas with ſo many things by word of mouth, that he ſtood in need of a good memory to retain them all. The Princeſs of Bythinia enquired very much concerning the Princeſs Araminta, being much joyed that Spitridates would be at the Camp of Cyrus very ſhortly. But the time of departure being come, Chriſantes preſſed Feraulas to make haſte, and ſo he left them, after he had obſerved that there was a great intimacy between Serpacia, and thoſe two Princeſſes.

In the mean time, Cyrus followed his firſt reſolution, and marched to the entrance into the wood, as ſoon as Chriſantes was gone; and quartered himſelf ſo near the Enemies Guard, that they had continual skirmiſhes, ſo as it was in that Place where Chriſantes and Feraulas gave an accompt of their voyage. The Propoſition which Thomiris made, did much perplex Cyrus, for he believed it was only to gain time; but Chriſantes thinking he had diſcovered the thoughts of Thomiris, aſſured him, that there was ſomething in her mind which would be advantagious to him, if he gave her leaſure to ſurmount her paſſion. Yet Cyrus for all this, could not reſolve upon this truce, but had continued forcing the paſſages which the Sauromates guarded, if a certain Engineer had not come into his Army, who was famous for many admirable ſecrets. Indeed ſince this paſſage was very long, and difficult to be forced, Cyrus had a hard task to attempt it, and ſince it was likely to weaken his army very much, he gave ear unto this Engineer, who propoſed a way to paſs theſe ſtraits, with leſs loſs, provided he made a truce for ſome few days; during which time he could prepare all things neceſſary for his deſign. But Cyrus, being unwilling to hazard any thing upon the prudence of others, he would have this Artiſt firſt ſhew him the way which he intended to work, this Engineer thus told him, That having obſerved two great paſſages in the woods, which were not above fifteen furlongs from each other; and that they were the only places by which there was any paſſage, he further perceived that the enemies guarded the one of theſe much more carefully than the other, and where they had many more men, becauſe they were perſwaded that they ſhould be aſſaulted. Moreover he ſaid, that whilſt the truce was, when Souldiers have liberty to go and come into the Camps, then ſome of Cyrus his Souldiers, commanded for that purpoſe, ſhould ſeem to walk in the wood between theſe paſſages, and throw againſt all the trees, a certain compoſition prepared with ſuch art, as it ſhould ſtick unto any thing it touches, and which hath ſuch a diſpoſition to burn, that the leaſt ſpark given to the firſt tree, will ſet the whole forreſt on fire, provided that there be trees from diſtance to diſtance prepared with this compoſition to receive the fire and communicate it ſelf. So, Sir, (ſaid this Engineer to Cyrus) when trees at their ſeveral diſtances are prepared with this compoſition, which will never be diſcovered, becauſe it's of the colour of the bark and moſs, you may make choice of a night when the wind is up, as always it uſeth after Sun ſet till Sun riſe, to ſet fire to the firſt tree, and to advance towards that paſs which is weakeſt guarded, and in the heighth of their fears, begin your aſſault: Thoſe of the one paſs dare not paſs through, the flames, to relieve the other. Your men, Sir, will not be affrighted, becauſe they know the plot; but ſaid Cyrus, will not this be as dangerous for) us as for our enemies? No, Sir, (replied the man For the wind commonly blowing one way at that time of the year, thoſe trees muſt be prepared only which ſtand one way, and not that ſide of the way which you are to take, ſo as your troops taking the right ſide, may paſs without danger, and will not at all be affrighted as your enemies, but take freſh courage, becauſe the flames do fight for them. Cyrus after this, put ſeveral queſtions to the man and would needs ſee the experiment of this ſtrange compoſition, whoſe chief material was the mud of a lake which is in Comagines, near a Town called Samoſet, and which is ſo glutinous, that it will ſtick unto any thing it toucheth; and hath ſuch a natural diſpoſition to burn and conſume that unto which it ſticks, that the leaſt ſpark will make a great blaze, this fire is the moſt dangerous, becauſe water will not eaſily quench it, nor any thing elſe, but much earth thrown upon it. Thus this Engineer aſſured Cyrus, that it had done prodigies, and ſaid that Medea made uſe of it to put Creuſeus to death. This great Prince adviſed him not to publiſh ſo great a ſecret, leſt it ſhould put the honeſty of many a man to the Teſt.

However, afterwards Cyrus hearkned unto this propoſition, at the ſame time, when Chryſantes told him that Thomiris deſired a truce, being the more willing to hearken unto it, ſince in lieu of retarding his deſigns, it would forward them, yet his great heart had ſome repugnancy againſt all manner of tricks in war: But Mazares did ſo preſs him to make uſe of this invention to ſhorten the war, that fearing leſt Mandana ſhould accuſe him for being over ſcrupulous in point of honour, when perhaps her life depended upon it, he reſolved upon it: So as calling a Council of war about it, it was concluded that he ſhould not deny this truce, and thereupon Cyrus ſent Chryſantes to Thomiris, and the peace was concluded for eight days, and publiſhed in both Camps.

Thomiris made many propoſitions concerning the Officers of her army that were taken Priſoners, at the laſt battel which ſhe loſt: Alſo to delude the people, and make them believe that her paſſion was not the cauſe of the War, ſhe made ſome propoſitions of peace, which truly were not altogether unreaſonable, except in that ſhe demanded Mandana to ſtay three years in her Court as hoſtage. In the mean time, Cyrus deſired Anacharſis, to go unto Thomiris and tell her, that he could not give any direct anſwer, unleſs ſhe would permit him to ſee Mandana, and know from her own mouth whether ſhe would conſent unto the propoſitions: But do what Anacharſis could, ſhe would not permit that; So as all the eight days were ſpent in frivolous negotiations: Yet there was an uncertain kind of a hope that there would be a change in the heart of Thomiris, and the rather, becauſe that Queen, prompted by her paſſion, deſired to treat with Cyrus himſelf, in a fancy that her preſence might perhaps move the heart of the Prince; who not daring to refuſe this interview, though it went againſt his mind, deſired that he might ſpeak with Ariantes, though they would not let him ſpeak with Mandana; doubtleſs Cyrus had no mind to ſee Thomiris, nor did Ariantes deſire the ſight of Cyrus; but their intereſts were ſo odly mixt, that neither of them durſt deny the motion. Thus they prepared themſelves for theſe ſeveral interviews; which was reſolved to be in the midſt of the wood between both armies. Atergates and Intaphernes demanded to ſee the Princeſs of Bythinia, and the Princeſs Iſtrina: Hidaſpes and Gabrias demanded to ſee the fair Arpaſia: But though their demands were no leſs juſt than the other, yet Thomiris refuſed them, but it was at the inſtance of Lycander: So that the fair Arpaſia had the ſorrows, not to ſee either her Father or her Lover, ſo that ſhe grieved moſt extreamly at it.

The Princeſs of Bythinia and the Princeſs Iſtrina, who did infinitely eſteem her, did indeavour to comfort her, and offered her to tell thoſe two Princes, whom they were to ſee within a day or two, whatſoever ſhe would pleaſe to have them know: And certainly theſe two Princes had good reaſon to intereſt themſelves in behalf of Arpaſia; who queſtionleſs was no ordinary perſon. She was big and tall, though her Grandure was no more than ſo much as to pleaſe. Her hair was a lovely dark brown as ever was ſeen, and was ſo apt to curl, that the leaſt whiffle of wind did turn it into handſomer rings than any art could do. The model of Arpaſia's face was oval, ſhe had gray, full, and paſſionate eyes, and the corners of her mouth had ſuch a particular kind of ſmile, that it was enough to ſee the lower part of her face, and to know her; her lips were ſo even and perfect carnation, that her beauty was herein incomparable; her cheeks were ſo pleaſingly round, and had ſuch an amiable freſh plumpneſs, that though the complexion of Arpaſia was not of the cleareſt luſter, yet was ſhe a great beauty, becauſe there was an exact uniformity in every part; 'tis true, her noſe had not ſo much regularity as the reſt of her face, yet it was not ſo, as did blaſt the reſt of her features, and if it were any defect, it ſerved as a foyl to ſet the reſt of her excellings better off, who beſides all theſe, having moſt pure white teeth, and fair neck and arms, was doubtleſs one of the moſt charming Ladies of the World; her Garb was ſo high, her air ſo noble, and her walking agreeable, that none could look on her, without a diſpoſition to love her, ſhe danced with as good a grace as ſhe walked, and had ſuch a mixture of mirth and gravity together, as did infinitely pleaſe: her humour was as charming as her beauty, for ſhe was always ſweet, civil, and affable; ſhe had a good inclination to Rallary, or at leaſt to love thoſe who did it well, but ſhe gave a check unto her inclination, and commonly ſeemed more grave than merry: Yet notwithſtanding ſhe loved pleaſures, eſpecially company, and company a little gallant, ſhe could not ſpend a whole afternoon with one friend in private without being weary, for ſhe had a kind of active ſpirit which was an enemy to all lumpiſhneſs, and which made all ſhe did delightful. Moreover, ſhe was naturally magnificent, liberal, and good, and had a ſoul ſo tender, as would make one almoſt aſſured not to be hated, though one ſhould tell her that they were in love with her, yet ſhe was not capable of any violent paſſion, and the pleaſure of being loved made her ſometimes ſuffer her ſelf to be ſo, rather than out of any real inclination.

She was not at all fantaſtical, and that deſire to pleaſe which was in her heart, proceeded from a more high and noble cauſe. Furthermore, ſhe had a wit ſo ſhap, and ſhe could ſo cunningly pump the minds of thoſe, whoſe deſignes ſhe deſired to know, as it may be ſaid ſhe had a key to open their hearts, and look into their ſecrets; and all this without any ſeeming of ſubtilty: Indeed her temper was ſo oppoſite unto any guile, that ſhe never had any friend whom ſhe once deceived: But was apt to have a kind of generous confidence, which had rather be expoſed to be deceived by others, than to be ſo ſubtle as to prevent being deceived. Thus Arpaſia with her Beauty, Wit, and goodneſs, did ſo pleaſe the Princeſs of Bythinia, and the Princeſs Iſtrina, that they were deſirous to know her adventures, eſpecially ſince ſhe would employ them in ſome buſineſs unto thoſe Princes whom they were to ſee: For truly (ſaid Iſtrina to her, after much other diſcourſe) It is not poſſible we ſhould be able to do you any right ſervice, unleſs we do know the ſtate of your misfortunes. They are of ſuch a nature (replied ſhe) that I can expect no advantage from you by telling of them, but only your pity.

Though you cannot, Madam, replied the Princeſs of Bythinia, yet I beſeech you tell them unto us, for truly as for my part, I do find great eaſe unto my miſeries, by being pitied. Doubtleſs it's true, Madam, (replied Arpaſia) But I am ſo unable to relate all the accidents of my life my ſelf, that if you would know them, it muſt be from her who has a ſhare in my misfortunes, for beſides her knowing of them as well as my ſelf, I cannot relate ſuch things with any order, which have ſo much diſordered my mind. I know 'tis ſaid that the remembrance of miſeries is ſweet: But I muſt be happy firſt, before I can take any delight in remembring my paſt misfortunes: And therefore ſince I am not in that condition, I beſeech you diſpenſe with me. We ſhall willingly diſpenſe with you, Madam, (replied the Princeſs of Bythinia) provided the amiable Niſide who is with you, will undertake it in your room. I am contented, anſwered Arpaſia; then I beſeech you (ſaid Iſtrina) let it be this day; for ſince we do not directly know when we ſhall go and ſee thoſe Princes, unto whom you will imploy us: It is requiſite we ſhould be knowing in the ſtate of your fortune as ſoon as you can. To teſtifie how willing I am to diſcover my misfortunes unto you (anſwered ſhe) I will go unto Niſide, and give her orders to acquaint you with all my weakneſſes: She is a woman whom hard fortune cannot deject, by dejecting her houſe and family; and who has ſuch a ſhare in all that relates unto me that ſhe knows all my thoughts: And therefore you may give credit unto all that ſhe will ſay, excepting in any commendations which perhaps ſhe will give me: For happily her friendſhip to me may byaſs her. When we have heard her, replied the Princeſs of Bythinia, we ſhall give you all juſtice, and ſhall believe as we ought to do. After this Arpaſia retired, and Niſide ſtayed with the Princeſſes, aſking them pardon before hand, for her want of any art to relate what they required; Then after many civilities, they preſſed her to begin the relation, which ſhe did in theſe terms, addreſſing her ſpeech unto the Princeſs of Bythinia.

The Hiſtory of Arpaſia.

Though I am perſwaded you have ſo good an opinion of Arpaſia's judgement, as to think, that ſhe would never have commanded me to relate her adventures, if ſhe had not known that I was able to make a perfect relation of things paſt; yet I muſt tell you, Madam, that none upon earth knows them better than I do, and I dare almoſt ſay, that I know them better than her ſelf: For the truth is, that the heavy burthen of her ſorrows, hath hindred her from obſervance of many which I have ſeen with leſs trouble, though I was ever a ſharer in all her miſeries: For fortune having ruin'd the family from which I deſcended, which heretofore kept my ſelf in a good rank, and having loſt thoſe who gave me life, when I was very young, I was put unto Arpaſia, as having the honour to be allied unto her, by my Mother. And having continued with this excellent Lady ever ſince my infancy, I have not only ſeen her adventures with my own eyes, but further, I have known her moſt ſecret thoughts. I ſhall not trouble you, Madam, with a relation of Arpaſia's birth: For you are not ignorant that Gabrias her Father hath a little Dominion, which depends only upon the gods and himſelf: And that Gadates and he were two Grandees, who heretofore pretended to marry Nitocris.

Nor ſhall I aggravate the miſeries of the fair Arpaſia, which began by the death of her elder Brother, who dyed after ſo ſad a manner at Babylon, by the violence of the late King of Aſſyria, that it is not poſſible that you ſhould know it, and Arpaſia was then ſo young, that ſhe was not capable of any long ſorrows for it. But, Madam, it is requiſite you know, that Gabrias, even ſince the loſs of his Son, did wholly decline the intereſts of the Aſſyrian Prince. Yet he did conceal his Reſentments, out of his Reſpects unto the Queen Nitocris, who then lived: But as ſoon as ſhe was dead, and that Prince had brought the Princeſs Mandana to Babylon, his deſire of revenge began to break out, and his whole imaginations were how to ruine the Aſſyrian King.

And to that end, he did not only enter into league with all his neighbour Princes againſt him, but alſo united himſelf with all the Malecontents of that Court. But, Madam, before I go any further, I muſt tell you, that Gabrias having loſt his Wife as well as his Son, did ſet his whole affection upon the amiable Arpaſia, and ſhe was then upon her 15. year, and he loved her the more, becauſe he looked upon her as a perſon who would contribute unto that revenge which he would take upon the King of Aſſyria, as afterwards I ſhall tell you in the ſequel of my diſcourſe. In the mean time, be pleaſed to know, that there was a Governour of a Province which belonged to that King, who knowing that he loved him not, and that he would certainly take his government from him, he ſought an occaſion to revolt; ſo that not being ignorant, that Gabrias had cauſe of complaint, he ſent a Nephew of his to him purpoſely to ſound him, and he ſent him preſently after the death of Nitocris. But, Madam, ſince he of whom I ſpeak, whoſe name was Aſtidamus, was the chief cauſe of all Arpaſia's miſeries, it is requiſite I make a deſcription of him unto you, as he was when he came to the Town where Gabrias did moſt commonly reſide, and where Arpaſia did infinitely delight, and to tell you truly, it was not without cauſe. For it was exceedingly pleaſant both in its ſcituation and the country about it, and alſo in reſpect of a ſtately Caſtle which was its principal ſtrength. Moreover, though this little Court had no great tumults, and thronging, yet was it very agreeable and delightful, and hugely pleaſed Aſtidamus as ſoon as he ſaw it: But to deſcribe him as I intended, I muſt ſay he was of a mean ſtature, but handſom and well made, his hair and eyes black, and without either extraordinary handſomneſs or uglineſs. It may be ſaid, he was paſſible enough, eſpecially becauſe he knew the mode of the world, and a free merry way which much pleaſed. Moreover, he was rich and handſom in his cloathes, and he knew ſo well how to ſuit and fit himſelf, that he was never ſeen in ill-ſorted colours. Moreover, his company was good and pleaſing, and he had ſuch a kind of way with him, that he did not need to ſtrive for excellent things to pleaſe; for his manner of way and air, in ſpeaking the moſt common things, did make them paſs for excellent. Yet he was a man better at general converſation than private diſcourſe, for having a kind of a merry unquietneſs of ſpirit, which made him perpetually paſs from object, to object; he could not endure to talk long upon one thing, or to one perſon: So as the greater the company, pany, the merrier was he. He danced with a good grace, and for a man of his quality, ſung paſſing well; Now, Madam, after all the good qualities of Aſtidamus, give me leave to tell his bad ones, and acquaint you that his manners were not very innocent. In point of valour, he could not be queſtioned, but he had a moſt voluptuous Soul; and took his pleaſure in ſuch an odd way, as one could not know him and love him. As for his matter of love, it was ſomething particular, for ſometimes he would ſeem inconſtant, and ſometimes deeply in love, yet to define him rightly, he more deſired to be loved, than he loved thoſe who loved him, though upon ſome occaſions, he hath ſeemed really to love.

Truth is, ſome things he did are attributed to that paſſion, which ought not to be ſo. For if he had a mind to do a thing, he would go through with it at any rate, not for any love to the thing it ſelf, but becauſe he had undertaken it, yet he appeared very civil, affable, and ready to court the firſt Lady that he met, in the way of gallantry. Aſtidamus being ſuch a one as I have deſcribed, did come, as I told you from his Uncle to ſound the depth of Gabrias and his thoughts, and to move him unto ſome attempts againſt the now King of Aſſyria, ſo as he was received with much joy and magnificence. He commanded Arpaſia, to ſhew him all the Ladies of her acquaintance, yet there was no great aſſemblies, by reaſon of the Queens death: But they often walked, and ſometimes hunted, and only common pleaſures were the diverſions. At the firſt, all the Ladies liked Aſtidamus, except Arpaſia, for whether ſhe ſooner found out his ill qualities than the reſt, or whether it was out of a natural averſion to him, ſhe was fain to force her ſelf unto a commendation of him, yet this did not then appear, for knowing the mind of her Father, ſhe ſhewed all imaginable civility to Aſtidamus. As for him he ſeemed to be ſo taken with the beauty of this excellent Lady, with her wit and merit, that none made any queſtion on but that he was in love with her: And Arpaſia her ſelf thought ſo as well as the reſt, and though ſhe entertained not one thought which was advantageous to him, ſhe ſaw this growing paſſion without giving any check.

For firſt, ſhe could not foreſee that his love could prejudice her, ſince ſhe was to be gone within a few days.

And ſecondly, her age might well excuſe her, for ſhe was not ſorry for making any new conqueſt.

Thus Arpaſia not repulſing Aſtidamus, nor ſeeming to take notice of his paſſion, did go very civilly towards him, and he being apt to flatter himſelf with hope, he was a Lover without any miſery, though he had no reaſon to hope for any happineſs.

However, all the world talked of Aſtidamus's love unto Arpaſia: And I think others ſpoke of it more than he himſelf did, and they talked ſo much of it, that he made uſe of theſe reports, to diſcover his affection unto Arpaſia; and indeed he did it very gallantly, and in a particular manner, though ſhe was a little ſharp with him. He chanced to be there one day when all the company did ſeparate themſelves into couples, and it was Aſtidamus his good fortune to talk with Arpaſia, and cloſing with this opportunity, he fell into talk with her, and commended her, knowing very well that commendation is the beſt preparative, to make a Miſtreſs receive a declaration of love favourably. But ſince Arpaſia would needs out of modeſty change the diſcourſe, leſt ſhe ſhould go further than ſhe deſired: and after ſhe had handſomly defended her ſelf againſt his flatteries, ſhe obſerved, how chance had brought ſo many thither, as made even couples, two and two. But that which I moſt admire at (added ſhe) is, that every one of theſe couples hath ſome privacies together, and that fortune ſhould ſo well place them, as that they may talk in ſecret together. I wiſh with all my heart, Madam, (ſaid Aſtidamus, who heard two Ladies next him talk of his paſſion to Arpaſia) that after your admiration at what Fortune hath done, you knew what every one in the company ſays, and that you would command them to tell you preſently: I aſſure you, Sir, replied ſhe, that if they have any humours to ſatisfie my curioſity they would do me a great pleaſure in it. And me more than you, Madam, (replied he) not that I think you to be of a more inquiſitive nature than I am; but I can eaſily gueſs by their faces what they talk of, and think that it is upon ſomthing which you deſire to know. I profeſs Aſtidamus, replied ſhe, you are very excellent at the ſcience of conjectures, and ſince you can tell what people do ſay when they ſpeak low, I pray tell me. To ſhew you that I am not much miſtaken, replied he, I will tell you what thoſe two Ladies next me did ſay, and afterwards you ſhall ask them whether I was far off the mark or not; I will (anſwered ſhe) But it ſhall be upon condition, that if you fail in your gueſſes, you ſhall never meddle with divination again. I will willingly engage my ſelf (replied he) becauſe I am ſure, that now I am not miſtaken. Then tell me, replied ſhe, what thoſe two Ladies ſaid, they ſaid, Madam, (anſwered he, and looked ſtedfaſtly upon her) that I am deſperately in love with you, and therefore you need not think it ſtrange that I ſhould gueſs what they ſay, as well as they gueſs what I have moſt truly thought. Fie Aſtidamus (replied Arpaſia and bluſht) you are a very bad diviner, and ſo are thoſe Ladies alſo, if they do think as you ſay: I beſeech you, Madam, replied he, let me deſire them to confeſs what they ſaid, and what they thought: As for the laſt of theſe, replied ſhe, it will be a hard matter for you to make them confeſs it, and as for the other, it is to no purpoſe. Provided, Madam, ſaid he, you will believe me upon my word, I ſhall not need the teſtimonies of thoſe Ladies; but if you will not, I muſt entreat all thoſe who talk of my love to talk of it unto you, as they do unto others. And I beſeech you, Madam, be no more offended at me, and at what I ſhall ſay, than you will be at them when they ſay any thing unto you. Your language (replied ſhe) will paſs for ſuch a pleaſant piece of raillary, that I ſhall not take it ſeriouſly. Provided, Madam, anſwered he, that you will think my Raillary ro be really true, you may let it paſs for what you pleaſe. If I ſhould think ſo (replied Arpaſia) it would be ſo little advantagious to you as you had better not deſire it: However, I do profeſs that I do not love ſuch Raillary. And if I thought you had any intention to uſe it any more, I would never talk in private with you as long as I lived. This is extream unjuſt, Madam, (ſaid he unto her) that you ſhould ſuffer all the world to tell you that I do love you, and not to allow me, who knows the truth of it better than they. I aſſure you, replied ſhe, none ever old me that you were in love with me; or if they had, it would have been no great pleaſure to me. Then I am very unhappy, replied he, for ever ſince there were any Ladies, I am confident none would be ever offended when they were told that they had made a new conqueſt, though they will ſeem angry when they are told of it; and it is a moſt horrible Injuſtce in all women. Since I am not of your opinion I ſhall (replied ſhe aloud purpoſely to make the company general) deſire all the company to judge whether it be juſt in you to condemn all Ladies as you do; Every one hearing what Arpaſia ſaid, broke off their private conferences, and began to hearken unto her, and ask what the Injuſtice of Aſtidamus was? he confidently affirms (ſaid ſhe) that all women are well pleaſed when they are told of any new conqueſt they have made. You, Madam were ever ſo Juſt (replied one of thoſe Ladies to whom ſhe ſpoke, whoſe name was Stenobira) that I am ſure to be on the right ſide, if I be on yours; you are ſo able your ſelf, Madam, to maintain an ill cauſe (added another of the Ladies) as you are able to vanquiſh Aſtidamus without any aſſiſtance of mine. For my part (ſaid a man of quality, called Tirimenes) I do conceive the complaint which Aſtidamus makes of Ladies is ſo reaſonable, that I have a thouſand times murmured againſt their injuſtice: truth is, ſaid Aſtidamus, to ſpeak in general, all women are unjuſt in making men to love them, and not let them ſpeak of it to them: But if any Lady have any reaſon to take it ill from a man who is in love with her, to tell her of it; ſhe hath much more reaſon to take it ill from men who are not in love with her, to talk of her conqueſts; yet cuſtom hath made this injuſtice almoſt a law, and one may tell a woman ſhe even makes all men miſerable; that her eyes kindle fire in the hearts of men; that ſome are ready to die for her, and ſuch like; In the mean time, if a man do but open his mouth and tell her that he loves her, ſhe is ready to baniſh him; to treat him ill; to impoſe eternal ſilence, and to threaten everlaſting hatred. This rule is not ſo general as you imagine (replied Stenobira and ſmiled) for I do know ſome women, who will be more angry with a friend for chiding them, for making any in love with them, than they will be with their Lovers for telling them they are in love: 'tis true, it happens ſo ſometimes; (ſaid Tirimenes) but you never heard of it, but when a Lady hath contracted amity with him who is ſo plain with her, ſo that her anger is not cauſed by any exceſs of ſeverity: Tirimenes is in the right (ſaid Aſtidamus) but I cannot endure that they who ſuffer themſelves to be told a 1000 times in the year that this man is in Love with them, and that man is in love with them; yet will not ſuffer him who adores them, to tell them ſo much as once how many miſeries he endures for their ſakes. If there be any reformation to be made in the cuſtom (replied Arpaſia ſharply) doubtleſs it is to be only in this, that women ſhould never hearken unto their Lovers, nor let their friends chide them for making any in love with them.

Not but that women might hear men without any anger, if they would leave off all flatteries: but when they will be talking of ſuch things as they themſelves do know, ought not to be hearkened unto, their anger in that caſe hath a moſt juſt ground. Madam, replied plied Aſtidamus, you defend a bad cauſe, with ſo much wit, that as long as you are ſpeaking, I am ready to ſubmit unto your arguments, but as ſoon as you are ſilent, I return unto my firſt opinion, and declare, that if it be a crime to make men in love with you, then you have no reaſon to take it well that your friends do tell you of it: but if it be not, then you may very well permit him whom you have captivated, to tell you of it as well as others: For there is no Juſtice that thoſe who endure no torments nor inquietudes from the paſſion they ſpeak of, ſhould have liberty to ſpeak of it unto you: Whilſt thoſe who ſuffer moſt miſerable tortures, are not permitted to complain and tell where their pain doth lie. For my particular (replied Arpaſia and bluſhed) I have no concernment in this diſpute: For I am none of thoſe who uſe to hearken unto their Lovers with delight, or who are angry with their friends, nor do I remember that ever any told me, any was in love with me. Fie, Madam, (replied Stenobira, who knew nothing of the paſſages between Aſtidamus and Arpaſia) you are not now ſincere: For I have told you that I do know ſome men, whom your beauty hath tormented. Then is my memory very bad (replied ſhe faintly) But if that be true, and that I may make ſome profit of what Aſtidamus hath ſaid, I muſt be angry with you: and truly Stenobira, I could eaſily be ſo, if I could believe you. After this, Arpaſia making a motion to walk, the converſation changed, and during the walk, theſe two Ladies being next Aſtidamus, he over-heard what they ſaid, and how Stenobira told Arpaſia that Aſtidamus was in love with her: However, Arpaſia having a natural averſion to him, ſhe was as much vexed to think that Aſtidamus ſhould love her, as ſhe would have been to hear that one whom ſhe loved had hated her. But to exaſperate her averſion, it was diſcovered that at the very ſame time he ſeemed to be in love with her, he alſo was very frequent with another Lady of quality who was very fair, but of ſo bad a carriage, that ſuch as were any thing cautious of their reputation, never frequented her. So that Arpaſia extreamly diſliking all ſuch as could carry themſelves equally compliant unto all women, ſo they were fair: She conceived ſuch a kind of averſion towards Aſtidamus as did very neerly reſemble hatred, ſo that if ſhe had not been full of reſpects to her Father, ſhe could not have concealed it. But Aſtidamus being moſt agreeable unto all ſuch as did not perfectly know him, moſt of the Ladies did much eſteem him. At laſt, Aſtidamus after he had been a month with Gabrias, he returned to his Uncle, who looked upon him as his Son, ſince he had no children, and he returned without any reaſon of much commending, or much complaining againſt Arpaſia: For ſhe carried her ſelf with ſo much prudence out of fear to anger her Father, that her averſion to Aſtidamus did not appear ſo much as unto me, whom ſhe was pleaſed to honour as her Confident. Some days after his return to Alfenes, there came a Meſſenger from Protogenes, the Uncle of Aſtidamus: and for many days together it was underſtood that Gabrias ſent unto Protogenes, and Protogenes unto Gabrias, yet none did wonder at it. For ſince the carrying away of the Princeſs Mandana had then put all Aſia into an univerſal diſorder: And ſince the death of the Queen Nitocris had wrought a great change in the minds of all ſuch as were tied to the intereſts of the Aſſyrian King, it was conceived, that every one thinking of their own ſafety; and examining which ſide to take in the war which was apparently foreſeen, that there was ſome negotiation between Gabrias and Protogenes. Yet the ſecret of the affair was not preſently ſeen, but ere it was long, we found it out: For, Madam, be pleaſed to know that Gabrias having treated with Protogenes, purpoſely to be revenged upon the King of Aſſyria, they both reſolved to take part with Cyrus, but not to declare themſelves until that Prince had an Army in the field, and was advancing towards Babylon, as it was likely he would. But that their intereſts might be the more united, and their treaty more ſolidly made, a marriage between Arpaſia and Aſtidamus was reſolved upon. So that one morning, when this fair one little dreamed of it, Gabrias came to tell her that ſhe muſt prepare her ſelf to go unto Alſenes, and within eight days to marry him. You may imagine, Madam, how ſad Arpaſia was at this news; but ſince ſhe ſtood in fear of Gabrias, ſhe durſt not let the horrid Antipathy between the marriage and her appear: Knowing very well, that if ſhe did ſhew her averſion, it was to no purpoſe: For her Father would not break a treaty of that nature, though ſhe ſhould employ all her tears to win him unto it: So as forcing her ſelf with a ſtrange violence to conceal the exceſs of her ſorrows, ſhe told her Father, that ſhe was all obedience, but ſhe told him it with ſo much ſadneſs as betrayed her heart, and let him know more than ſhe would have ſhewed; yet notwithſtanding Gabrias being too deeply engaged in his deſigns of revenge, would not take any notice of her repugnancy: But gave all requiſite orders that the voyage ſhould be very magnificent. For ſince he deſired to cloak the league from all ſuſpition; he publiſhed the marriage of his Daughter with Aſtidamus, purpoſely becauſe none ſhould wonder at his going unto Alſenes, nor believe that it was to confer with Protogenes. So that the marriage of his Daughter being the pretext of his voyage, the preparations for it were with all magnificence and noiſe; and Arpaſia was conſtrained to receive the viſits of all thoſe who came to rejoyce with her, for a thing which was the ſaddeſt news in the world unto her, ſo that ſtanding in need of all her patience, ſhe was forced to eaſe her heart unto me, and complain againſt the rigour of her fortune. In the mean time, as the ſtate of affairs ſtood, they required all haſte in the buſineſs, and all things requiſite for the voyage were in readineſs; and we departed ſooner than we expected: Almoſt all the young gallants of any note about Gabrias did wait upon him; and this little Court Errant (that I may phraſe it) had been very pleaſant, if the heart of Arpaſia had not been ſo full of ſecret ſorrows: ſhe was alſo obliged by her Fathers command to anſwer a Letter which Aſtidamus ſent her; and to anſwer it with all the civility of a Perſon who looked upon him as her husband, though truly the Letter which ſhe received from him was none of the moſt obliging, the Letter yet was well written and full of wit: Every word was full of civility and reſpect, and yot ſo couched that they were not at all obliging; For there was ſuch a kind of faint luke-warmneſs in it, as made it neither tender nor paſſionate, but as if it were written by a man who was not in love, only writ a Love Letter, becauſe he was obliged, or forced to it.

You may eaſily imagine what kind of diſcourſe Arpaſia and I had, during this voyage, and ſhe would have none in the Coach with her, but only me, purpoſely to have the liberty of talk; and pretending the heat of the weather, ſhe ſent all her other women into other Coaches. She and I were a whole day together, talking of nothing but her misfortune: and the nearer we drew unto Alſenes, the more her melancholly encreaſed. So that being within two days journey, ſhe ſeemed as if ſhe were nothing but a lump of ſadneſs. Yet ſhe had the comfort to underſtand that Gabrias would ſtay ſome days at a Town by the way; until he were better ſatisfied from Protogenes, in ſome points concerning the Treaty, which he would have ended by negotiation before he advanced any further. Yet we were ignorant of the true cauſe of this ſtay; but Gabrias told his daughter, that the reaſon of it was, becauſe all things for her magnificent reception were not yet in readineſs.

However it was, Arpaſia was glad of the ſtop, though ſhe was very ſorry to be ſo near a place where ſhe was to be miſerable. But, Madam, it is requiſite I acquaint you with a paſſage which happened that day when we were ſo ſad, before we came to the Town where we were to ſtay; near unto which there was a River, over which there was a Bridge only of planks for foot people, but not for Coaches, becauſe it was too weak and narrow: We underſtood alſo from ſome Country People, that the Ford over which the Coach was to paſs, was much obſtructed by rubbiſh which a Flood had brought with it: and was very dangerous until it was a little ſcoured; ſo that we came out of the Coach to go over this foot bridge: Gabrias going himſelf to ſee whether the men ſaid true, we ſtayed a long time upon this bridge, beyond which we eſpied a man of a moſt admirable preſence walking on the other ſide of this River, and who as ſoon as we ſtayed, ſtopped and looked upon us alſo. Arpaſia's mind being full of melancholly, ſhe no ſooner ſaw this handſom ſtranger, but imagining him to be ſome friend unto Aſtidamus whom he had ſent unto her Father, ſhe changed her colour, and turning towards me: Alas! Niſide, (ſaid ſhe unto me) I ſhould be very ſorry if this ſtranger, who ſeems to be ſo handſom, ſhould prove a Meſſenger from Aſtidamus: For I muſt confeſs my averſion to him is ſuch, as I wiſh him only to have fools unto his friends, and I wiſh my ſelf ſuch a one for his ſake; that he may have a wife worthy of himſelf: Your wiſh, Madam, is ſo unjuſt (ſaid I unto her) and the execution of it ſo impoſſible, that you make it altogether in vain: But as for this ſtranger, there is no likelyhood that he ſhould be any friend unto Aſtidamus: For if he were, he would advance; and I am confident that he ſtays only to have the pleaſure of ſeeing you at a nearer diſtance when you have paſſed the bridge: For as we can diſcern him to be very handſom, ſo may he diſcern enough in you to invite his looks, and perhaps (ſaid I unto her laughing, purpoſely to drive out her melancholly) if he look upon you but one quarter of an hour longer, he will become a Rival unto Aſtidamus: At leaſt his Garb ſpeaks his condition to be worthy of it. I wiſh with all my heart he were (replied Arpaſia ſia ſuddenly) and I wiſh this man, who ere he be, were ſo far in love with me, as to prevent the deſigns of Aſtidamus, upon condition that I ſhould not love him ſo much my ſelf as to diſturb the quiet of my life. I had thought, Madam, (ſaid I unto her) that your hatred to Aſtidamus was ſo great, as that you would have gone on with your wiſh without any condition; and that you would rather have been the Lover of this ſtranger, than the wife of the other: Truly, replied ſhe, if there were any poſſibility in the propoſition, I ſhould be ſtrangely perplexed if it ſhould be made unto me, for I would do almoſt any thing in the world to keep me from marrying Aſtidamus. As we were talking thus, I ſaw that this ſtranger looked upon Arpaſia very earneſtly, and coming inſenſibly near the end of the bridge, where he thought ſhe would paſs, he ſeemed as if he liked her a-far off, and deſired to ſee her nearer; ſo that we continued talking of him, until we came out of the Coach, to paſs over the bridge. But, Madam, the proſpect being admirably good, eſpecially when we were upon the midſt of the Bridge, Arpaſia ſtayed a long time there to delight her ſelf with ſo fair an Object; thinking that ſhe deferred her miſeries ſome minutes, in not making any haſte over. Indeed the place was very delectable: One ſide of the River looked towards the ruines of a ſtately Caſtle, which ſet limits to the eye that way: On the other ſide, the River did ſo turn and wind it ſelf through a great and pleaſant Meadow, that one would have thought there had been five or ſix ſeveral Rivers in one place: But that which rendered the proſpect moſt delightful, was a rank of Mountains beyond the Meadows, which riding upon the back of each other, ſeemed to reach the Clouds, and barracado up the Country that way: On the other ſide, towards the Town, which ſtood near this little River, the eye was unlimitted, but pleaſingly invited to look upon ſeveral plumps of wood, many pretty Hamlets, abundance of Shepherds Cottages, millions of flocks and heards wherewith the plains were covered, ſo as Arpaſia ſtanding in the midſt of this bridge, and viewing theſe ruſtick beauties, ſhe ſtayed there, as I told you before; and ſhe ſtayed the longer, becauſe a cloud having masked the Sun, ſhe might do it without any inconveniency: So as by this means, the ſtranger who ſtood at the end of the bridge had time enough to admire her beauty, who being unmasked appeared fairer than ever I ſaw her before: She being a little hot, her complexion was higher than ordinary, and the winds whiſling her hair negligently, ſhe often ordered it with her fair hands, ſo as this ſtranger might ſee both them and her arms incomparably white.

But after a long ſurvey of this beautiful proſpect, Arpaſia paſſed the bridge, the ſtranger never taking his eyes off her, for I confeſs to you, Madam, that I eyed him as much as he did Arpaſia, though out of a different reaſon: For I looked upon him, only becauſe his admiration at her beauty pleaſed me, and he looked upon her doubtleſs, becauſe he found her the faireſt piece, that ever he had ſeen in his life. However, as ſoon as Arpaſia came near him, he very reſpectfully ſaluted her; and did his complement ſo handſomly, as it was eaſie to perceive that he was a man of quality, and one who had ſeen the world. But after Arpaſia had paſſed the bridge, ſhe ſat down upon a Pillar, which time had tumbled down, and half ſunk into the earth, ſince it firſt fell, and there ſhe did ſit until her Coach had found out a more convenient ford, and came unto her: All the men went over on horſe-back with Gabrias, and went with him to the Town which was cloſe by, and two or three only ſtaying with Arpaſia, ſhe began to talk of ſeveral things; All this while the ſtranger ſtaying in the ſame place with his friend, he ſtill looked upon her, as if he had a great deſire to come nearer her: And indeed, Fortune favoured his deſign: for Arpaſia being naturally of an inquiſitive diſpoſition, ſhe inquired of every thing that was deſerving it, and wondered to ſee ſuch a goodly pillar as that whereon ſhe ſat in a place where ſhe ſaw no ruins of any building: For the old defaced Caſtle, which was one of the beauties of the Country, was a great diſtance off it. So that ſhe ſent one of her ſervants to enquire of two men, who were near this ſtranger, for what uſe this ſtately pillar had been? But the two men being only Merchants, they knew nothing of it, but anſwered they were ignorant: yet the curioſity of Arpaſia was fully ſatisfied, for ſince they were near this ſtranger, he heard what was asked them, and what they anſwered. So then he being very glad of an occaſion to talk with one, whoſe beauty he ſo much admired, he told Arpaſia's Officer, that he would come and ſatisfie her curioſity, and after he had asked her name and quality, he addreſſed himſelf very reſpectively unto her.

Madam (ſaid he unto her) I think my ſelf very happy in being yeſterday ſo inquiſitive as to ſatisfie my ſelf in what you deſire to know, becauſe I ſhall this day have the glory of ſatisfying the curioſity of the greateſt beauty in the world. Sir, ſaid ſhe, and roſe up to ſalute him, I do ſo little deſerve the commendations which you beſtow upon me, that I cannot chuſe but think you to be a flatterer, at leaſt I can ſee ſo much in the River as I paſs, as makes me bluſh at the applauſe which you are pleaſed to give me: But, noble Stranger, (ſaid ſhe, and gave him not ſo much time as to reply) ſince you know the meaning of this ſtately column, whoſe deſtiny is ſo much changed, I beſeech you inform me. I thought to have told you, Madam, (replyed he) that the deſtiny of this pillar is much greater than perhaps you imagine, for it is a memorial of the Victories of the great Seſoſtris, who heretofore made greater conqueſts than ever any of his predeceſſors did, and whoſe cuſtom was to erect ſuch columns in the countries where he obtained his Victories; and to engrave not only his Name and Country, but to inſculp the valour or the cowardiſe of thoſe he vanquiſhed: Thus was he wont to eternize the ſhame, or the glory of his enemies, according as they did more or leſs, withſtand his valour, by erecting ſuch columns as here you ſee and ſit upon: He made alſo other ſtatues of himſelf, for two of them are to be ſeen hewed out of moſt admirable ſtone; one of them ſtands in the way between Epheſus and Phoceus, and the other between Sardis and Smirna: But as old time is the ruin of all things ſucceſſively, ſo this pillar hath leſs reſiſted its fading ſtroke, than thoſe ſtatues, which are yet very freſh: however, Madam, (added he moſt gallantly) the happy fate of this column hath not abandoned it; for ſince it hath the honour to ſerve you for a ſeat, it hath deſerved a freſh erection, to the end alſo, none other ſhould profane it, by ſitting upon it after you: And I know not (added he and ſmiled) whether if your conqueſts were alſo ingraved upon it, they would not appear to be greater than thoſe of Seſoſtris. Had you reſerved this laſt piece of flattery, Sir, (replied ſhe) I ſhould have told you that I am very ſorry for meeting with ſo noble accompliſhed a man as you are, becauſe I am ſo ſoon to part from him; but now I muſt tell you, that I think my ſelf happy in parting ſo ſoon, leſt I ſhould have loſt that right opinion which I have of my ſelf; However I give you many thanks, Sir, for the favours you have done me, in ſatisfying my curioſity.

After this, Arpaſia looking better upon the Pillar, ſhe found an old inſcription, which this ſtranger did interpret, and ſo neatly, as it was apparant, he was a man of an excellent wit; And Arpaſia being deſirous to teſtify the good opinion ſhe conceived of him, ſhe asked him, who he was, in a very obliging manner. It would ſeem very ſtrange, Sir, (ſaid ſhe unto him) if I ſhould be inquiſitive concerning this Column, and not be as full of curioſity to know the man who hath ſo well informed me, of what Country he is, and of what Name, and therefore I beſeech you acquaint me with both: Madam, (replied he very modeſtly) I have done ſo little honour unto the Country which gave me birth, that I beſeech you give me leave to ſtay until I have well deſerved from it, before I make it known unto you: And let it ſuffice to acquaint you, Madam, that men call me Meliantes without any further knowledge of my Country: Be your Country what it will, Sir, replyed ſhe, you deſerve much commendation, and though I have known you but one poor quarter of an hour only, yet I am ſure I ſhall never ſpeak of you but ſhall applaud you. As Arpaſia ſaid ſo, her Coach came up, and Meliantes having anſwered as one who had ſome reaſon not to deſcribe his Country, ſhe urged him no further. But Meliantes underſtanding that ſhe was to ſtay in the town, he begged the honour to viſit her, and ſhe was willing to ſatisfie his deſire; ſo that parting very civilly from Meliantes, ſhe took Coach, and I with her. But, Madam, all the way to the town we talked of nothing but Meliantes, and commended his Behaviour, his Garb, his Air, and his Spirit. Alſo I underſtood ſince, that all the reſt of that day he talked of nothing unto his companion, but of Arpaſia's beauty, and after he had a long time talked and walked by the River ſide, he returned to the Town, with his friend, and returned thither with intentions to enquire more particularly of the cauſe of Gabrias his voyage; and indeed he met with a fit oportunity, as I ſhall tell you afterwards. On the other ſide, Arpaſia was ſo hugely ſatisfied with Meliantes, that ſhe told her Father whom ſhe had met withal, relating how he had informed her concerning the Pillar of Seſoſtris: Alſo ſhe enquired of the man at whoſe houſe ſhe lodged whether he knew ſuch a ſtranger as ſhe deſcribed; but he anſwered that he knew him not, further than that he had been three days in the Town, and that he ſeemed to be a man of very good rank, adding that the next morning after he came, he ſent a ſervant ſome whither, and ſince that, he did nothing but walk continually with his friend, and enquire very particularly concerning the Country. But, Madam, whilſt Arpaſia was enquiring concerning Meliantes, Meliantes was alſo enquiring very diligently concerning Arpaſia, and fell in with a ſervant of Gabrias, whom he met in a great plain before the Temple of that Town: For ſince all Strangers have a particular right to fall into diſcourſe, when they meet in a Country, in which they are equally Strangers, it was an eaſie matter for Meliantes to fall into diſcourſe with this ſervant, who naturally loved to talk, and who told him more than ever Meliantes asked: For he did not only acquaint him, that Gabrias was going unto Alſenes; but he told him alſo, that he was going to marry his Daughter unto Aſtidamus: Further, hinting to him that Arpaſia did not love him, nor was pleaſed with the marriage, and out of his exceſſive zeal to Arpaſia, to juſtify her averſion, he acquainted him with the irregular demeanour of Aſtidamus.

Thus Meliantes did as perfectly know the ſtate of Arpaſia's fortune, as if he had known her from her Cradle: And underſtanding that Gabrias would ſtay ſome days in that place, he intended to viſit him the next morning: And accordingly did ſo with his friend, whoſe name was Phormion. Since Arpaſia had ſpoken very advantagiouſly of Meliantes unto her father, he entertained him very civilly: And his perſon was ſo fit to pleaſe, and his way was every way ſo noble, that he got a good opinion at the very firſt ſight; for he was big, of a noble ſtature, and of an admirable deportment.

Moreover his hair was cheſtnut colour, his face ſomething long, his eyes brown: Teeth white, mouth handſome, and his phyſiognomy ſo ingenious, that it ſpoke him witty before he ſpake: Yet he ſpoke moſt excellently well, though his accent was ſomething different from ours: And though Meliantes was already knowing in ſo many ſeveral things, as it was a wonder, conſidering his age, how he ſhould attain unto it; yet his converſation was natural and eaſie; and ſpoke with ſuch facility that one might ſee he ſpoke no more than what he knew, though he ſpoke of every thing; at leaſt, I am ſure, I never heard him ſpeak any thing which I would have unſaid again; alſo he compoſed Verſe excellently, and writ admirable Proſe; he had a quick fancy, a ſparkling wit, a pleaſant humour, a noble heart, and moſt generous inclinations. He courted all perſons of any extraordinary merit with a ſtrange deſire of acquaintance, and could ſo finely inſinuate himſelf into their ſpirits, that they no ſooner were acquainted with him, but he got their eſteem and affection: All that knew him, knew him to have a moſt tender heart, and paſſionate ſoul: And when he had any deſign to oblige any one, he uſed ſuch expreſſions, as when he ſpoke of friendſhip, one would have thought he ſpoke of love.

Meliantes then being thus amiable, did exceedingly pleaſe Gabrias, who deſired his company as long as he ſtayed in that place; he would by all means have him at dinner with his friend Phormion, who without all doubt was a man of much merit: And to compleat his good fortune, Gabrias deſired him to viſit Arpaſia, who dined that day in private: And Meliantes willingly obeying where his own inclination invited him, he went unto Arpaſia's Chamber, who was glad to ſee him. Since they had already ſo much eſteem of each other, as to deſire an augmentation of it, it ſeemed by their converſation, that they had no deſigns to conceal their wits; and they ſhewed them without any affectation: Their diſcourſe was ſo pleaſing and diverting, that all the company had ſhares in their joys of confirming that eſteem which they had of each other. The principal ſubject of their converſing was that univerſal chain of all things in the World; which if one link be but changed a hundred thouſand links will change alſo. For truly (ſaid Arpaſia unto Meliantes very ſweetly) if Seſoſtris had never paſſed out of Affrica into Aſia, perhaps I ſhould never have ſpoken to you. For then he had never erected that pillar upon which I ſate, which was the commencement of our acquaintance: And if old time had not defaced it, I ſhould never have known you; for had the inſcription been fair, my Father would have underſtood it, and I ſhould not have had any need of you. So that I am a debtor unto two very different things, for the pleaſure which I have in your company.

Firſt unto that illuſtrious conqueror, who erected that Columne. Secondly to time, which did ruin it, and which made me ſtand in need of your help to ſatisfie my curioſity. I beſeech you, Madam, (ſaid Meliantes and ſmiled) remember what you ſay, that if ever my acquaintance ſhould become troubleſome to you, you may ſtill accuſe Seſoſtris, and not me: And I ſhould be very glad you ſhould think, there is a fatal neceſſity upon all things in the world, to the end you may complain againſt deſtiny, if ever my viſits become tedious to you. I cannot tell, Sir, replyed ſhe, whether I ſhould have any cauſe to complain againſt that which firſt made us acquainted, but I am ſure I ſhall complain againſt you, if you will not acquaint me more preciſely who you are. I have already told you, Madam, replyed he, one of the reaſons which hinders me, and I ſhall not deſpair, but hereafter I may tell you the reſt, if I do not acquaint you with what you deſire to know: you ſpeak, Sir, replyed ſhe, as if we were to live out all our lives together: and yet in all probability we ſhall quickly part. Since you neither know who I am, Madam, (replyed he, and ſmiled) nor what my buſineſs is, for ought you know, my buſineſs is to the place unto which you go. My wiſhes do ſo ſeldom happen (replyed ſhe) that I cannot believe that, and I am perſwaded that accompliſhed men are ſo far from coming unto the place whither I go, that I ſhould rather baniſh all that are there. Your language, Madam, is ſo obliging (replyed Meliantes) that though I had no buſineſs at Alfenes, yet it is my duty to go thither only to make my ſelf worthy of theſe honours you have done me. But, Madam, to tell you ſomething of my fortune, be pleaſed to know, that being in an humour of travel, I have ſeen all Greece, and having contracted an intimate amity with Phormion my friend, unto whom I am obliged for all the pleaſures I have found in his country, I came to ſhew him all Aſia, as he hath ſhewed me all Greece: Therefore, Madam, having no other buſineſs but to ſhew him what Aſia hath moſt rare and admirable, I cannot do better than follow you, ſince there can be nothing more excellent than your ſelf: But truly, Madam, (added he) ſince I find you to be as full of modeſty as beauty; and that your own deſerved praiſes make you bluſh, give me leave to tell you that I go unto Alſenes only to ſee the ſtrange and admirable lake of Arethuſus which the Tigris croſſeth. This being a buſineſs more rational than the other (replyed ſhe) I ſhall be glad you intend it, and ſhall hope to have your good company the longer. Since Phormion had not the language which Arpaſia ſpoke very perfectly, he ſaid little this firſt viſit: But that little he ſaid, ſpoke him worthy to be the friend of Meliantes.

In the mean time, night drawing on, Arpaſia went to walk in a pleaſant garden, and Meliantes waited upon her, ſo as he ſaw her, and talked with her a whole afternoon together. He returned the ſame night unto Gabrias, and went the next morning unto Arpaſia, with whom he was exceedingly charmed, and unto whom he was very welcome: Alſo ſhe ſpoke of him unto me, with many teſtimonies of eſteem. Her averſion to Aſtidamus was a great advantage unto him, and ſhe thought it ſome ſweetneſs that ſhe eſteemed others more than ſhe did him; But Niſide (ſaid ſhe unto me one evening when Meliantes had ſpent the whole day with her) what think you of this ſtranger? Am I not very unfortunate to meet with excellent men for my friends, and with a husband whom I hate? But alas, my fate is ſad, in meeting with Aſtidamus in lieu of Meliantes. The one is infinitely agreeable to my mind. The other is a man between whom and me there is an invincible Antipathy, and yet I muſt paſs away all my days with him: This, this is a rigour which I am not able to endure. Me thinks, this would be a revenge upon this injuſtice, if I ſhould beſtow my eſteem upon Meliantes: And I have every moment a fancy to meet with men whom I can eſteem and love; to the end that when I come unto Alfenes, I ſhould have ſo diſpoſed of all my eſteem and amity, that I ſhould not be able to eſteem or love any I ſhall find there. As for amity, Madam, replyed I, I conceive that it is limited unto a certain number of perſons, beyond which it cannot go: But as for eſteem, I am confident that you, being juſt, will, whether you will or no, eſteem all you ſhall think worthy ſo to be: you will eſteem even in Aſtidamus, all that is eſteemable: Truly Niſide (ſaid ſhe to me) my thoughts of him are ſuch, as I am not able to do juſtice unto the goodneſs that is in him: Not but that I do much condemn my ſelf for it, but yet I can not chuſe, and am ſo little Miſtreſs of my ſelf, and the motions of my own heart, that I believe Meliantes had good reaſon to tell me that all muſt be attributed unto deſtiny: For I am perſwaded that many things which we think we do out of choice, are yet indeed done out of a compulſive neceſſity: this then, Madam, was the temper of Arpaſia's mind, all the while we ſtayed at that place where we met with Meliantes, and our ſtay was longer than we imagined: For many meſſengers and meſſages paſſed between Protogenes and Gabrias concerning buſineſs which was altogether unknown to me: And which had no relation to any thing but the league which they made againſt the King of Aſſyria, upon which only the marriage of Arpaſia did depend.

Thus Meliantes did enjoy the ſight of Arpaſia more in twelve days that we ſtayed there, than poſſibly he could in three months in a great Town: Alſo it may very well be ſaid, that he knew her ſo well, that he knew her too much for his tranquility; for he fell as deſperately in love with her as ever man was with any: Yet he told none of it at that time, except Phormion, unto whom he was forced to confeſs his growing affection: leaſt he ſhould thwart his deſign of ſtaying longer at Alfenes than they intended; and as we underſtood ſince, he was put unto a pitiful plunge: For, Madam, be pleaſed to know, that Meliantes was really called Clidaris, of a family very noble in a Province of Aſſyria; and departing very young form the houſe of his Father, he had travelled ever ſince. But the better to underſtand this adventure, I muſt alſo tell you, that when he departed, he had a ſiſter, whoſe name was Cleonide, who at three years of age was ſent to Alfenes by her Father, who had loſt his Wife, and who ſent her thither to be educated with one of his ſiſters, who was married there; ſo as Meliantes had both a ſiſter and an Aunt in that place unto which we were to go; but ſuch a Siſter and Aunt as unto whom he was unknown; for his Aunt was married in Alfenes before he was born,and his Siſter was ſo young when he departed, that he could neither know her,nor be known by her;but his greateſt plung was, that in his ſhewing Aſia unto his friend Phormion, he had been at Samoſates, where his friend fell ſick: And the worſt was he ſtayed there a long time in courting the affection of a Siſter unto Aſtidamus, whoſe name was Argeliſe: For ſince the Mother of Aſtidamus loved her Daughter very well, ſhe ſtayed there with her, ſo that Meliantes having made a further progreſs into her affection than ever he hoped when he firſt began to court her, he now found himſelf put to a cruel plunge, conſidering the preſent ſtate and paſſion of his ſoul. Phormion alſo was much ſurpriſed when he diſcovered his friend's love: I beſeech you, friend, (ſaid he unto him) do but conſider a little the ſtate of things, ponder upon the ſad ſequels of your paſſion, and the ſmall hopes you have to thrive in it; for you love a Lady, who within theſe eight days is to be married unto a man, whoſe Siſter believes that you will eternally love her: And the truth is, Madam, Argeliſe was of that opinion. Yet thus much muſt be ſaid in Meliante's defence, that ſhe did more contribute unto his Errour than he did; for I have perfectly underſtood ſince that when he firſt ſaw her at Samoſates, his courtſhip was only a certain particular civility which many would never have phraſed love, though ſhe did ſo interpret it.

But the reaſon why this Lady did ſo eaſily believe people loved her, was, becauſe ſhe knew very well ſhe was amiable, and was perſwaded all men were apter for Love than amity; and that if any man was aſſiduous in his viſits, preſently ſhe thought him to be in Love with her: So that ſince ſhe pleaſed Meliantes, he ſaw her oft enough to perſwade her he was in Love: And ſhe having a ſtrong inclination to him, ſhe entertained him as a man both loved, and in love with her. But ſince ſhe could not carry it ſo, without Meliantes knowing her thoughts, he complyed very much with her, and did himſelf think he was in Love: For he ſaw that ſhe was fair, that ſhe pleaſed him, and that then he loved none but her. Yet upon ſerious examination of his thoughts, that kind of affection which he bore unto Argeliſe, was rather a gallant kind of friendſhip, than a violent Love: And yet he hath acknowledged, that when he was ſeparated from her, he believed himſelf in Love, and was never out of that opinion, until he fell in Love with Arpaſia.

In the mean time, moſt certain it is, that when he left Argeliſe, he gave her very obliging language: And I am perſwaded that if he had never ſeen Arpaſia, he had continued loving Argeliſe. And indeed, when he reſolved to go unto Aſenes, and ſhew the lake of Arethuſus unto Phormion, his deſign was to Court the affection of Aſtidamus, though he had no intention then to make himſelf known; not thinking it fit to appear in the place where his Siſter dwelt, until he was in better equipage. Alſo he left off his right Name, and aſſumed that of Meliantes, purpoſely to diſguiſe himſelf from Gelonide, until he had a Train proportionable to his Quality: As for his face, ſhe could not know it, for the reaſons aforeſaid.

But Phormion having lamed his horſe by leaping over a ditch, the pretended Meliantes ſent his ſervant unto the next good Town to get another; and whilſt they ſtayed for his return, the meeting with Arpaſia, made ſuch a ſtrange revolution in the heart and deſigns of Meliantes, that Phormion could not chooſe but wonder to ſee his friend ſo wrapt beyond all reaſon with his paſſion: So as he uſed all his perſwaſions, arguments, and reaſons to avert him from this growing paſſion. I had rather never ſee the Lake of Arethuſus (ſaid Phormion unto him) than to go unto Alſenes, and ſee you become the moſt miſerable man alive: And I had rather be the moſt miſerable man upon Earth (replyed Meliantes) than be ſeparated from Arpaſia: But do not think friend (added he) that I have ſubmitted without reſiſtance: No, I have tried all ways to quench my flames, and to revive my affection unto Argeliſe.

Furthermore, I plainly ſee the oddneſs of my deſign, and the alteration in my heart towards Aſtidamus is the ſtrangeſt thing in the world: For men may love or hate others whom they do know, and alter their minds, but I think it was never heard, that one ſhould love, or hate a man whom he never ſaw: Yet my deſign was to purchaſe the Love of Aſtidamus, and I have changed my mind before I know him. For though when I came hither, my intention was to love him, yet now I have a diſpoſition to hate him: Truth is, there is a great alteration in the cauſe; for when I firſt ſaw the fair and tempting Arpaſia, I conſidered him as the Brother of my Miſtreſs, but now look upon him, as my Rival.

But friend (ſaid Phormion) without any arguments drawn from Argeliſe to cure your new taken up paſſion, I will only ask you upon what bottom do you ground any hopes? I ground my hopes (replyed he) upon Arpaſia's hating Aſtidamus, and this thought affords me more delight than I am able to expreſs. But, friend, replyed Phormion, though ſhe do hate him, yet ſhe intends to marry him. 'Tis true, ſhe doth ſo, anſwered he, but ſhe intends it with reluctancy: But if you would have me tell you how ingenious my paſſion is to frame a chimerical hope, which hath no foundation but only upon the greatneſs of my Love: I muſt tell you, my dear Phormion, that Arpaſia cannot chuſe but hate Aſtidamus, and that ſhe hath done all ſhe is able to love him, but cannot: And it is not impoſſible but I may be that happy one whom ſhe may deſire to hate, but cannot. Alas, Meliantes, (ſaid Phormion) that heart muſt needs be too much ſtung with Love, which can forge any ſuch falſe-grounded hopes as theſe. I confeſs it, friend (replyed he) and my folly is not yet ſo great, but I can ſ[illegible]t: Yet there is no other remedy for my miſery, and therefore I muſt love Arpaſia, and wait upon her to Alſenes.

In ſo doing (replyed Phormion) you wait upon her to her Marriage, and perhaps you will ſee Argeliſe there: Oh cruel friend (ſaid Melinates then) do not blaſt me with ſuch dire predictions, but let me reaſon the matter after my own way: But I pray, friend, replyed Phormion, how can you reaſon it to your own advantage? Thoſe who never knew how to love (replyed Meliantes) are not able to find out ſuch reaſons as one that is in Love can: And I believe it is a more eaſie matter for an Egyptian to underſtand the Language of a Perſian untaught, than it is for a man who is not in Love to underſtand the thoughts of a Lover: But be it as it will, I will love Arpaſia until I know that ſhe loves Aſtidamus.

But what though ſhe ſhould hate him as long as ſhe lives (ſaid Phormion to him) you yet are not a jot the better. I know not what I ſhall be (replyed he) but I am ſure I cannot do what I would: And though Argeliſe ſhould be there, yet I ſhould not change my mind: Not but that I know very well, my paſſion has a very ill foundation: but yet I will love the fair Arpaſia, though it be only to make it appear that Love is able to grow and ſubſiſt without any hopes; at leaſt I am ſure the Grandure of her beauty will be a good excuſe for my weakneſs: and to ſpeak rationally, it is a great injuſtice to deſire any one unto more than he is able; wiſdom would ceaſe to be wiſdom, if it ſhould move one unto impoſſibilities.

And therefore, my dear Phormion, ſince I am not able to overcome my paſſion, I beſeech you humour me in my weakneſs; and to make me leſs miſerable, help me to delude my ſelf. This, Madam, was the ſtate of Meliantes's ſoul: Phormion ſeeing it was in vain ro check the love of his friend, and that his diſeaſe did every moment encreaſe, did a little yield unto him, and according to his firſt deſign, reſolved to go unto Alfenes.

In the mean time, Meliantes being all complacence unto Gabrias, he quickly got his love: So as making uſe of that amity, and deſiring to be as inſeparable as he could from Arpaſia, he beſeeched Gabrias to let him wait upon him to Alfenes, and that Phormion and he might paſs in the number of thoſe who waited upon him in this voyage, either to honour him, or to ſatisfie their curioſity.

You may well think, Madam, that Meliantes was not denied; for ſince his requeſt was agreeable unto the deſire of Gabrias, and an honour unto him, he granted it with much joy.

Meliantes alſo carried the matter ſo handſomly, that none could ſuſpect he had any ſecret thoughts in his ſoul: And Arpaſia did think that the drift of his requeſt was only to be better received in that petty Court, in which Arpaſia her ſelf was the faireſt Star. However, ſince ſhe eſteemed him very much, ſhe was glad of his deſign: and now looking upon him as a friend, whom ſhe was not like to loſe ſo ſoon, ſhe behaved her ſelf more obligingly towards him; and likewiſe he towards her ſo reſpectively, that ſhe could not chuſe but be very well ſatisfied with him: alſo ſhe began to ſpeak more ſincerely to him, and forcing her ſelf leſs than ordinary, ſhe would ſometimes ſigh before him, and not telling him the cauſe, ſhe would ſhew him ſome of her ſorrows.

But, Madam, how joyful was her ſadneſs to him? thinking it to be only an effect of her hatred unto his Rival. And it often fell out, that this fair one would ſpeak unto me in his preſence concerning her averſion to Aſtidamus, thinking that he did not underſtand the meaning: but he was better informed than ſhe imagined, for he underſtood all as well as I did, and he was ſo joyed, as it may be ſaid that Arpaſia's hatred of Aſtidamus was one cauſe of Meliantes's love unto Arpaſia.

But in concluſion, all the negotiations between Protogenes and Gabrias being ended, Gabrias told his Daughter one evening, that they muſt depart in the morning, and that Aſtidamus would meet her half way between that and Alſenes.

You may well imagine, how Arpaſia reſented this news, for ſhe had ſome far fetched hopes that perhaps Protogenes and Gabrias would jar during this long Negotiation, and that her Marriage with Aſtidamus would break off. Meliantes was alſo as ſad as ſad could be, but he did ſo handſomly palliate the cauſe, that Arpaſia obſerving him, did imagine that her ſorrows only was the cauſe of his: yet ſhe did force and temper her Grief by her Virtue and Prudence. But when I was alone with her, ſhe would eaſe her heart by complaining: Meliantes alſo for his particular did the ſame, when he was in private with his Friend Phormion.

In the mean time, the Servant of Meliantes being returned in good time, with a very fine Horſe, which he had bought for his Maſter's Friend, he prepared to wait upon Gabrias and Arpaſia, and to advance towards his Rival. It would be extream raſhneſs in me, Madam, to attempt the relation of all Meliantes's and Arpaſia's thoughts upon this occaſion; for I think it is impoſſible for any to expreſs them, unleſs they were Sufferers in the ſame Predicament with them.

The miſeries which Arpaſia apprehended drawing near, and deſiring to eaſe her Soul by complaints, ſhe would have me only with her in the Coach: Yet I was rather an Aggravater than an Eaſer of her Sorrows; For ſince I verily believed that ſhe muſt of neceſſity marry Aſtidamus, I endeavoured to perſwade her that thoſe good Qualities he had might very well excuſe his bad ones: For truly, Madam, ſaid I unto her, doubtleſs he is handſom, he has a good wit, and brave carriage, his company is pleaſant and merry, and if one did not know the irregularity of his behaviour, all things deſirable might be found in him.

Moreover, Madam, ſince it is not the cuſtom for Perſons of your Quality to have the liberty of chuſing your Husbands, Fortune commonly chuſeth them better for you than your reaſon can. Alas! Niſide (ſaid ſhe unto me) your Arguments are but weak conſolations; I know Aſtidamus hath ſome good perſonal Qualities, and ſo far I could willingly let ſome good ones excuſe the bad ones, but ſince all his excellencies conſiſt in his Perſon, and ſince all his bad Qualities are in his Inclination and Soul, I cannot poize one againſt another to comfort my ſelf; and there is ſomething ſo Antipatheous between Aſtidamus and me, as I cannot tell whether the intereſt of mine own Glory be prevalent enough to make me ſacrifice all the Joys of my life unto him. This, Madam, was the diſcourſe of Arpaſia and me, as we travelled.

As for Meliantes he was in a worſe condition, for Gabrias talked with him all that day, and told him as a great favour, that he would preſent him unto Aſtidamus as ſoon as e're they met. At laſt we entered into a great Plain, and ſaw a Body of Cavalry coming out of a Wood towards us: Arpaſia making no queſtion but that it was Aſtidamus, the very ſight had like to have broken all her Reſolutions of conſtraining her ſelf, and if the Plain had been ſhorter, certainly ſhe had wanted time to recollect her ſelf. On the other ſide, Meliantes being upon the point to ſee him, who was to enjoy her he loved; his heart did beat a moſt ſtrange diſorderly March: yet he had one more ſtruggle with himſelf, and endeavoured to look upon Aſtidamus rather as the Brother of Argaliſe, than as the Lover of Arpaſia: but, alas, all in vain. He no ſooner ſpied this body of Cavalry which appeared, but he looked towards Arpaſia, and endeavoured to obſerve her thoughts, and finding nothing in her face but ſad melancholly, he was extreamly well ſatisfied. In the mean time, Gabrias not heeding either the ſadneſs of Arpaſia, nor the inquietude of Meliantes, he ſaid he would mend his pace, to meet him who was coming towards them; and ſo he did, ſo as Meliantes followed as the reſt did, and made haſte to ſee a man whom he deſired never to ſee. The interview of Gabrias and Aſtidamus had all the civilities and ceremonies uſual at ſuch meetings: Aſtidamus alighted firſt from his Horſe, and Gabrias after him, and walking towards one another, they embraced with many expreſſions of ſatisfaction. After which Gabrias turned him about, intending to preſent Meliantes unto Aſtidamus, thinking he was behind him. But this concealed Lover deſirous to defer the embraces of his Rival, had mixed himſelf with the reſt of his Retinue; ſo as by this means, he was conſtrained to preſent them all as they came up: But when he came unto Meliantes, Gabrias made a more particular Eulogy concerning him, purpoſely to render his merit the more recommendable unto Aſtidamus, who received him moſt civily: So as this unfortunate Lover was forced to render unto his Rival, Civility for Civility. Phormion alſo was well received by Aſtidamus, and this interview paſſed better betwixt Arpaſia and him.

But to tell you how it was, be pleaſed to know, that whilſt Gabrias was preſenting all his Retinue unto Aſtidamus, Aſtidamus, our Coach was ſtill advancing, ſo as we came to the place where theſe complements paſſed juſt as Aſtidamus had ended: and coming then towards Arpaſia, doubtleſs it was expected ſhe ſhould command the Coach-man to ſtop: but her mind being extreamly troubled, ſhe ſaid not a word, ſo as the Coach-man went on: And I think, if Gabrias had not cried out unto him to ſtay, Arpaſia would have let him to drive on, though ſhe ſaw Aſtidamus well enough coming towards her.

On the other ſide, there appeared ſo much diſorder in the Countenance of this Lover, that in all my life I never ſaw the like: For my part, I believe it was an effect of his anger, that Arpaſia would not command her Coach to ſtay; and becauſe he found ſuch a faint coldneſs in the face of that fair one.

In the mean time, as I deſired to come out of the Coach to let him have the more liberty of talk with Arpaſia, he would not permit it, but told Gabrias, who preſented him to his Daughter, that Protogenes expected them with much impatience, and that he would not retard him from a benefit which he wiſhed ſo much to receive, and which he did deſerve. Aſtidamus, Madam, ſpake this with a kind of forced civility, though naturally he had a free way, and air with him: ſo as it was eaſie to perceive that his mind was perplexed.

Many who obſerved the agitation of his Soul, did believe this to be an effect of the Grandure of his paſſion: But for my part, I always believed it to be an effect of his anger.

In the mean while, Meliantes, who ſlunk away when Gabrias ſhould have preſented him unto Aſtidamus, he drew as near as he could poſſible, to ſee the meeting of Arpaſia and him; and indeed he got ſo near, that he could obſerve every motion in their countenances, eſpecially in Arpaſia's, whom he eyed more than he did Aſtidamus:

for preſuppoſing him to be in love with her, he never looked in his eyes: But hoping to find ſome ſparks of averſion in the eyes of Arpaſia, he obſerved her with ſo much attention, that whoſoever ſaw him, might plainly perceive that he was deeply concerned in the buſineſs. At leaſt Phormion told me ſo ſince; for my part I looked upon none but Aſtidamus only, and wondred to ſee ſo much diſcontent in his face at a time when he ſhould have been all joy, that I knew not what to think. However, after ſome ſhort and ſlight complements the Coach went on: Gabrias, Aſtidamus, and all the reſt took Horſe and went before: So as I being at liberty to ſpeak my thoughts unto Arpaſia, I told her ſhe did not well in not commanding the Coach to ſtay: Alas! Niſide (ſaid ſhe unto me) I never thought upon any ſuch command: and had I followed my own inclination, I ſhould have given a command quite contrary: But Niſide, ſaid ſhe unto me, I think it very ſtrange, that in lieu of upbraiding Aſtidamus for his faint and hollow accoſt, you do accuſe me, and not him. Since, Madam, your incivility did precede his faintneſs (ſaid I very boldly unto her) I muſt hear him ſpeak, before I can wonder at his proceeding: For I do verily believe, that his anger at what you did, was the cauſe of his cold behaviour. However it be, ſaid ſhe, he did me a very great pleaſure in receiving me no better; yet I am very angry at it. To be pleas'd and angry both at one thing, replied I, is very ſtrange: Yet I am both, replied ſhe, for my joys at what he hath done, proceeds principally from his angering me. Truly, Madam, ſaid I unto her, you move me to abundance of pity, to ſee you ſo careful to hate a man with whom you are to paſs away all your life. Since I am ſure, anſwered ſhe, that it is abſolutely impoſſible I ſhould ever love him: my beſt courſe is to find ſome comfort in my hatred of him, and that I do perſwade my ſelf it is juſt, leſt I ſhould be conſtrained to accuſe my ſelf.

In the mean time, being come unto the River Tigris, Aſtidamus by orders from Protogenes, did make us take upon the left hand, purpoſely to ſhew Arpaſia the Lake of Arethuſus, through which the Tigris paſſeth, and never mingles waters. Afterwards, turning towards the Town, we entered at a Port towards the Plain, where Gabrias and Arpaſia received many complements from Protogenes, I ſhall omit the tedious relating how all the Inhabitants of the goodly Town were in Arms; how all the ſtreets were full of people, how the windows were adorned with Ladies of Quality, and how Protogenes ſtood expecting at the Gate of his Palace, not being able to go any further. Since this meeting had nothing obſervable in it, I ſhall paſs it over: Yet I muſt tell you, how Aſtidamus having recollected himſelf out of that diſorder of mind, the cauſe of which we do not know, he helped Arpaſia out of her Coach; and after Protogenes had ſaluted her, did wait upon her to her chamber, ſo as now the Torments of Meliantes and Arpaſia did begin to double. Yet Aſtidamus did not trouble her that night: for ſince ſhe feigned her ſelf to be very weary, he left her to the liberty of her reſt: But the next morning ſhe muſt prepare her ſelf to receive the viſits of all the Perſons of Quality in Alfenes of both Sexes.

It was ſome comfort unto her that Aſtidamus came not near her all that day; for ſince Protogenes could neither go nor ride, by reaſon of ſome infirmities, it was the office of Aſtidamus to ſhew Gabrias all the Town: but in exchange, Meliantes ſpent all the day with Arpaſia, and was a witneſs of all the viſits which ſhe received: So as knowing the names of his Aunt, and Siſter, which dwelt in Alfenes, though he knew not their faces, nor they him, he carefully asked the names of all the Ladies which came into Arpaſia's Chamber, and long he asked in vain: But at laſt towards evening, there came a grave Lady well in years, and a young one following, admirably fair, whoſe names he alſo enquired: and preſently he was told that the ancient Lady's name was Ferinte, and the young one's Cleonide, ſo as now he knew the one to be his Aunt, and the other his Siſter. Yet he would not make himſelf known unto them; nor truſt himſelf unto two perſons whoſe temper he did not know: nor would he tell Phormion which were they, nor could Phormion know which were they unleſs Meliantes told him, becauſe he knew not their names, he only knew that he had an Aunt, and a Siſter at Alfenes. However, Cleonide being the faireſt and moſt lovely of all that Arpaſia had ſeen in Alfenes, ſhe received her with as particular civility, as if ſhe had known her to be the Siſter of Meliantes,

This Lover flattering his paſſion, and obſerving the ſweetneſs of Arpaſia unto Cleonide, he imagined that it was rather an effect of a ſtrong inclination than of beauty: So as making this application unto his advantage, he hoped that perhaps ſhe might have the ſame inclination unto the Brother which ſhe had unto the Siſter. But the very truth is, Arpaſia did only render juſtice unto the merit of Cleonide: And indeed, Madam, a more amiable perſon could not be upon earth than ſhe; for not only all the features of her face were ſo many particular beauties, but alſo ſhe had the Air of a high beauty; and all the charms which ſweetneſs it ſelf could infuſe into fair eyes, were queſtionleſs in hers: She had alſo ſuch a kind of paſſionate Language, as whoſoever ſaw her, could not chuſe but think themſelves bleſt in her love: Moreover, ſhe ſpoke admirably well, and was ſuch a profeſſed enemy unto all kind of detraction, that ſhe would give even her enemies a good word when they deſerved it: And if any fault could be found in Cleonide, it was in having a Soul too apt to truſt ſuch as promiſed amity; for as ſhe would deceive none, ſo ſhe thought none would deceive her: and yet this fault did make her appear much more amiable, becauſe ſhe was the very Embleme of ſincerity, and that confidence which ſhe had in others, did make her much more charming, yet ſhe was a little ſad the firſt day Arpaſia ſaw her. And Aſtidamus, after he had carried Gabrias unto the Chamber of Protogenes, he entred into that of Arpaſia, who redoubled her commendations when ſhe ſaw him, telling him that ſhe admired he ſhould never ſpeak of Cleonide's beauty, when Protogenes ſent him unto Gabrias. Arpaſia wondered alſo he ſhould never mention her unto her.

This obliging civility of Arpaſia did not only make her unto whom it was addreſſed to bluſh, but alſo it made ſome alteratiou in the face of Aſtidamus; and made him anſwer as if he were a little non-pluſt. Yet thoſe who took notice of it, believed that the reaſon was, becauſe he was unwilling to commend one beauty in the preſence of another. As for Meliantes, he conceived (as he told me ſince) that had he been in the room of Aſtidamus, he ſhould have been anſwered otherwiſe; for my part (ſaid he, and ſpoke unto Arpaſia) I am fully perſwaded, Madam, that ſuch a beauty as yours does ſo much take up the thoughts of thoſe who behold it, that they have not the liberty of remembring any other. You have very good reaſon, Sir, to ſpeak as you do (replied Cleonide, being a little netled) and I aſſure you, I ſhould think my ſelf much obliged unto that perſon who ſhould think of me in the preſence of Arpaſia. Meliantes knowing that Cleonide was his Siſter, and that it would be known to all hereafter, he valued not his Siſter's anger, at his under-valuing her beauty, and attributing all unto Arpaſia, imagining that when ſhe knew him to be her Brother, ſhe would pardon him.

In the mean time, ſince ſhe knew it not, ſhe could not chuſe but contradict Meliantes in all his diſcourſe. As for Aſtidamus, he was ſo backward in any obliging expreſſions unto Arpaſia, that every one took ſpecial notice of it: She her ſelf alſo perceived it as well as the reſt, and better: So that after all the company was gone out of her chamber, ſhe ſpoke unto me with ſo much anger, as made me pity her. Would not any one ſay that heard Aſtidamus ſpeak (ſaid ſhe unto me) that he was already my Husband? And conceiving it fit not to commend the beauty of his Wife, he durſt not ſpeak to me at all; Judge I beſeech you what he would do, if I ſhould marry him. I profeſs he behaves himſelf ſo oddly, that if a Stranger were in the company; and were told that I had a Lover amongſt them who was to marry me, he would never gueſs it to be Aſtidamus, but would rather think it to be Meliantes: And to ſpeak the very truth, Aſtidamus looks like a Husband daſht out of countenance with the commendations that is given to his Wife: and Meliantes talks like a brave and civil Gallant, though he be none of mine.

For my part, Madam, (ſaid I unto her, though I thought it not) I think Aſtidamus is ſo deeply in love with you, that he is out of his wits, for he was no ſuch man the firſt time I ſaw him. Fie, fie, Niſide (ſaid ſhe unto me) if Aſtidamus were out of his wits for the love of me, and did commit any incivilities, they would be of another nature: and he would ſooner diſoblige all the beauties in Alſenes, than diſoblige me as he hath done, in commending me ſo faintly as he hath done. As ſoon as Arpaſia had ſaid ſo, ſhe received very welcome news from Gabrias, for a Servant of his came to acquaint her from him in ſecret, that Protogenes and he were reſolved not to proceed unto the Marriage of Aſtidamus and her, until they had ſent to ask the new King of Aſſyria's leave, and not to break off with him till the Army of Cyrus was in the Field, which was not near them enough to declare without danger: adding, that in the mean time they would give ſecret orders to make ſure of the Souldiers, to the end that when they did declare they might be conſiderable unto that Prince whoſe part they ſhould take. Arpaſia hearing that her miſery was at leaſt deferred, ſhe was joyed beyond all expreſſion.

On the other ſide, Meliantes learning to know the paſſions of others by his own, he thought that Aſtidamus was not in love with Arpaſia; ſo that applying himſelf to diſcover his thoughts, he obſerved him with all vigilancy: and the truth is, when Aſtidamus did ſtrain himſelf to ſpeak Arpaſia fair, one might plainly ſee that his ſpirit had not its ordinary liberty, but was in a continual conſtraint. Moreover, the preſence of Arpaſia was no hindrance unto him from ſpending moſt of his time in ſuch diverſions and recreations as moſt ſuited with his own inclination, as much as if ſhe had been abſent; for he played both night and day at thoſe ſports and games which the Lydians invented: Alſo he uſed many obſcure and unknown viſits, and none knew how he ſpent half his time, nor what he did. But though Aſtidamus was very ſlow in his viſits of Arpaſia, yet Meliantes was very aſſiduous, and was continually with her, with whom he was grown a moſt intimate Confident.

However, Protogenes being noble and magnificent every way, he made continual Feaſts and Banquets; and amongſt the reſt, he prepared one moſt gallant, to ſet forth the variety of the Arethuſean Lake: And the better to deſcribe it unto you, Madam, give me leave to ſpeak ſomething of the courſe of that famous River which runs by Alſenes, and croſſeth the Lake of Arethuſa; for indeed, Madam, the River Tigris hath this particularity, that one little ſpring which riſeth from the Mountain Niphates is the Mother of this River. Truth is, it doth not all the way own the ſame name; for being very gentle in its firſt ſource, the Inhabitants of the Country do call it Diglito, as much as to ſay, ſlow, and lazie: and it doth not take the name of Tigris, which ſignifies an Arrow, until by falling from ſome Grounds which it doth water, it hath gotten the rapidity and ſwiftneſs of an Arrow; and when it comes to Alſenes, where that great and famous Lake of Arethuſa is, it runs through it with ſuch impetuoſity, that its waters do not mingle with it: and the Fiſhes being carried by the violence of its courſe, do not mingle with thoſe of the Lake; nor thoſe of the Lake, with them of the River.

On the contrary, this turbulent water is ſo oppoſite unto the nature of thoſe Fiſhes which the Lake doth nouriſh, that they never come near the place where the River runs: ſo as it may very truly be ſaid, the Lake and the River are continually together, and yet always ſeparate, ſince they never mingle. This River hath beſides many ſingularities which are worthy of curioſity: but I muſt not inſiſt upon them, becauſe it is my buſineſs to ſpeak of the Lake and the Feaſt which was made upon it:and only to let you know, that Protogenes having a deſire to make it appear that all the wonders of the Lake were true, his deſign was to make a very noble Feaſt upon it, ſince it had more variety of diverſion than any other. 'Tis true, that Aſtidamus was very buſie at this Feaſt, and took great care of it; and had he behaved himſelf towards Arpaſia, as he ought to have done when he ſpake unto her, ſhe had good reaſon to be well ſatisfied with this magnificence. Yet juſtice muſt be done unto Meliantes upon occaſion, for he did contribute much unto the inventions of this: And the better to deſcribe unto you, Madam, be pleaſed to know, that as ſoon as dinner was done, all the Ladies, accompanied with thoſe Men who were to wait upon them, came unto the banks of the Lake, the Ladies in Coaches, the Men on Horſes: Yet before I tell you what we found there, and what we ſaw, I muſt repreſent unto you that noble and lovely Proſpect which that place did offer unto the eye.

Imagine that you ſaw a Lake of ſo large an extent as it ſeemed to be a little Sea; but a Sea moſt ſerene and calm, where no waves or billows were toſſed by the winds; and where the waters were only frizled by ſuch a gentle gale which did not threaten any ſhipwrack. And imagine alſo you ſaw a-far off a great and pleaſant Country, watered by the River Tigris; which coming with impetuous force, enters into this Lake which croſſeth it, and as I told you before, keeps ſtill its natural ſwiftneſs: So as in the midſt of this quiet and ſleeping water, may be ſeen this turbulent River, rowling its waves one after another with ſuch precipitation, as if it would over-flow a pleaſant Meadow, near which ſtands the Town of Alſenes.

The very colour of the waters are ſo different, as it is moſt apparent they do not mingle: But that which renders this object the more beautiful, is two ſtately Pavillions built at the entrance; and at the iſſue of the River, into, and out of this Lake, purpoſely to ſee more conveniently the wonderful paſſage of this River, and to view the pleaſant proſpect. But, Madam, to return form whence I digreſſed, give me leave to tell you, that when all the company was come to the Lake, there was thirty little Barques painted and gilt, with ſtately Tents and Canopies, to umbrage the Ladies from the Sun's heat, ſo as ſince every Barque would hold eight or ten perſons, beſides thoſe who guided it; there might be in each ſo much good company as not to trouble one another: And as commonly every one ſtrives to ſuit their company to their beſt content, it is to be believed that every one was well pleaſed that day. For none was forced into any particular Barge, but every one culled themſelves as they beſt liked, without any Ceremony, or conſideration of Rank. Yet it was not altogether ſo: For ſince ſome out of their prudence do conſtrain themſelves, there were ſome who were not placed where they deſired to be.

Arpaſia being much taken with Cleonide, ſhe would needs have her and two others in her Barge, where alſo ſhe was pleaſed to have me. Alſo ſhe deſired Meliantes to be there; and as for Aſtidamus he muſt be there for more reaſons than one. As for Protogenes and Gabrias, they were in another with others ſutable to their gravity and age. But when theſe thirty Barges were all filled, and the pleaſant Fleet began to ſail upon the Lake, it made the moſt delightful object in the world. Beſides theſe thirty Barges which were deſigned for the Company, there were many others which held Muſitians and Servants, which made a moſt melodious harmony upon the waters. Beſides theſe, there were other deſigns for Fiſhers in the River, that it might be apparently ſeen, the Fiſhes which were taken in the one, were not the ſame with the other, although the River run through the Lake. And indeed, Madam, the wonder is without any doubt, for our Fleet being ſometimes upon the Lake, and ſometimes upon the River Tygris, we ſaw their Nets full of Fiſhes twenty ſeveral times, and never found one fiſh of the Lake in the nets that were caſt into the River: Nor one fiſh of the River in any net that was caſt into the Lake, though the nets were thrown at a very conſiderable diſtance, ſo as the ſight ſeemed to be incredible. But it was extream delightful to be ſometimes in the calm, and ſometimes upon the rough waters: For when we were upon the Lake, we moved unperceiveable, and it might be tearmed rather a ſliding than a ſailing, but when we paſſed from the Lake on to the current of the River, we perceived the motion as if it were upon the ſea, ſo as we were moſt of our time upon the Lake where we found moſt pleaſure and moſt ſafety: And yet there was not one perſon who was not deſirous to be upon both. But after variety of delights upon the waters, we rowed towards the ſtately pavilion which was erected at the entrance of the River Tygris into the Lake of Arethuſus. After landing, all the Ladies were conducted into a great and ſtately Chamber, open on four ſides, the better to enjoy this goodly proſpect: As for the men, after they had waited upon the Ladies into this Chamber, they mounted themſelves upon horſes which waited for them upon the banks of the river, and in a hunting equipage, they prepared themſelves. For Protogenes had cauſed ſeveral wild beaſts to be taken in Toyles and brought thither, and let looſe, purpoſely to divert the Ladies. Thus all the Gallants were turned Hunters, and the Ladies out of windows Spectators; the chaſe began, but could not run out of the Ladies ſight, becauſe the Lake and the River did bound them on both ſides, and Protogenes had ſtopped the paſſages on the other ſides with toyles, and armed men: So as the Chaſe ran twenty times under the window of the Ladies; all the men being admirably well hors'd, their habits rich and handſom, this hunting moved much delight. But after the hunting and the fiſhings were ended, and after the Hunters and Fiſhers had offered the fruits of their labour unto Arpaſia, the Ladies were conducted a ſtory higher, where to our wonder we found a moſt rare collation full of magnificence and variety: Yet this was not the concluſion of the diverſion; for after we were riſen from the Table, we went down again into the room where we viewed the hunting, and where a Ball began. I ſhall not make any preciſe relation of the paſſages there; nor how unquiet Aſtidamus appeared: But give me leave to tell you, Madam, that Arpaſia appeared moſt admirably fair, and that Cleonide appeared as ſhe was; for though it be very difficult to find two great beauties together, and the one not to eclipſe the other, yet the beauty of theſe two being very different, they both preſerved their own Luſters. But as for all the reſt of the Alſenian beauties, though very fair, yet they muſt all ſubmit unto Arpaſia and Cleonide. Amongſt the reſt of this aſſembly, there was one who muſt needs have a ſhare in my diſcourſe, who though ſhe had no pretence in the earth unto any beauty, yet medled with all the beauties that ever came within the compaſs of her acquaintance: for I do verily believe, Madam, that ſince the time that detraction and ſlander firſt began, there was never any ſo excellent at it as ſhe: and conſidering the univerſal hatred which ſhe bore unto all her acquaintance, one would ſay, ſhe would be revenged upon all mankind; becauſe the gods had made her no fairer than ſhe was. She would deſcant as boldly upon the faults of others, as if ſhe had none her ſelf. Yet moſt certain it is, ſhe was very near of reſemblance unto all that was ugly and diſagreeable; yet ſhe had ſuch a kind of bold confidence, as made men hardly dare to think of her, as ſhe deſerved.

And yet for all that, there were ſome men, even rational men, who both ſaw her, and courted her, though I am perſwaded there was ſome ſecret malignity of ſpirit in them which made them to take delight in thoſe continual backbitings and ſlanders which ſhe vented. Moreover, all the malicious mindeſt men in Alſenes did ſo flock unto her with ſuch tales, as was fewel to her detracting humour, that none had better intelligence than ſhe. Moreover, as there were many men in reſpect of their own honours would not ſpeak ſo ill of others as ſhe did, becauſe they had an appearance of virtue; ſo they arrived at their deſired end by contracting confidence with this perſon, whoſe name was Alcianipe: Thus ſparing themſelves the labour of detracting, they did as much hurt by ſetting her on, as if they themſelves had vented the ſlander, yes and more; for ſince it was the accuſtomed practice of Alcianipe to ſlander, ſhe was grown wonderful ingenious in it: And for my part, I cannot chuſe but wonder at her memory of things: For, Madam, if there were any family in Alſenes, which pretended unto Antiquity, ſhe would frame their Genealogy after her mode, and ſo as ſhould make you believe it was otherwiſe than as they pretended. Moreover, if any one of a family had committed any fault, though three ages ſince, yet all the family muſt be branded with it, and ſhe would ſay it was a vice hereditary to all the houſe; as for the beauty of women, ſhe never commended any, but when it might ſerve her turn to make her paſs for a gallant, or make her husband jealous. If ſhe were to be credited, there was not a rich man in all Alfenes, nor any one that was noble, nor a man that had not betrayed his friend, nor a woman that had not ſome private correſpondency of gallantry.

Again, ſhe would play at ſmall games, rather than ſit out, and exerciſe her ſelf in trivial ſcandals, every woman, if fair, was always five or ſix years elder with her than with any elſe; and ſhe had a wit ſo fit for ſuch ſlanders, that ſhe would make any almoſt believe her. For ſhe would dreſs up her lyes with ſuch probable circumſtances, as none could think ſhe could invent them: And though ſhe was known unto all the world to make open profeſſion of ſpeaking ill upon all, without any exception, yet there were a ſort of men who did believe her. Furthermore, ſince ſhe had made her ſelf to be extreamly feared, many women would viſit her, although they knew well enough, that as ſoon as they were out of her houſe, ſhe would give a Character to all thoſe that remained: Yet ſince they had a conceit that ſhe would ſpeak worſe of them, if they did not viſit her, they did ſee her though they never eſteemed or loved her: And ſince many women are more joyed to hear ill ſpoken of ſuch as they love not, than they are grieved to hear ill of themſelves, they came to receive that ſatisfaction from Alcianipe, at the hazard of expoſing themſelves unto her Satyrical laſh; ſo as by this means ſhe was as much viſited, as if ſhe was the beſt woman in the world. For my part, I confeſs, I have grumbled at my friends a thouſand times for going to her, and I never went, but when I was forced, for I do hate, as I do the Devil, ſuch perſons as ſpit all venome, and never ſpeak any truth but when it may do hurt. Moreover, Alcianipe did ſpeak exceeding well, and made choice of ſuch good phraſes to ſet out her lies, that none living would imagine ſhe forged them.

This Alcianipe was at this feaſt, but ſhe came thither with deſign to make falſe Deſcriptions of all that were there, unto Meliantes, who, as chance would have it, ſate next her; whilſt Aſtidamus took out Arpaſia to dance, and he hath ſince told me, that ſhe had a laſh at every one in the company, not excepting Arpaſia, who, ſhe ſaid, was ſcurvily dreſt that day, though heaven knows ſhe was never better in her life.

In the mean time, all the men of quality who followed Gabrias, being very deſirous to know all thoſe of that petty Court, there was one whoſe name was Pelinthes, who, as any man took any Lady out to dance, he asked their names and qualities, and ſhe anſwering always according to her humour: Meliantes being on one ſide, and he on the other, they put a thouſand queſtions to her. I beſeech you (ſaid Pelinthes, ſeeing a Lady of a good preſence and quality) tell me who that Lady is? If you ſhould judge of her by the Grandure of her air (replyed ſhe) you would think her to be ſome kin to the gods, and to ſay the truth (added ſhe, to palliate her ſcandal) ſhe is a very admirable Lady, for every action and word of hers ſpeaks her of a royal race; yet heavens know, her grandfather was no better than a poor ſtranger, whoſe Original the gods do know and none elſe, and thoſe who are acquainted with her can tell you, ſhe ſmells of the buſineſs of her anceſtors in all her inclinations, and though ſhe looks more like a Queen than a Subject, yet ſhe ſpeaks as if her education were amongſt the baſeſt ſort of peſants: her carriage alſo diſpleaſeth, ſhe cannot ſo much as make a curteſy as others do, and has a moſt-ill favoured gate: Yet truly, to ſpeak truth, ſhe is a very good woman. I beſeech you (ſaid Meliantes, and interrupted her) what man is that who is in the corner of the room, and ſeems to be ſo melancholy? And what makes he here at a feaſt of joy, in ſo ſad a poſture? Truly, Sir, (ſaid ſhe) it is no wonder he ſhould be ſo ſad, for there are very few men who can indure their wives ſhould love all the World: and as gallant as you are, Sir, if you were in his room, confident I am, you would be as much perplexed as he is, for that gay and frolick Lady, who you ſee at the other end of the room, and courted by ſo many men, is his wife. I do verily believe her virtuous (added ſhe) but yet ſhe lives very ſuſpiciouſly. The truth is, ſhe cares not for her husband, ſhe is perpetually from home, and courted continually by a croud of gallants, whilſt her poor husband, for his honours ſake, dare hardly ſhew himſelf, but ſleeps at home.

In the mean time, 'Tis he who pays for all the entertainments the wife makes unto her gallants, and for her rich dreſs which invites them to her, and I believe alſo pays for the Pictures which ſhe beſtows upon her Adorers; and ſhe is as jolly a Lady as ever lived unto thoſe who viſit her, and will take no notice of her behaviour, or her husband's miſery.

I am ſure (replyed Pelinthes, and ſhewed her another Lady, who appeared very melancholy (that yonder Lady does not put her husband unto any ſuch ſorrows, at leaſt ſhe hath not the garb of gallantry. Truth is, (ſaid ſhe) ſhe does not make him jealous; but ſhe torments him as bad another way: For ſhe being a well accompliſhed woman, ſhe thinks him too highly obliged unto her, and puts him to abundance of torment; for ſhe is ſo jealous, as that ſhe hates all the women ſhe ſees, and puts incivilities upon them; yet truly I think ſhe cannot be accuſed of gallantry, for I believe her virtue was never put to the teſt. I ſee another, next her (replied Meliantes) who looks high enough to ſcorn her husband, it ſhe have one; you are not miſtaken, Sir, (ſaid ſhe) for ſhe being of a better family than him ſhe married, ſhe treats him more like a ſlave than a husband, and the worſt is, becauſe he is inferiour unto her, ſhe admits of gallants inferiour unto him. Her injuſtice is ſo great (reply'd Pelinthes) that I will no longer look upon her; but had rather ask you who the man is which is behind her, and is ſo magnificent? would not any one think, ſaid ſhe, that he was the owner of all the riches in the coffers of Crœſſus? and yet he is only a man of fortune without any Eſtate, nor can any tell how he lives: Some think that his expences are at the coſt of other men, and I believe the man who ſtands next Arpaſia, pays for it: However, he whom you ſee next Protogenes, is hugely rich, but extreamly covetous: The other next him is abominable prodigal though poor; that young Lady not far off him, is as very a goſſip as ever lived, ſhe in the blue is as crafty as ever lived, and that other in the carnation ribands, is the moſt envious woman alive; for ſhe is vexed to the heart if any other have any thing that is good. After this, Alcianipe looking upon all the company, and without any intreaties from Meliantes or Pelinthes, ſhe began a moſt bitter invective and falſe Satyrical Character of every one there.

Meliantes, ſeeing ſhe had a good word from none, reſolved to ſpeak of his Rival, and Alcianipe, after a hint upon the ill dreſs of Arpaſia, ſhe began to commend her highly, on purpoſe to have a better occaſion of blaming Aſtidamus: For (ſaid ſhe unto Meliantes) conſidering his behaviour unto her, one would ſay that he did not think her fair, but 'tis no wonder (added ſhe) for he is one of the moſt irregular minded men in the World; and had I been acquainted with Gabrias, I would have hindered him from giving his Daughter unto a man of ſuch a temper; then did ſhe begin to tell him of all the extravagancies of Aſtidamus, adding a hundred things more than ever were true. But I am the moſt miſtaken woman in the World, (ſaid ſhe) if Aſtidamus have not ſome ſecret haunts which withdraweth his mind from Arpaſia: For he ſometimes goes out very early, and comes in very late, and none knows where he hath been, and ſometimes an unknown meſſenger brings him Letters, but 'tis no matter, I ſhall know the intrigue of the buſineſs within this eight days, and ſhall ſet ſo many ſpies upon him, that it ſhall be hard for him to eſcape me.

Oh, I beſeech you let me have a ſhare in your confidence (ſaid Meliantes then unto her very earneſtly.) With all my heart, ſaid ſhe, upon condition that in your obſervation of Aſtidamus, you will acquaint me with all your diſcoveries. You may well imagine, Madam, that Meliantes did willingly promiſe her what ſhe deſired, ſo their treaty ended, they parted, and all the company broke up. And the ſame Barges which brought us thither, carried us back; for the Moon being at the full, and the Heavens clear and ſerene, Protogenes foreſaw it would be the moſt pleaſant returning in the night: And indeed, Madam, I do not think there ever was a more pleaſant voyage than this of the night, the day being nothing comparable unto it; an univerſal ſilence reigned all over, and was not interrupted by any thing, but only the noiſe of oares, a gentle waft of wind brought the purfumes of the Meadows upon the water: The Moon and the Stars were as well in the Lake as in the Firmament. But queſtionleſs, the greateſt pleaſure was in the converſation of Arpaſia, Cleonide, Meliantes, and Aſtidamus, for all returned in the ſame Barge in which they came.

When we had put off from ſhoar, and diſcourſed a little upon the fineneſs of the night, Arpaſia, having already heard enough concerning Alcianipe, and taking notice how Meliantes talked a long time with her, ſhe began to chide him, and tell him that ſhe could hardly pardon the choice he made: For to make uſe of a compariſon which the place affords me, ſaid ſhe, the fiſhes in the River Tygris mingle not themſelves with thoſe of the Lake, nor they of the Lake with thoſe of the River; even ſo would I have all the world do, for though the good and the bad be promiſcuouſly together in the world, yet I would never have them to mingle, but after the example of theſe fiſhes keep apart: Let the virtuous never have any commerce with the vicious, let the good be with the good, and the bad with the bad, the angry with the angry, the merry with the merry, wits with wits, fools with fools, and ſo like to like will ever be moſt ſutable: I would not have Meliantes, who is the freeſt man alive from detraction, hold conference with the moſt ſcandalizing woman upon earth. I give you thanks, Madam, (replyed Meliantes) for your wiſe adviſe; but perhaps, Madam (ſaid Cleonide who owed Meliantes a ſpite ſince the firſt meeting) you are not ſo juſt as you imagine your ſelf, for I can put very ſmall difference between him that can with delight hearken unto detraction, and her who doth detract; and therefore ſince Meliantes made choice of Alcianipe's company, you do him too great a favour to ſay he is the freeſt from detraction of any man alive; for had he been a hater of it, he would have changed place, and betook himſelf unto better company than hers he applied himſelf unto.

Perhaps (replyed Meliantes and ſmiled) the fair Cleonide will repent of the wrong ſhe does me, when ſhe knows me a little better; and in the mean time, I muſt tell her, that it was chance only, that brought me unto that place, where I met Alcianipe; and my curioſity to know, whether all the reports of her were true, made me hold diſcourſe with her. However, (replyed Aſtidamus) I beſeech you tell us, how you found her? Though to ſay, that Alcianipe was a little free in telling me her thoughts of every thing, does not imply that ſhe is detractive (replyed Meliantes) yet I muſt not tell what ſhe ſaid; but I had rather commend what the fair Arpaſia hath ſaid, than to blame Alcianipe for what ſhe ſaid: And the wiſh which the fair Arpaſia made is altogether juſt; for fortune is moſt injurious in indiſſolvably linking the intereſts of perſons who are of an oppoſite humour together, and forcing them to live miſcelaniouſly together, when they may find others, who are more ſutable to their humour. I am confident (added Arpaſia,) that there is no Town in the World where ſuch an equal partition may not be made, and where every one may pleaſe himſelf in his own Quarters, without going unto others. Where on the contrary, as things are diſpoſed, there are few men who are not weary of what they are obliged to do, and of the perſons whom they are obliged to ſee; ſo it would be better if every one might pleaſe themſelves. 'Tis true, replyed Aſtidamus, it were very well if it could be ſo, and if it could, I believe few would ſtay in the place where they are. I believe (ſaid one of the Ladies in the company) there would be a change in moſt of the barges upon the Lake.

Truly, I am ſo little worthy to be where I am, (replyed Meliantes moſt modeſtly) that I ſhould fear a baniſhment. Indeed you have talked with Alcianipe ſo long, (replyed Arpaſia, and ſmiled) that you do almoſt deſerve it: But ſince, I am perſwaded you talked with her, only to convert her from ſpeaking ill of others, I aſſure you by my conſent you ſhould not change your place. For my part, (ſaid Aſtidamus, not ſo much as looking upon Arpaſia) I am ſo well where I am, that rather than paſs into another, I would throw my ſelf into the Lake. That teſtimony of affection which you expreſs unto the company (replyed Cleonide, and both ſmiled and bluſh'd) is not ſo great as perhaps the fair Arpaſia imagines; for ſince iron will not ſink if it be thrown into this Lake, you would not be in any danger of drowning, if you ſhould throw in your ſelf: And therefore to render the teſtimony of your eſteem more valuable, you ſhould ſay that you would throw your ſelf into the River which hath not that wonderful virtue that makes the Lake ſo famous. The Lake is ſo near the River (replyed Aſtidamus, and laughed) that you need not quarrel with me about it, unleſs you would have me underſtand by it, that I ſhould go out of the Barge, if Arpaſia's wiſh ſhould come to paſs, and yet (added he, upon ſecond thoughts) I am perſwaded, that if all the good were with the good, all the wicked with the wicked, all fools with fools, and all wits with wits, the World would not be ſo pleaſing as it is; for that univerſal miſcellany of ſo many different humours in it, is a great part of its beauty. I aſſure you, replyed Arpaſia, that if diverſity of men do make the beauty of the World, I am ſure its beauty is oft-times a puniſhment unto all men of accompliſhments: For there can be no greater torment than to be always with perſons whom they eſteem not, and yet as things are ordered, half of our lives are ſpent amongſt the people whom we wiſh we never ſaw. I muſt confeſs (replyed Aſtidamus) that we are not always where we would be, and at this very hour, if a change were permitted to be made amongſt all the Barges which are upon the Lake, that which hath already been ſaid, would be found to be true. But I beſeech you, (replyed Cleonide) who do you imagine would change their places? After this, Aſtidamus anſwering only to ſatisfie his curioſity, he went from Barge to Barge to ſee who were in them; ſo as viſiting all the reſt, they were all highly pleaſed, that the perſons might divide themſelves according to their fancies. But ſince Aſtidamus, Cleonide, and the Alſenian Ladies did beſt know the ſtories of their Town, they were to appoint who was to ſhift into this Barge, and who into that; ſo as changing all the order of the company in general, there was ſcarcely one in all the company who had not their places aſſigned them but only Alcianipe: Arpaſia obſerving this, earneſtly beſeeched Cleonide, not to place her in her Barge. For I do proteſt, ſaid ſhe, I do ſo abhor detracting perſons, that if you ſhould bring her hither, I ſhould rather wiſh my ſelf in the bottom of the Lake, than in her company. I had rather ten millions ſuch as ſhe were thrown into the River Tigris, (replyed Meliantes) than that you ſhould expoſe your ſelf into the Lake: Truly (added ſhe) ſcandalizing people are worthy of the worſt puniſhments: And of all Detractors, a woman is moſt odious; I could endure it with more patience from the mouth of a man than from a woman. For as there are ſome virtues more neceſſary in a woman than in a man, ſo there are ſome vices more tollerable in men than in women: For one cannot ſcandal, but one muſt lye, and one cannot lye, but one muſt be inſolent and bold, which is a quality moſt unbecoming a woman: Men are permitted to be bold, and therefore more allowable to ſcandal than women, who if they will keep within the limits of modeſty, ought never to act any virtue with too much boldneſs, and therefore I muſt conclude a woman ſlanderer to be a monſter; and that ſhe who will wound the reputation of another, cares not for her own, but may well be ſuſpected of all the crimes which ſhe falſely brands upon others. I ſee, (ſaid Aſtidamus) that we cannot all tell what to do with the poor Alcianipe, but that we muſt leave her in ſome Barge by her ſelf: It had been well, anſwered Arpaſia, if we had left her at her own houſe; but the worſt is, almoſt all the world takes more delight in hearing others ſlandered, than in hearing them commended.

As Arpaſia ſaid ſo, ſhe did not only ſee the Barge where Alcianipe was coming near hers, but underſtood that the Lady beſeeched her leave to ſpeak a word or two with Meliantes, ſo that as much as ſhe hated her for her ſlandring, yet ſince ſhe could not be uncivil before ſo much company, ſhe could not deny her: but conſented ſo coldly, as made it apparent ſhe was diſpleaſed.

In the mean time, Meliantes was pitifully nonpluſt; yet ſince he could not deny ſpeaking unto a Perſon of her quality, and ſince his promiſe ingaged him, he leaned towards the Barge where Alcianipe was, who leaning alſo towards him, told him in his ear, that ſince he left her, ſhe had learned ſome things which did oblige her to promiſe him the ſecond time to diſcover the buſineſs within theſe eight days, whereof ſhe told him ſhe had ſome ſuſpicion. Meliantes could not chuſe but thank her, and beſeech her not to fail of her word, and he ſpake ſo loud, that Arpaſia

Arpaſia heard, and could not chuſe but chide him, as ſoon as Alcianipe's Barge was parted from her. On the other ſide, Aſtidamus, who underſtood better than any what they ſaid, hearing that Alcianipe had promiſed Meliantes to diſcover a buſineſs unto him, he told Arpaſia of it, little thinking that he himſelf was concerned in it. After this, they began unanimouſly to importune him to tell what it was which Alcianipe had promiſed to him. Whatſoever ſhe ſaid (replied he, and ſmiled) it was a ſecret of no great importance, yet I ſhould not tell it in the preſence of ſeven or eight perſons at once. Then chuſe one amongſt all the company (replied Arpaſia) unto whom you may impart the buſineſs you have with ſuch a dangerous perſon, and ſo juſtifie your ſelf.

If it be ſo that ſhe keep promiſe with me (anſwered he) perhaps I ſhall be as deſirous to tell you, as you are deſirous to know it. The company is not extreamly beholding to you, replied Cleonide, ſince you do not think one in it worthy to be truſted with a ſecret which cannot be of any great importance, ſince Alcianipe is a partner in it with you. Since the barge came to land, juſt as Cleonide had ſpoken, Meliantes returned her a ſhort anſwer of civility, and preſented his hand to conduct her to her Coach; for Aſtidamus being obliged to wait upon Arpaſia, reaſon did bind him to ſubmit, and help Cleonide, who knew not that he was her Brother. But, Madam, not to trouble you with trifles, let me only tell you, Meliantes grew into ſuch favour with Arpaſia, that at laſt ſhe told him of her averſion to Aſtidamus, and complained unto him of his behaviour towards her; yet ſhe told me ſince, that ſhe would not have done ſo, had ſhe not perceived that he had diſcovered the thoughts of her ſoul; ſo as conceiving it better to truſt him with a ſecret, and ſo oblige him, ſhe did impart it to him. And chance did ſomething contribute unto this confidence, for Meliantes talking a whole afternoon with her, a hundred odd diſcourſes paſſed between them, which they never thought on at the beginning. Yet Meliantes mentioned not the leaſt hint which might move her to ſuſpect he was in love with her; but he uſed his beſt Rhetorick to purchaſe her eſteem and amity; for he did moſt ingenuouſly inſinuate into all her thoughts, and pitied her in ſuch an obliging manner, that ſhe did not conceal the leaſt thought of her heart from him.

In the mean time, Phormion ſeeing the love of Meliantes to increaſe every minute, he endeavoured to bring Argeliſe into his thoughts, purpoſely to take him off from Arpaſia, but all his endeavours were fruitleſs: For Arpaſia's averſion to Aſtidamus, and her confidence in him, did ſo flatter his paſſion, that though he had no reaſonable hopes, yet he thought it injurious to reſiſt his paſſion. Again, the promiſe of Alcianipe coming into his memory, he went unto her the laſt of the eight days, which ſhe perfixed, yet he could not then be ſatisfied in what he deſired to know, though he underſtood enough to augment Arpaſia's hatred of Aſtidamus: For Alcianipe told him of an infallible certainty, that Aſtidamus had long ſince contracted his affection with a Lady of Quality; and moreover, that ſhe knew he had promiſed her, never to marry Arpaſia, aſſuring him, that within the compaſs of four days at furtheſt, ſhe ſhould be able to tell him her name. You may imagine, Madam, how welcome this news was unto Meliantes; yet ſince he knew Alcianipe to be a moſt horrible back-biter, he feared extreamly, leſt all this ſhould not be true.

But ſince one is apt to believe any thing which flatters a violent paſſion, he did verily believe that Aſtidamus was in love with ſome other beſides Arpaſia; and the rather, becauſe he ſaw no reaſon in the earth, why he ſhould behave himſelf as he did, with that moſt admirable Lady: So as conjuring Alcianipe moſt earneſtly to find out the name of her with whom Aſtidamus held ſuch private correſpondency, ſhe promiſed him to ſatisfie his deſire.

In the mean time, Meliantes being come from her houſe unto Arpaſia's, he underſtood that Aſtidamus had not been there all that day, nor the night before: So that he began to accuſe him of moſt horrible injuſtice, for applying himſelf with no more aſſiduity unto her.

For my part (replied Arpaſia) his preſence doth ſo little pleaſe me, that if I were not condemned to live all my life with him, I ſhould be very glad never to ſee him again. But ſince I muſt marry him, 'tis very ſtrange he ſhould behave himſelf towards me as he doth. 'Tis a great misfortune not to love one whom one is to marry, but it is a greater to be ſlighted and ſcorned by ſuch a one: Did Aſtidamus love me, and I not love him again, I ſhould think that my averſion might in time wear away, but both hating him, and being hated, what likelyhood is there I ſhould overcome my hatred? For nothing in the world is more natural than not to love thoſe who love not us, eſpecially when they do not ſeem amiable.

Meliantes ſeeing her in this mind, would needs perſwade her to acquaint Gabrias with her averſion to Aſtidamus, and to intreat him not to oblige her to marry him; but ſhe told him again, that ſince her Father made that march only to confirm the treaty with Protogenes, purpoſely to be revenged upon the King of Aſſyria, it was not probable he would break it off upon a bare averſion, having no other ground but that Aſtidamus does not expreſs any affection. But, Madam, (ſaid he, being tranſported by his paſſion) if you did know that Aſtidamus was far in love with another, and did promiſe her every day never to marry you, would you not let Gabrias know it alſo? Doubtleſs I ſhould, replied Arpaſia; but what probability is there, that Aſtidamus ſhould let his Uncle ſend to the King of Aſſyria, if he did not intend to go on with the marriage? Since they ſend only to that Prince, rather to amuſe him, than to ask his leave, ſaid Meliantes, Aſtidamus ſtidamus cares not for it. And ſince he can be ſo unjuſt as not to love you, but to love another, it is not ſtrange if he be as irregular in point of Prudence, as in point of Love. But I beſeech you, Sir (ſaid Arpaſia to him) what moves you to ſpeak thus? is this the ſecret buſineſs which Alcianipe promiſed you to diſcover? For Heavens ſake, Meliantes, I conjure you by our amity to conceal nothing from me that may be prejudicial unto Aſtidamus. This conjuration is ſo prevalent, Madam, replied he, that I cannot withſtand it: and then he began ingenuouſly to tell her all that Alcianipe told him, and what ſhe had further promiſed to tell him. Alas, alas, Meliantes, ſaid ſhe, ſince Alcianipe doth not more particularize things, nor tell the name of her unto whom ſhe ſaith Aſtidamus hath promiſed never to marry me, I cannot put my Father out of conceit with him, and Alcianipe hath ſuch a reputation for lying, that what ſhe ſaith will never perſwade Gabrias unto what I deſire. Not but that I do verily believe Aſtidamus is deeply in love with ſome, or other, who is in Alfenes; for when I firſt ſaw him, he did not behave himſelf as now he doth to me; and therefore I conclude, that it is the preſence of this perſon, who e're ſhe be, that obliges him unto it: But however it be (added ſhe) we muſt endeavour to know more, and therefore though I do extreamly hate Alcianipe, yet I deſire you to continue ſeeing her, and oblige her to tell you the name of this pretended Miſtreſs unto Aſtidamus, for when we know it, perhaps we ſhall diſcover all the reſt without Alcianipe.

Meliantes raviſhed to hear Arpaſia ſpeak thus, did moſt willingly promiſe what ſhe deſired, and waited with abundance of impatience for the day which Alcianipe appointed to tell him the name of her, whom Aſtidamus loved.

Since I was very intimate with Arpaſia, I was not ignorant of the confidence which ſhe put in Meliantes, and he knew alſo, what thoughts ſhe had of me; ſo as when we and opportunity met together, we diſcourſed of all that related unto this moſt admirable Lady: We endeavoured to gueſs who it could be, that Aſtidamus ſhould prefer before her; but all our conjectures were ſo wide of the mark, that we could not ground any reaſonable ſuſpicion of the perſon. But at laſt, the day which Alcianipe had aſſigned being come, he went to challenge her promiſe, but could not meet with her: yet at her going out, ſhe left order to tell him that ſhe was gone unto Cleonide's Aunt, and that ſhe referred it to his choice, whether he would come unto her, or ſtay till ſhe returned, which would be very ſhortly. Though Meliantes did not fear being known by his Aunt, or his Siſter, with whom Alcianipe was, yet he would not go thither, but choſe rather to ſtay till ſhe returned, conceiving that if he made that viſit, it would be longer before he could be ſatisfied in what he ſo much deſired to know; ſo as he going into a Garden which belonged unto the houſe of that Lady, he walked there in a longing expectation of her return: But when he ſaw Alcianipe return with a blith and merry countenance, he doubted not but that his curioſity would receive a full ſatisfaction.

Well, Madam, (ſaid he, as ſoon as he ſaw her) do you know the name of that fair one, who has ſo much power as to make Aſtidamus unjuſt unto the moſt admirable Arpaſia? I know it ſo well, Sir, replied ſhe, that none can know any thing more certain; but my greateſt wonder is, that we ſhould no ſooner diſcover the intrigue of the buſineſs: for the very name of Cleonide, was no ſooner mentioned, but a hundred paſſages which I had ſeen did come ſo freſh into my memory, that I was ſure there was a moſt intimate correſpondency between Aſtidamus and her. How! Madam, (ſaid Meliantes, much amazed to hear the name of his Siſter) is it Cleonide, with whom Aſtidamus holds a correſpondency of Gallantry? Yes, (replied ſhe) and I no ſooner heard it was ſhe whom he loved, but I went to her, purpoſely to obſerve her countenance very exactly aſtly in talking of Aſtidamus: And her Aunt not being preſent, I had ſo much diſcourſe with her, as hath fully ſatisfied me of the truth; for I made her bluſh a hundred times in talking of Arpaſia, and I am ſure ſhe is not only in love, but ſhe is jealous alſo: And ſhe has not ſo much confidence in the promiſes of Aſtidamus, as ſhe has fears, leſt the beauty of Arpaſia ſhould make him inconſtant; or at leaſt, though he ſhould not be unfaithful, yet his reſpects unto Protogenes will oblige him to obedience.

But I beſeech you, Alcianipe (replied Meliantes) are you ſure that it is Cleonide, with whom Aſtidamus holds correſpondency? for I have heard ſay, that ſhe is a very ſolitary Perſon; and I perceive ſhe rather flies the world than courts it: 'Tis true (replied ſhe) that Cleonide ſhuns all company; but her reaſon for it is, to remove all cauſe of jealouſie from Aſtidamus: Moreover, it is not a new taken up affection; for he was in love with her before e're he ſaw Arpaſia. And yet his heart was ſomething moved with her beauty the firſt time he ſaw her; but as ſoon as he was out of her ſight, and returned to Cleonide, this vapour of love vaniſhed, and his firſt to Cleonide became more violent; and he told Cleonide when he returned, that Arpaſia's beauty had charmed his eyes, but not his heart; or if ſhe had, one favourable look from her would have diſſolved the inchantment. How is it poſſible, replied Meliantes, you ſhould come to know all theſe particular circumſtances? Nay, I know more yet (added ſhe) for I know that it is at the houſe of one of her friends, where ſhe meets with Aſtidamus, and ſhe meets him at ſuch hours, as they cannot be interrupted, becauſe commonly it is late. But, Madam, replied Meliantes, Cleonide paſſeth for a perſon of Virtue, and Honour. As for Virtue, Sir, replied Alcianipe, I believe ſhe is the owner of it, and though not naturally, yet out of prudence; ſhe knows Aſtidamus ſo well, that ſhe perceives to be auſtere is the only way to be loved long. For my part (replyed Meliantes) I muſt give a more noble motive unto the virtue of Cleonide, and believe, that though Aſtidamus were not of that humour, yet ſhe would carry her ſelf towards him as ſhe doth. However it be (ſaid Alcianipe) Cleonide cannot be accuſed for managing the affection of Aſtidamus; for as I ſaid before, ſhe meets him every evening at her friend's houſe. I muſt confeſs, replyed Meliantes, I cannot well comprehend how this can be. You will better comprehend it, Sir (anſwered Alcianipe) when I have told you that her Aunt's garden and her friend's are cloſe together, that there is a door out of the one into the other; that her friend is a Widow, and that her Aunt, ſuſpecting nothing of the league between Aſtidamus and her Neece, permits her to walk every evening with her friend, and never thinks much, though it be late before ſhe return. Thus Aſtidamus, ſees her when he pleaſeth: And that he may ſee her unſeen or unknown, he goes through the houſe of one of his friends who lives in another ſtreet, and who hath a back door oppoſite to that garden door of Cleonide's friend, Aſtidamus his ſervants ſtand waiting at the fore-door of his friend, with whom people think he is, ſo that there is almoſt none but his confident and her confident, who know any thing of the buſineſs. Then it muſt of neceſſity be, (replyed Meliantes) that one of theſe confidents have betrayed their truſt, ſince you do know it: No (ſaid ſhe) but it is a maid whom Cleonide's friend turned out of her ſervice, which maid is Siſter unto another, who ſerves me, it is ſhe who knows all the paſſages, not only out of her own knowledge and ſight, but alſo by another maid ſervant unto Cleonide, who told her all theſe Circumſtances. And yet I aſſure you that Cleonide did what ſhe could to hinder her friend from turning away her maid, leſt ſhe ſhould tell tales, but ſhe would not be perſwaded: And certainly (added Alcianipe) they expoſe themſelves to much danger, who truſt their ſervants with their buſineſs of gallantry; for when ſuch perſons know any ſecret of that nature, their Miſtreſſes are their ſlaves: And I know Cleonide ſtands in a ſtrange awe of her ſervant, becauſe ſhe knows of her affection; ſo that it muſt be concluded, ſhe loves either her honour, or Aſtidamus very well, ſince that ſhe dares not turn her away: However, her friend, wanting her patience, and not being ſo much interreſted as ſhe was, ſhe diſcharged her maid, from whoſe mouth I know all this that I tell you.

Perhaps (replyed Meliantes) ſhe added more than is true. No, no, (replyed Alcianipe, after her detracting manner) I know ſhe hath not told me all: And that there is yet much more behind; yet ſhe told me, that ſhe is full well perſwaded that Aſtidamus, though he do love Cleonide, and not Arpaſia, yet he will deceive the firſt of theſe, and marry the ſecond, becauſe he dare not diſobey Protogenes, from whom he expects all his fortunes, ſo as it may be thought, he will deceive both and himſelf too.

After this, Meliantes ſeeing he could get no more out of Alcianipe, he left her, after many deſires not to publiſh what ſhe knew, pretending that his deſign was not to prejudice Aſtidamus, but indeed his reaſon was, leſt the reputation of his Siſter ſhould be ſtained. As ſoon as he quitted Alcianipe, he met Phormion, whom he found ſo ſad and unquiet that he was ſure ſomething troubled his mind.

Meliantes then was in a great perplexity, for on the one ſide he was much joyed to ſee that he was able to prejudice Aſtidamus, but on the other ſide, he was very ſorry to know of the League between his ſiſter and him: A reſentment of love, and a reſentment of honour did ſo divide his ſoul, that he was not able to reconcile ſo great a difference by himſelf, and therefore he reſolved to impart his grief unto his friend, who already knew all the ſecrets of his life. So that after Phormion had asked him how he did, they ſate down together in a place fit for diſcourſe, and then he told him all he knew; and afterwards told him, how not foreſeeing how this Lady, whom Alcianipe ſaid was Miſtreſs unto Aſtidamus, could be his Siſter, he had ingaged himſelf unto Arpaſia, to acquaint her with her name, as ſoon as Alcianipe had informed him. Unto what a ſtrange dilemma am I driven, ſaid he, for to prejudice Aſtidamus, I muſt tell Arpaſia that he hath promiſed Cleonide, never to marry Arpaſia: And to ſalve up the reputation of my Siſter, it is fit I ſhould conceal the Gallantry of Aſtidamus to her: However, to argue rationally, though honour forbids me to break off the marriage of Aſtidamus with Arpaſia, yet doubtleſs I ought to acquaint her with all paſſages, purpoſely to oblige her not to marry him, and to force him to marry Cleonide. But by what right, replied Phormion, can you force him to marry Cleonide, ſince you have had as great a correſpondency with his Siſter as he hath with yours? Ah! Phormion (ſaid Meliantes) there is a great difference between Aſtidamus and me; for he loves Cleonide, and I do only eſteem Argeliſe, and therefore it is much more obligation for him than for me to keep promiſes; than for me, I ſay, who am ſo deeply in love with Arpaſia, and that I am not able to anſwer the affection of Argeliſe; and yet to ſpeak truly, I know, that if Aſtidamus was acquainted with all paſſages at Samoſates, he had almoſt as good reaſon to complain againſt the correſpondency which I held with his Siſter, as I have againſt him for holding correſpondency with mine: I know alſo that it becomes me not to publiſh the gallantry of a Perſon who is ſo nearly allied to me; but I know withal, that loving Arpaſia as I do, I muſt conſider the ſatisfaction of my love; and without any reſpects of Juſtice, Honour, Intereſt of a Siſter, or Argeliſe, I muſt reſolve to act according to the dictates of my love; and therefore, my dear Phormion, I muſt acquaint Arpaſia with the love of Aſtidamus to Cleonide, and alſo tell her ſhe is my Siſter, as the greater er teſtimony of my affection, and the more to oblige her unto ſecrecy. Then I ſee (ſaid Phormion) that you are reſolved to acquaint her with your quality; and more than that (replied he haſtily) for I am reſolved to acquaint her with my love: Truth is, I know not well whether I can or no; for I am ſo full of fears to offend her, and oblige her to change her way of living with me, that I cannot tell whether I have power to tell her. For my part (replied Phormion) I ſhould think it better to ſtay, until her marriage with Aſtidamus was quite broken off: ſhould I follow your advice (replied Meliantes) ſhe would think I croſſed the deſigns of Aſtidamus, only as the Brother of Cleonide, and not in any conſideration of her intereſt. Were it my caſe as 'tis yours (replied Phormion) I would not yet mention any thing unto Arpaſia; but ſhould conceal both my being her Lover, and Cleonide's Brother: So that thinking you to be only her friend, ſhe will give more credit to your words; and not thinking you to be the Brother of Cleonide, ſhe will not imagine you have any concernment but her own in the buſineſs.

Meliantes finding the advice of Phormion to be very rational, he reſolved to follow it. This being reſolved upon, Meliantes went unto Arpaſia, with intentions to acquaint her with the affection of Aſtidamus to Cleonide, yet intending to conceal what might be diſadvantageous to himſelf, and to ſpeak more of the affection of Aſtidamus to Cleonide, than hers to him. Yet he could not ſpeak in private with her, ſo ſoon as he hoped, becauſe he found both this unfaithful Lover, and his Siſter there.

As ſoon as they were ſet down, Aſtidamus told Cleonide in a low voice, that he had received a Letter from a friend of his at Samoſates, which let him underſtand, that e're long be ſhe would know her dear brother, whom ſhe ſo much deſired to know. Arpaſia hearing what Aſtidamus ſaid, ſhe began to ſpeak, and addreſſing her words unto Cleonide, though I think (ſaid ſhe) that Aſtidamus did intend that you only, Madam, ſhould hear him, yet I beſeech you, give me leave to intrude into your diſcourſe, and ask, how it comes to paſs you ſhould have a Brother whom you know not.

Since I was not above three years of age, Madam, replied ſhe, when I left the Province where I was born, to come and live with my Aunt at Alfenes; and ſince I never ſaw my Brother, but at that age, I may very well ſay I know him not; for certainly he is much altered ſince that time, and though Clidaris was very like me, yet I believe I ſhould not know him: Yet by his Letters, I ſhould know him very well, for I have received many Letters from him, yet for all that I ſhould not know his face if I ſhould meet him. If he be ſuch a man as my friend deſcribes him, replied Aſtidamus, you have reaſon to deſire the ſight of him; for his Letter tells me, that he is one of the moſt handſomeſt men, and beſt wits in the world: It tells me alſo, that he is very kind with one of my Siſters, who dwells in that place, and ſpeaks ſo highly in his commendations, that I am already his friend before I ſee him. You may imagine, Madam, how Meliantes was non-pluſt, when he heard himſelf thus talked of in his own preſence; yet he was afraid, leſt he ſhould render himſelf ſuſpect, if he ſhould put in near a word; and therefore he asked Aſtidamus very confidently when Cleonide's Brother would come thither? I cannot tell you, replied he, for the Letter bears no date.

For my part (replied Cleonide) I wiſh that none had writ ſo much in his commendations; for commonly high commendations raiſe high expectations, and the perſon muſt be highly meritorious, that can anſwer them.

It is ſo very likely that the fair Cleonide hath a moſt deſerving man to her brother (replied Arpaſia very obligingly) that I have a great diſpoſition already to eſteem him whenſoever he comes. Your expreſſion, Madam, replied ſhe, is infinitely obliging, but to know whether I may in reaſon believe what is writ concerning my Brother, I muſt ask whether he, who gives this Character of my Brother, be a competent Judge of true merit? Or whether he be not one of thoſe common commenders, who uſe to make no difference between perſons of inferiour parts, and perſons of extraordinary merits? No, no, (replyed Aſtidamus) I know him who writ the Letter and gives this Character of Clidaris, and therefore I dare anſwer for him; for if my friend have any fault, it is in being too niggardly in his commendations, and in his eſteeming over few perſons, and therefore I am moſt confident that Clidaris is a moſt excellent man, and has a million of moſt admirable parts, ſince my friend commends him: For he who writ this Letter is ſo curious to be pleaſed, that there are ſcarce four men in the Province where he lives, who are ſufficiently accompliſhed for his pallat, and to define him in few words, he is one of thoſe nice and delicate men, who uſe to anatomiſe the hearts and ſpirits of any before he will commend them, who examines all the words and actions of thoſe he ſees, and who will ſee into their very thoughts before he will ſpeak either good or bad of them. Judge then, whether I have not reaſon to be confident, that Clidaris is worthy to be Cleonide's Brother?

After this, Aſtidamus according to his cuſtom turned the talk, of which Meliantes was very glad, and was very frolick in diſcourſe; yet what ſoever he ſaid, ſtill he was nothing at all appliant unto Arpaſia.

Preſently after, Cleonide going away, Aſtidamus went alſo. So that Meliantes remaining alone with Arpaſia, ſhe looked upon him very ſeriouſly; for reflecting upon what Aſtidamus had ſaid concerning the Brother of Cleonide, ſhe imagined (conſidering the place where ſhe met him, and his deſires to conceal his country) that Meliantes might be he; and the rather, becauſe the Character which was given of Cleonide's Brother, did fit him.

Yet not deſiring to make her ſuſpition appear until further certainty, ſhe rouſed her ſelf out of her ſerious ſtudy, juſt as Meliantes intended to interrupt her, to tell her what he had underſtood from Alcianipe, and beginning to ſpeak: Conſidering the ſtate of things, I am very ſorry, Madam, (ſaid he unto her) that I cannot ſpeak as well of Aſtidamus, as they have written unto him concerning Cleonide's brother; But, Madam, the fidelity I have vowed unto you, and the zeal that I have unto your ſervice, forces me to tell you that I do know the name of her whom Aſtidamus hath long loved, and unto whom he hath promiſed never to marry you: I wiſh with all my heart (replyed ſhe) that he would keep his promiſe. But Meliantes (added ſhe) who is ſhe that hath ſo captivated the heart of Aſtidamus? It is Cleonide, Madam, (replyed he) and I know ſuch Circumſtances of his affection to her, that I muſt needs ſay he is infinitely to blame to be ſo engaged as he is; How (cryed out Arpaſia) is it Cleonide, with whom Aſtidamus holds intelligence? Yes, Madam, (anſwered he) it is Cleonide; and Alcianipe hath ſo particularized things unto me, that I cannot make the leaſt doubt of the truth.

Alcianipe is ſo ſcandalous (replyed ſhe) that there is no great heed to be taken unto what ſhe ſaith: But ſince I know how to diſcern truth from lies (replyed he) I dare aſſure you, Madam, that Aſtidamus doth love Cleonide.

After this, Arpaſia was a while mute: And reflecting upon her former ſuſpitions, they all vaniſht, and ſhe thought no more that Meliantes was Brother unto Cleonide, ſince he told her of the intelligence which ſhe had with Aſtidamus. Afterwards calling to memory a hundred paſſages which formerly ſhe took no notice of, ſhe found, that indeed there was good cauſe to think that Aſtidamus loved Cleonide: But maugre her averſion to him, ſhe could not chuſe but bear him a kind of ſpight for loving that fair one: Yet her ſlight reſentment of it quickly vaniſht, and in a moment after ter ſhe was extreamly joyed, in hopes that this love of Aſtidamus, would break off her Marriage: and ſhe gave ſo many teſtimonies of it unto Meliantes, that he was fully ſatisfied. Yet notwithſtanding, ſince ſhe was reſolved to ſtay until Aſtidamus did himſelf break off, becauſe ſhe was afraid to anger her Father, Meliantes was forced to tell her that though Aſtidamus did dearly love Cleonide, and had promiſed her to break off his Marriage for her ſake; yet becauſe all his fortunes did depend upon Protogenes, and becauſe he was afraid to loſe them by loſing his favour, he was reſolved to Marry her, and to deceive Cleonide. How, (ſaid Arpaſia then) does Aſtidamus intend to marry me, and not to love me? And to love Cleonide, and not marry her? Oh Meliantes, I am not able to endure this double treachery: And ſince I ſhould be more miſerable in marrying a man, who neither loves me, nor I him, than Cleonide would be, in not marrying a man who both loves her, and ſhe him, it is my office to prevent ſuch a misfortune: For truly, though I had no averſion to him, yet his very infidelity to Cleonide is enough to hinder me from marrying him: Therefore I beſeech you, Meliantes, help me out of this extream ſtrait, and endeavour to get ſuch convincing proofs of the promiſes which this Impoſtor hath made unto Cleonide, that I may ſhew them unto my Father, and afterwards declare unto him, that I never will marry Aſtidamus.

Meliantes hearing what Arpaſia ſaid, began to ſtudy upon it, and to imagine how he might give her ſatisfaction: After which, he deſired ſome days of conſideration, conjuring her in the interim not to ſpeak a ſyllable of what he had told her, for fear (ſaid he) that if Protogenes ſhould hear of Aſtidamus his love, he ſhould haſten his Marriage with her.

Thus Meliantes gloſſing the reputation of his Siſter with a plauſible pretence, he beſtowed a thouſand obliging and tender expreſſions upon Arpaſia: who conceiving her ſelf infinitely beholding unto him, began to preſs him a little more earneſtly to tell him who he was. I beſeech you Meliantes (ſaid ſhe) what injuſtice is it, that you ſhould know all the ſecrets of my very ſoul, and that I ſhould not know ſo much as the Country which gave you a birth? When, Madam, I have done you any conſiderable ſervice (replyed he) I promiſe you to tell you who I am: And to ſet a more certain limit of time unto your ſatisfaction, I promiſe to tell you whatſoever you ſhall deſire to know of me, upon the day that your Marriage with Aſtidamus ſhall be broken off. But in the interim, Madam (added he, being tranſported by the violence of his paſſion) I beſeech you honour me ſo far as to believe, that my birth is ſuch, as that I am not altogether unworthy to be ranked in the number of your friends; And if Aſtidamus had ſuch thoughts in his heart as I have, he had never loved Cleonide. Though this expreſſion was a kind of declaration of Love, yet Arpaſia did not take it in that ſenſe, but believed that he ſaid ſo only to expreſs his eſteem, ſo that ſhe anſwered him very civilly: At firſt, he was angry ſhe did not underſtand him; but in a moment after, he was glad of it: So that after ſeveral obliging expreſſions on both ſides, they parted. But, Madam, whilſt theſe things paſſed thus, Protogenes having obſerved, that Aſtidamus did not behave himſelf towards Arpaſia as he ought, he ſpake very ſharply unto him, and charged him to carry himſelf better, and to prepare himſelf to marry her very ſhortly: For (ſaid he) whether the King of Aſſyria conſent or not conſent, you ſhall marry her. Aſtidamus who had ſpirit enough, and was really reſolved to betray Cleonide, and marry Arpaſia, told Protogenes very confidently, that he did not think he was obliged to live with one whom he was to marry in that way of Gallantry, as if he Courted one whom he knew not whether he ſhould marry her or not: But be aſſured, Sir, (ſaid he) that I ſhall obey you when you pleaſe. But, Madam, be pleaſed to know, that a Servant unto Protogenes who was acquainted with Alcianipe, having heard this Conference, he told it unto her, and ſhe made it known unto Meliantes, who was extreamly perplexed at it. Was ever miſery equal unto mine? (ſaid he unto Phormion, who ſince told it unto me) For all other Lovers are commonly miſerable, either becauſe they are hated, or becauſe they have Rivals loved: And yet moſt certain it is, Arpaſia doth eſteem me, and I have no Rival: And he who pretends to marry her without a dram of Love, is hated: And yet for all this, I am the moſt miſerable of men, ſince I am like to ſee the man whom I do hate, enjoy the perſon whom I do love, and to betray and forſake my Siſter: So that by this means he will blaſt both my love and my honour, if I do not give a check unto his deſigns: And yet it is not an eaſie matter to effect: For Aſtidamus will obey Protogenes; Protogenes will have him to marry Arpaſia: And Gabrias deſires it as much as he, unleſs I do let him ſee the treachery of Aſtidamus towards Cleonide, and Arpaſia.

But ſhall I my ſelf publiſh the intelligence which he holds with my Siſter, before I am ſure I can oblige him to marry her? And can I have the confidence to quarrel with him for caſting off my Siſter, when as I did the like to his? Truth is, I am not ſo inconſtant as he is, becauſe I loved her leſs; but this excuſe is not ſufficient to excuſe me.

What ſhall I do, my dear Phormion? (ſaid he unto him) Truly (replyed his friend) I am as much to ſeek for advice as your ſelf: But the beſt Counſel I can give, is, to overcome your paſſion, as Aſtidamus hath his. For he is in Love with Cleonide, yet is reſolved to marry another: Therefore I pray, Sir, call Argeliſe into your memory and heart, and quit Arpaſia, as he hath Cleonide.

As for the intereſt of Cleonide, unleſs you knew how to force Aſtidamus to marry her, it were better to ſmother all reports of her intelligence with him, than to divulge it. But that cannot be, (replyed Meliantes) ſince I had never known of it but by Alcianipe, who never knows any thing that may wound anothers reputation, but ſhe tells it to a hundred ſeveral perſons; and I am told, that if ſhe do know of any ſuch buſineſs, if company come not in quickly unto whom ſhe may impart it, ſhe will go out and ſeek them. Alſo I am credibly informed, that if ſhe be ſick, nothing will ſooner cure her, nor make her quit her Bed, than to have ſome ſuch tittle-tattle or other to carry unto ſome whom ſhe thinks it will pleaſe or ſpight; for ſhe tranſacts by ſeveral motives, though all equally ill: And can you think ſhe will not tell all men the ſame ſhe hath told me? Yes yes, Phormion, Alcianipe is ſilent in nothing but in Commendations: Nay perhaps ſhe will draw out an innocent correſpondency to become a great Crime: And to be ſincere with you, though Aſtiadmus did not betray my Siſter, yet ſhould I hate him no leſs than I do, it is enough that he is likely to marry Arpaſia, to make me ruin him if I can. But, Sir, (ſaid Phormion) Arpaſia does not ſo much as know that you do love her. She knows that I do viſit her, and that I admire her (replyed he) and I hope that ere long ſhe will know that I love her, though I never tell her, for my paſſion is too violent to be ſmothered: And ſhe cannot chuſe but ſee it. All I have to do, is to poyſon Aſtidamus, in the opinion of Arpaſia's Father, by acquainting him with his love of Cleonide, and by producing ſuch Circumſtances as ſhall make Aſtidamus appear what he is, to wit, an impoſtor, and perfidious; I perceive by your looks (added he) that you think it ſtrange I ſhould give ſuch terrible names unto Aſtidamus, having an opinion that I do merit them as well as he: But Phormion be not deceived, for if there be any equality in our Crimes, it is not in our proceedings; when I thought my ſelf in love with Argeliſe, it was becauſe I knew not then what love was, but now I know that it was only eſteem and friendſhip which I profeſſed unto her, and if I did quit her, it was, becauſe a moſt violent paſſion forced me unto it, and ſhe is beholding unto me for doing all I could to keep my heart from her; but the caſe is not the ſame with Aſtidamus, for he is deeply in love with Cleonide, and maugre this love he quits her for his intereſt of fortune.

Moreover, he is ſo unjuſt, not only to forſake her, but to betray her by diſſembling his inconſtancy, leſt ſhe ſhould hinder him in his deſign of marrying Arpaſia; but 'tis far otherwiſe with me, for if Argeliſe were here, I ſhould reſent her miſfortunes as my own. Ah Meliantes (ſaid Phormion and interrupted him) you ſay ſo, becauſe Argeliſe is not at Alſenes: For I aſſure you, it is a greater difficulty than you imagine, for any brave man to tell a woman whom once he ſeemed to love, that now he does not love her; and if ſhe were here at this preſent, you would be driven into an extream perplexity. No doubt of it (replyed he,) but that I ſhould be extreamly aſhamed at the ſight of her, yet for all that, rather than betray her, as Aſtidamus doth my Siſter, I would diſcover my weakneſs unto her, I would confeſs my fault, and ask a pardon for it: But ſince I perceive you will not give me any adviſe, I will follow the dictates of my own thoughts. So Meliantes, after he had ſtudied a while, went out, and went to give Cleonide a viſit, with whom he had often been, as well as with all other Ladies of quality in Alſenes. Yet he could not ſpeak with her ſo ſoon as he deſired, becauſe much company was with her Aunt and her, but they being gone all, except one man who ſtayed about ſome buſineſs with the Lady of the houſe, he had all the liberty of talk he could wiſh, and as ſoon as he was alone with Cleonide, he took out one of thoſe Letters which heretofore ſhe had writ unto him, and asked her if ſhe knew the hand: Cleonide took it, and began to read it, little thinking it to be of her own writing, but when ſhe read a line, ſhe knew it to be one which ſhe ſent unto her brother; at firſt, ſhe looked ſeriouſly upon him, but he had an air ſo unreſemblant unto all his family, that not knowing why her brother ſhould conceal himſelf, ſhe did not think her ſelf to be his Siſter, but imagined him to be only ſome friend unto her Brother. I beſeech you, Sir, ſaid ſhe unto him, do you know him unto whom this Letter was written? If you do, pray tell me where he is, and why he gave it unto you? I ſhall ſatisfie you in all your demands (replyed Meliantes) yes, and more, provided you will promiſe me not to ſpeak a ſillable of any thing I ſhall tell you, no not unto Aſtidamus, (added he, and looked earneſtly upon her) At theſe words Cleonide bluſht, and doing ſomething about her head, purpoſely to hide her bluſhes. I do not wonder (ſaid ſhe unto him) that you ſhould deſire me to tell no body what you ſay, but I have reaſon to be offended at you, for particularizing Aſtidamus, and that you ſhould ſpeak of him, as if I could know nothing, but I muſt impart it unto him. All I can do at preſent for your ſatisfaction (replyed Meliantes) is to aſſure you, that when I have told you all I have to ſay, you will ſo clearly ſee, that I have no intentions to offend you, that you will repent your ſuſpition of it. But unjuſt Cleonide, (purſued he) the buſineſs is of ſuch a nature, that you muſt be ſure none come to interrupt us; and to oblige you unto a private conference, I ſwear unto you by all that is ſacred, that you will be the moſt miſerable perſon of all your quality and ſex, if you do not hearken unto me, and poſitively believe all that I ſhall ſay, when you have heard me.

You expreſs your ſelf ſo very ſtrangely, (replyed ſhe) that though you ſhould tell me nothing but ſad ſtories, yet I muſt confeſs my curioſity ſuch, that I cannor chuſe but hear you, and therefore if you pleaſe, we will walk into the Garden, where we ſhall not be interrupted, for I will appoint if any come in, they ſhall be carried into my Aunt's Chamber. With all my heart (replyed Meliantes,) but firſt you muſt promiſe me not to ſpeak a word unto Aſtidamus, of any thing I ſhall tell you: And indeed you muſt promiſe me moſt ſolemnly and ſeriouſly. If I do promiſe you to tell no body (anſwered Cleonide and ſtill bluſhed) I do tacitely imply, that I will not tell Aſtidamus, and therefore why do you inſiſt ſo peremptorily upon ſuch a frivolous ceremony, which in my opinion is an affront put upon me: Nay, nay, never inſiſt upon ſuch niceties, (replyed he) nor ruine your ſelf upon imaginary punctilioes. Cleonide hearing Meliantes ſo plain, ſhe began to be angry in good earneſt, and would not give him audience; but ſince the ſame thing which angred her, did alſo ſwell her with curioſity, ſhe ſurmounted her reſentments, and told Meliantes, that there was never any ſuch League between Aſtidamus and her, and promiſed him never to reveal what he ſhould tell her.

After this, Meliantes took her by the hand, and carried her unto a ſeat in an Arbor; when they were ſet, Cleonide firſt began; well Meliantes (ſaid ſhe) I pray tell me who gave you that Letter which you ſhewed me? Before I give you a direct anſwer (replyed he) I muſt moſt ſeriouſly proteſt unto you, that all I ſhall ſay unto you is as certainly true, as that you are my ſiſter, and that is not more ſure, nor more certain, than that Aſtidamus intends to betray you; at theſe words Cleonide ſtood in amaze, her colour went and came a hundred times: Firſt ſhe looked upon Meliantes, then looked off him with abundance of ſhame.

Sometimes ſhe wiſhed all he ſaid were true, and ſometimes deſired all might be falſe; being vexed to the ſoul ſhe ſhould begin acquaintance with her Brother, by ſuch a ſhameful adventure. But at laſt, to clear her doubts, the names of Meliantes and Clidaris, are ſo unlike (replyed ſhe) that I could not take the one for the other: ſince names are not eſſentially fixed to the bearers, ſaid he, but that they may ſhift them as they pleaſe, your reaſon is not at all convincing, but to come near the ſubſtance of the buſineſs, I will ingage my ſelf to ſhew you all the Letters which ever you writ unto me, and more than that, I will tell you the ſubſtance of all that ever I writ unto you, and to clear my ſelf more manifeſtly unto you, I will write in your preſence what you ſhall pleaſe, that you may compare my writing with thoſe Letters which Clidaris writ unto you, and ſo plainly ſee, that Meliantes and Clidaris are the ſame; without more delay he pull'd out of his pocket both Pen, Ink, and Paper, and began to write ſome lines which he gave unto Cleonide, but ſhe was more amazed than ever, when ſhe found written, that if ſhe would follow his Counſel, ſhe ſhould never marry Aſtidamus: She ſaw enough by the hand, to aſſure her, he was her Brother. But before ſhe could recover out of her wonder, Meliantes told her ſo many particulars concerning her family, as put her out of all doubt; but to clear the matter more fully, ſhe asked him how it could come to paſs, the friend of Aſtidamus ſhould write word that he had ſeen you at Samoſates? Then Meliantes began to relate unto her, his travels into that place, and how it was his fortune to meet Gabrias and Arpaſia. I beſeech you (ſaid Cleonide then) why did you change your name? And why would you not make your ſelf known to me at firſt? Your queſtions (dear Siſter) replyed he, are of ſuch importance, that I muſt not anſwer them until that after you have ingeniouſly confeſſed unto me, that Aſtidamus is in love with you, that he hath promiſed you never to marry Arpaſia, and that you do believe him: Alas, Brother (ſaid ſhe and bluſht,) I am not able to confeſs things of that nature: that you may no longer diſſemble the matter (replyed Meliantes) know, that I am not ignorant in any thing that hath paſſed betwixt you; and to inſtance in ſome, I do know, that you uſe to meet Aſtidamus in a garden of your friends, which joynes unto this in which we are, eſpecially ſince Arpaſia came hither, and that it was there he ſwore a thouſand falſe Oathes unto you: And indeed I know of a moſt infallible certainty, that if you do not follow my counſels, he will marry Arpaſia.

Moreover, to induce you unto an abſolute confidence in me, I will truſt you with the only ſecret of my ſoul and life, and acquaint you, that I am as much concerned in this marriage as you are, for to tell you truly, I am in love with Arpaſia, in love ſo deeply, that if the life of Aſtidamus be dear unto you, you muſt help me to make him faithful unto you, and do as I ſhall direct you to hinder him from marrying her whom I do love and adore: For I do profeſs unto you, that if you do not, you will endanger either to ſee your Brother kill your Lover, or your Lover kill your Brother, think ſeriouſly upon what I ſay, and be confident that you have as great an intereſt as I have in the advice which I ſhall give you. You fill me ſo full of wonder, (replyed Cleonide) that I know not what anſwer to return. The buſineſs is of ſuch a near concernment (replyed he) that you muſt anſwer, and that you may more ſincerely open your ſelf, I deſire you to conſider, that I do not offer to reprove you for your affection to Aſtidamus, for I have a ſtrong confidence in your virtue, and I know experimentally, that love is not a thing voluntary, and I were unjuſt if I ſhould expect more force from you than I have my ſelf; but excuſing your imbecilities, as I expect you ſhould do mine, you muſt ſincerely acquaint me with all the paſſages betwixt Aſtidamus and you, to the end I may force him to fidelity, and keep him from making me miſerable; if you do not, I vow unto the gods, that before you can ſee Aſtidamus, to tell him what I have ſaid unto you, I will ſee him, and tell him ſuch a ſtory, as may become fatal to one of us: And therefore, my deareſt Siſter, I do conjure you by your own honour, and by the affection you have unto Aſtidamus, to prevent both your own and my miſery, and not to deny a thing, which I do know as certainly as you do your ſelf. You preſs me in ſo ſtrange a manner, (replyed Cleonide) that I have not power either to deny or confeſs what you ask; yet you muſt do the laſt of theſe (replyed Meliantes) if you will preſerve your own Honour, and your Lover, and not hinder the happineſs of a Brother, who will be a debtor unto you for all his felicity, if you will but think upon your own.

After this, adding a thouſand tender and obliging conjurations, unto what he had ſaid before, Cleonide confeſſed that Aſtidamus had long loved her, and ſtill told her every day, that he continued the ſame, and after the firſt Ice was broken, ſhe told Meliantes as much as he deſired to know. But as a juſtification of her ſelf ſhe aggravated the Courtſhip and cares, which Aſtidamus had taken to win her heart, and told her Brother, that he had writ Letters unto her every day. Meliantes preſſed her to ſee his Letters, and ſo importunately, that ſhe fearing if ſhe ſhould deny him, he would think them of another nature than they were, and knowing that they would rather juſtifie than accuſe her, ſhe pulled two of them out of her pocket, the one received laſt night, the other in the morning, and gave them unto Meliantes, who opening them, did find in them as much as he could deſire; and if my memory do not much fail me, they were to this effect following.

To the Incredulous Cleonide.

Madam,

W*ILL you not believe me, when I promiſe and proteſt, that I do not love* Arpaſia, and that I love none but you? But it ſeems you are reſolved to be as unjuſt as you are rigorous, in doubting the ſincerity of my words. I beſeech you, be not deluded by fallacious appearances; but be confidently perſwaded, that I will never marry Arpaſia, and that I will eternally love the fair Cleonide.

Aſtidamus.

You may imagine, Madam, that Meliantes was not a little glad he had got this Letter into his hands; and in hopes to find another as pertinent to his purpoſe, he opened it in all haſte, and found theſe words.

To the Unjuſt Cleonide.

MADAM,

I Wonder why you ſhould not, but I am ſure you may believe me when I proteſt, that Protogenes with all his power over me, ſhall not be able to make me perfidious unto my dear Cleonide : Believe it, that either by the King of Aſſyria's means or my Mother's, who will be ſhortly here, I will break off my marriage with Arpaſia, and if you be as conſtant as I am faithful, we will love one another for ever.

Aſtidamus.

Though this ſecond Letter was as fit as the firſt, to be laid in the diſh of Aſtidamus, yet it did not pleaſe Meliantes ſo well as the firſt, becauſe it mentioned the arrival of his Rival's Mother, and becauſe he made no queſtion but Argeliſe would come with her. So that this news bringing ſpurs to haſten on his deſign of preventing Aſtidamus, he was reſolved not to reſtore theſe two Letters unto his Siſter, but to keep them, and ſhew them unto Arpaſia, that ſhe might ſhew them unto Gabrias, and ſo break off the Marriage: Not but that he knew all that Aſtidamus ſaid in his Letters was falſe, and he mentioned the coming of his Mother to his Marriage, the better to delude her.

But after a tumultuous reflection upon all theſe things, in ſtead of reſtoring the Letters to his Siſter, he put them in his pocket, and told her, that upon them depended both his good fortune, and hers. At firſt Cleonide oppoſed his deſign; No, no, Siſter (ſaid Meliantes) I will not reſtore them, for they are ſo neceſſary to preſerve Aſtidamus for you, and alſo Arpaſia for me, that I ſhould do both you, and my ſelf very ill ſervice, if I ſhould part with them. For as I told you before, Aſtidamus intends to deceive you, and he poſitively promiſed Protogenes yeſterday to marry Arpaſia whenſoever he pleaſed, and he carries fair with you, leſt you ſhould obſtruct his marriage with her. After this, Meliantes making a more exact relation of all paſſages unto her, he told her, to bring her to his mind, that there was no courſe to be taken but one of theſe two, either he muſt fight with Aſtidamus, or elſe break off his marriage with Arpaſia by making uſe of theſe Letters.

Cleonide liking the laſt of theſe ways better than the firſt, ſhe conſented he ſhould have the Letters, after his promiſe that he would ſhew them unto none but Gabrias and Arpaſia, and it was her wiſeſt courſe to conſent, for ſhe knew not how to hinder him. However, he made her promiſe him, not to diſcover unto her Lover who he was, until his marriage with Arpaſia was broken off. And he did ſo plainly demonſtrate unto her, that ſhe would ruine her ſelf and honour, if ſhe did not prove faithful unto him, and likewiſe that ſhe would put the life of Aſtidamus in danger, that he did not fear, but ſhe would keep promiſe with him; ſo that parting upon mutual promiſes of fidelity, Cleonide ſtayed in the Garden contemplating upon the adventure.

And Meliantes went unto Arpaſia, with intention to ſhew her the Letters of Aſtidamus; and indeed, as ſoon as they could talk in private together, ſhe gave him an opportunity of ſhewing them unto her, and asked him, what news from Alcianipe? he having no mind to let her know, that Cleonide was his Siſter, leſt ſhe ſhould think he had ſome ends in perſecuting Aſtidamus, he let her go on in her opinion, that he knew all from this woman, ſo that he gave her the Letters to read, the hand ſhe knew; but, Madam, Arpaſia read them with different thoughts, for they made her both glad and angry: And her averſion to Aſtidamus, did ſo increaſe, that Meliantes had been very happy if ſhe had loved him, as much as ſhe hated Aſtidamus. I proteſt, Meliantes, (ſaid ſhe unto him) the infidelity of Aſtidamus unto Cleonide makes me hate him more than his inſenſibility unto me doth, and I ſhould ſooner pardon him for ſlighting me, than for betraying her.

For my particular (replied Meliantes) I am not of your mind, for I think the greateſt crime of Aſtidamus, is his not loving you, and next to it, his infidelity unto Cleonide; but to ſee you, and not to love you, is a crime incredible: Could it ever be imagined that a Lover of Cleonide, would be the Husband of Arpaſia? or could it enter into the heart of a man, to marry Arpaſia, and not love her? theſe are ſo far above my belief, that had not Aſtidamus given his inſenſibility under his own hand in thoſe two Letters, I could not have given any credit unto it.

I think it leſs ſtrange (replied ſhe) that he ſhould be inſenſible towards me, than that he ſhould be unfaithful unto Cleonide. But I beſeech you, Madam, (ſaid Meliantes) what courſe do you intend to take? I intend to ſhew theſe Letters unto my father, replied ſhe, and to tell him, that I will never marry Aſtidamus, and to open my heart unto you, as unto a man whom I dare truſt, above any one in the world, I will aſſure you, that if he will force me to marry him, I ſhall not obey him, but I ſhall hope that ſince he is ſenſible of honour, he will have better thoughts. Doubtleſs he knows that I do not love Aſtidamus, but I believe he does not know my reaſon for it, he thinks it is only an averſion in nature, which time and reaſon might ſurmount; but I am confident, when he ſhall ſee theſe Letters, he will be of another mind.

Perhaps, Madam, (ſaid Meliantes) reaſons of ſtate will be his greateſt conſideration. No, ſaid ſhe, I hope to perſwade him by theſe Letters, that Aſtidamus does not intend to marry me; and to put an open affront upon him, though Protogenes ſhould preſs him to it: and I hope to perſwade him to anticipate Aſtidamus, and break off with him, before he break off with us; in concluſion, Meliantes, I hope to tranſact the matter ſo, that it ſhall not be long of me, if the fair Cleonide do not marry Aſtidamus, and if I do not quit Alfenes, never to come into it again; the truth is (added ſhe moſt obligingly) I ſhall depart with much ſorrow, ſince I ſhall thereby loſe you. Since I ſtay at Alfenes, only for the love of you, Madam, replied Meliantes, I ſhall depart when you do, and if Fortune do not thwart my intentions, I think, Madam, that I ſhall go whither you go; for you have ſo great a power over me, that I am not able to live far from you. If I have ſo much power over you, replied ſhe, as you would make me believe I have, then tell me who you are, and acquaint me with the ſecrets of your heart, as I have you with mine. I would the gods, Madam, (ſaid he, and looked fixedly upon her) that you could gueſs them without my telling you: For the truth is, there is nothing in my ſoul which I would not have you know, yet I cannot without much pain tell you all the thoughts of my heart.

For, Madam, I dare not diſcover all my imbecilities, I dare not tell you how I love a moſt divine perſon without all hopes, I dare not for my life aggravate all the miſeries which this paſſion hath cauſed me to endure, eſpecially unto you, Madam, whoſe actions are all guided by ſolidity of reaſon, not but that the perſon whom I adore, hath ſo many excellencies, as will well excuſe all my imbecilities, for ſhe is beauty in the very abſtract, her wit tranſcends all capacities, ſhe hath Virtue, and Goodneſs in the ſuperlative degree, and ſhe doth a little eſteem me, but for all this, Madam, I dare not be ſo bold as to tell you of my paſſion. The worſt is (replied Arpaſia, not ſuſpecting his love to her) I have heard you ſay, that one cannot be in love, but one muſt be miſerable alſo, and therefore for my own intereſt, I muſt needs grieve for you, ſince it is not likely we ſhall be long together in one place. However, (added ſhe, not giving him time to anſwer her) ſince the Perſon whom you adore, hath ſo much Beauty, Wit, Virtue, Goodneſs, and Eſteem of you, I cannot ſee you are much to be pitied: I ſhould not indeed be very unhappy, replied he, if ſhe did know without being offended, that I did love her, but ſince I never told her, I am in continual fears, leſt ſhe ſhould diſcover my paſſion; and yet at the ſame time I am grieved that ſhe doth not divine it; and yet ſhe muſt divine it, if ſhe do know it, added he, for I never dare tell her that I do love her.

Meliantes ſpoke this with ſuch a paſſionate air, as made Arpaſia bluſh, and was conſtrained to apply it unto her ſelf, and ſince ſhe could not have any ſuch thoughts without ſome appearance of it in her countenance, Meliantes ſaw that he was underſtood, ſo as fearing to ſay too much, and thinking he had ſaid enough to make her ſuſpect what he would have her know, he turned the diſcourſe and began again to talk of Aſtidamus, Cleonide, and Gabrias, and ſo freed both her, and himſelf from a non-plus: And this cauſed her not to be offended at this half declaration of his Love.

However, ſhe was no ſooner retired, but ſhe did me the honour to impart all the paſſage unto me, and to tell me her opinion: which done, I told her that I had obſerved a hundred paſſages from Meliantes, which moved me to believe as ſhe did; for truly, ſaid I unto her, he hates Aſtidamus, only becauſe he loves you, and he hates him in ſuch a manner, as perſwades me that his condition is worthy to be his Rival. As for his quality, replied Arpaſia, I doubt much leſs of it, than of his love. For all the thoughts of his ſoul are ſo noble, and there is ſomething ſo high in all his proceedings, that I am moſt confident his quality is great; but for all that, Niſide, ſaid ſhe unto me, I muſt look upon him only as a friend which fortune gave me, and which ſhe will quickly take from me, and I ought to be well ſatisfied, if fate will only keep me from marrying Aſtidamus.

After this, Arpaſia changing diſcourſe, we talked of nothing, but what ſhe ſhould ſay the next morning unto Gabrias: And indeed, as ſoon as ſhe awaked, and had dreſſed her ſelf, ſhe went unto her Father, unto whom ſhe addreſſed her ſelf with ſo much Prudence and Reſpect, that after he had read the Letters, and knowing the hand, he ſeemed to conſent, that ſhe ſhould not marry him, who writ them, yet he told her, that to break off with a ſpecious pretence, it was expedient to ſtay until the Meſſenger which Protogenes and he had ſent unto Babylon, was returned, becauſe in all probability the King of Aſſyria would not approve of this marriage, and would give a pretence both unto Protogenes and him, not to proceed unto a concluſion of Marriage; though they were once reſolved upon it, whether the King did conſent unto it or no. Daughter (ſaid he unto her) I am confident that as ſoon as Protogenes ſhall ſee theſe two Letters, he will confeſs you have reaſon to be againſt your Marriage with Aſtidamus, and if our other intereſts will not unite us without this alliance; I ſhall break off with him when it is convenient time.

In the mean time, it is pollicy to diſſemble as he doth, until the time be ripe, and fit to teſtifie our reſentments: For the truth is, Protogenes is Maſter of Alfenes, and if I ſhould go imprudently to work, he might make his peace with the King of Aſſyria when he pleaſed, by delivering me up unto him.

This ſpeech of Gabrias unto Arpaſia, ſeeming reaſonable, ſhe thanked him for it, and expreſſed her ſelf in the moſt tender and obliging Language ſhe could deviſe, to confirm him in his opinion. So that not daring to preſs him unto a reſtitution of the Letters, becauſe he ſaid, that he would ſhew them unto Protogenes, when it was fit time, ſhe left them in his hands, and went unto her Chamber with much ſatisfaction: and yet ſhe had no great cauſe; for be pleaſed to know, Madam, that Gabrias ſpoke ſo unto her, only to amuſe her, and keep her from divulging her reſentment, of ill treating Aſtidamus. For Gabrias having a full deſign to be revenged upon the King of Aſſyria, his mind and conſiderations ran only upon that, and not the ſatisfaction of Arpaſia, ſo that intending to accompliſh this Marriage, he ſent to Meliantes, and deſired him to come and ſpeak with him; who coming in all haſte, he found him in his Cloſet, holding the two Letters in his hand.

To teſtifie unto you (ſaid Gabrias unto him) how I eſteem your Wiſdom, and Friendſhip, I will truſt you with the greateſt ſecret of my Family, and try if it be poſſible to make you ſide with that Party which I am raiſing againſt the King of Aſſyria.

After this, Gabrias aggravated all his cauſes of complaint which he had againſt that Prince, then told him of the treaty which he had with Protogenes, acquainted him, that the marriage of Arpaſia was concluded upon, only for that reaſon, and told him all that Arpaſia had told him before, and all her anſwers; But you, Meliantes (ſaid he unto him) being a man of underſtanding, I know will eaſily conceive that I anſwered my Daughter as I did, only to gain time, for it were a groſs abſurdity, to break off with Protogenes, becauſe Aſtidamus loves Cleonide, and is not in love with my Daughter: For the Marriages of Perſons of her quality are to be made upon ſolid grounds, never inſiſting upon ſuch trifles as conduce nothing to the eſtabliſhment of Families. And though Aſtidamus do love Cleonide, and not Arpaſia, no matter, for his mind may change; and though it do not, it is but according to that order, which Nature and Cuſtom hath eſtabliſhed; for very few Husbands are Lovers of their Wives. And therefore, ſince Aſtidamus hath courage, and ſpirit enough, and can ſerve to execute my revenge, Ar- paſia muſt reſolve to marry him, yet ſince I deſire that Aſtidamus would apply himſelf unto her rather by fair means than by my abſolute authority, I have made choice of you to perſwade Aſtidamus unto a little more compliance with her; and that he may ſee how he is obliged unto me, for my diſcretion in the knowledge that I have of his Love unto Cleonide, ſhew him theſe two Letters which I put into your hands. In ſaying ſo, Gabrias gave Meliantes the Letters, who ſeeming to read them, as if he had never ſeen them before, afterwards told Gabrias, that ſince Aſtidamus, had promiſed Cleonide, never to marry Arpaſia, he could not believe it was in his power to perſwade him to live better with her: Nay, nay, never think ſo, ſaid Gabrias, though Aſtidamus promiſed Cleonide never to marry Arpaſia, yet he promiſed Protogenes to marry her when ere he pleaſed. And indeed, to diſcover the ſecret of the buſineſs unto you, I muſt tell you, that the man who was ſent unto the King of Aſſyria is already returned, although it be not publiſhed, becauſe a ſuppoſed anſwer of that Prince muſt be contrived, as if he had conſented unto the marriage, although he did not; and I muſt tell you alſo, that as ſoon as the Mother and Siſter of Aſtidamus are arrived, the Marriage is to be celebrated. Therefore in this interim which will not be long, I would have you tell Aſtidamus, that I am acquainted with his being in love with Cleonide, and that my daughter knows of it alſo: For ſince I do know of an infallible certainty, that although he do love Cleonide, yet he will marry Arpaſia, I am perſwaded that to avoid her perſecution after marriage, he will ſtrive with himſelf, and break with Cleonide ſooner than he would, if he thought that this gallantry was not known, either to me or my daughter; tell him that I will carefully conceal it from Protogenes, provided he will apply himſelf to appeaſe Arpaſia, and tell him on the other ſide, that if he will not do as he ought, I will diſcover him both unto Protogenes, and all the world.

I leave you to imagine, Madam, how Meliantes reliſhed this imployment, whether he conſidered himſelf as the Lover of Arpaſia, or as the Brother of Cleonide: And yet he was forced to accept of it, leſt Gabrias ſhould beſtow it upon another who would ſtickle in the buſineſs more than he would: therefore he promiſed Gabrias to obey his commands, yet he would not perſwade him to expoſe Arpaſia to ſo much miſery, as to marry Aſtidamus, ſince ſhe had a moſt invincible averſion to him.

But at laſt, Meliantes ſeeing he could prevail nothing with him, he left him, and went away with more ſorrow than he was able to undergo: Underſtanding that much company was with Arpaſia, he was in no fit tune to enter; but he went unto Cleonide, whom he found alone, to ask her whether ſhe had ſeen Aſtidamus the night before, in the place where ſhe was uſed to meet him? Alas, Brother (ſaid ſhe unto him) I have ſeen him but too often; for ſince you have opened my eyes I have ſeen his infidelity ſo clear in this, that I make no queſtion of it: It was but yeſterday that he promiſed me not to marry Arpaſia, but he ſpoke more faintly than uſual: and he did ſo harp upon the imperious humour of Protogenes, that I know he prepares himſelf for obedience: Truth is, dear Brother, Aſtidamus is a moſt perfidious man, one who hath ſtoln Arpaſia from you, and will take his heart from me, unleſs you find ſome means to prevent your misfortune and mine: He told me yeſterday, added ſhe, that his Mother and his Siſter would perhaps arrive to morrow: but he feared extreamly, that his Mother would not be able to oppoſe the Marriage, as he hoped and wiſhed.

How (ſaid Meliantes) will Argeliſe be at Alſenes to morrow? if ſo I muſt have recourſe unto the moſt extream remedies.

Cleonide ſurprized at her Brother's Speeches, asked him why he ſaid ſo? But Meliantes, not being willing to tell her the Cauſe, did ſay that his ſorrows were ſo great, that he knew not what he ſaid: ſo that after about a quarter of an hours ſtay, he returned to Arpaſia, to ſee if the company was gone: and underſtanding that there was none but Alcianipe, two other Ladies, and a man of good account in Alfenes, named Meroſus; he thought they would depart preſently, and therefore he entred, but he was deceived; for Alcianipe was in ſuch a talkative humour that day, as he thought ſhe would never give over. Not but that Arpaſia did civilly expreſs her ſelf to take no pleaſure in detraction: Yet ſince ſhe imagined that Meliantes knew of the gallantries of Aſtidamus only from her, therefore ſhe endured her with more patience than ſhe would, if ſhe had not thought that it was by her means that her Marriage with Aſtidamus was to be broken off.

Moreover, ſince the Language of Gabrias had filled her full of joy, Meliantes found her as pleaſant as he was ſad: and ſhe expoſed her ſelf unto Raillary with Meroſus and Alcianipe: But Meliantes ſpoke not a word all the while, and was ſo reſerved, that Arpaſia took notice of it, and imagined that her ſuſpicions of his being in love with her, were not ill grounded: So that after Alcianipe, Meroſus, and all the reſt of the Ladies were gone, ſhe avoided talking in private with him as much as ſhe could. And to that end, ſhe called all her women one after another: but Meliantes having buſineſs of concernment to impart unto her, beſeeched her to let him have an hours Audience, and that preſently: For, Madam, (ſaid he unto her, and ſighed) I aſſure you it imports all the happineſs of your life that you do hear me, and that immediately.

Arpaſia knowing that Meliantes had ſome croſs adventure or other to tell her, ſhe changed colour, and deſired him to acquaint her what misfortune had of late happened? So then haſting to tell her all that Gabrias had told him, leſt any ſhould come in to interrupt them, he acquainted her in few words with all the Conference he had with her Father, and with ſo many ſigns of ſorrow in his Countenance, as it was plainly to be ſeen that the intereſt of Arpaſia did nearly concern him.

How, Meliantes, (ſaid ſhe) is my Father ſo inhumane as to make me a ſacrifice unto his Revenge? Can he find a heart to make me the moſt miſerable woman upon earth, only to ſatisfie his ambition? Would he marry me unto a man who can betray the beſt of Women? Can Aſtidamus quit Cleonide whom he loves, to obey Protogenes? And muſt I marry Aſtidamus who loves me not, to obey a Father? And yet Religion bids me not diſobey him, although all my Prayers and my Tears cannot move him.

How's this, Madam, (replied Meliantes haſtily) can you ever find a heart to marry Aſtidamus? Queſtionleſs I ſhall ſooner find a heart to dye, replied ſhe, and yet I think I ſhall reſolve upon it, rather than incur the ſhame of diſobeying ſuch a Father as Gabrias: and yet all remedies muſt firſt be tried: and I cannot tell whether it would be expedient to acquaint Cleonide with the infidelity of her Lover, to the end, that ſhe uſing her endavours to prevent being betrayed, ſhe may prevent my being miſerable alſo.

Alas, Madam, (replied Meliantes.) that is already done, and to no purpoſe. Why, replied Arpaſia, hath Alcianipe ſpoke unto Cleonide? no, Madam, anſwered he, but I have ſpoke unto her my ſelf, and ſince it concerns you as well as my ſelf, that you know who I am, be pleas'd to know, Madam, that I am Cleonide's Brother.

Are you Cleonide's Brother? (replied Arpaſia, with much aſtoniſhment) are you he, of whom the Friend of Aſtidamus gave ſo noble a Character? Yes, Madam, replied he, I am the unfortunate Clidaris, under the name of Meliantes, whom Cleonide never ſaw ſince ſhe was two years old.

I am very glad (replied ſhe) that I was not miſtaken, when I thought your quality ſuitable to your merit; alſo it joys me that being Cleonide's Brother, it concerns you almoſt as much as me, that I do not marry Aſtidamus: When you ſhall know me well, Madam, replied he, perhaps you ſhall ſee, that it concerns me more than you; and that though Cleonide were not my Siſter, yet my concernment would be the ſame: For truly, Madam, not to diſguiſe my ſelf and my ſoul any longer, I muſt tell you that I became your Captive in ſpeaking of the conqueſts of Seſoſtris, the very firſt day that I had the honour to ſee you.

Yes, Madam, the very firſt minute of your ſight, was the firſt minute of my paſſion; and I have ever ſince loved you in ſuch a reſpective manner, that you need not be offended if I aſſume ſo much boldneſs to tell you of it, in ſuch a time when I would not have you attribute all I ſhall do againſt Aſtidamus, unto the intereſt of my Siſter.

I am in ſuch a miſerable condition already (replied Arpaſia) that you ſhould not ſpeak thus unto me, and deprive me of the conſolation which I had in opening my heart unto you. Why, Madam, ſaid he, will you ſhut up your heart from me, becauſe I give you my own? and will you not be ſtill my friend, becauſe I love you? Truly, Madam, if ſo, I muſt needs ſay, you are both unjuſt and rigorous: For, Madam, my affection unto you is not incompatible with your virtue; ſince I ask nothing of you at preſent, but only that yon will give me leave to love you, and that I may oppoſe my ſelf againſt the deſigns of Aſtidamus, I have ſuch a pretence as that you need not be ſeen to have any ſhare in it; and if I be not the moſt miſtaken man in the world, I will prevent your marrying him, without putting you to the neceſſity of diſobeying Gabrias. Though all this be very advantageous to me, replied ſhe, yea though you have offended me, I would not have you take any courſe that may prove fatal unto either of you, and I had rather be the wife of A- than be the cauſe of any ones death. I would not hazard the life of Aſtidamus, much more yours.

Moreover (added ſhe) to teſtifie unto you, that my eſteem and amity is very great, ſince it can ſubſiſt after a declaration of love, I will pardon your boldneſs upon condition that hereafter you will not ſpeak unto me, but under the notion of a friend, and as Meliantes.

Yet, Madam, I beſeech you, replied he, let Clidaris hope that he ſhall have a favourable acception from you, whenſoever things are in ſuch a condition, that he may let Gabrias know what thoughts he hath of you. I will permit him to hope (replied ſhe) that if he can oblige my father to be as favourable to him, as he is unto Aſtidamus, that then, I ſay, I will not be ſo averſe to him, as I am unto that perfidious Lover: And more than this, Meliantes do not move me unto, unleſs you deſire I ſhould break quite off with you; Though all this be almoſt nothing (replied he) yet I ſhall be ſatisfied with your goodneſs, provided you will give me leave to tell you, that I do love you with more fervency than ever any did; that never Lover ſuffered more than I have, nor was ever any love more violent, and more ſolid both, than mine to you.

For believe it, Madam, I love you, with a certainty never to leave off loving you, and I love you without the contribution of any hopes, and without any complacency from you to increaſe it, ſince you did not ſo much as ſuſpect that I was in love with you.

And the love that flames in my ſoul having its fewel rather from the ſtars, than from reaſon, ſo that nothing can quench it, nor muſt not be extinguiſhed, except in my Grave, I beſeech you therefore admit of it; and let all I ſhall do againſt Aſtidamus, have a favourable reception from you. As Meliantes was ſaying this, Aſtidamus with three others entred into Arpaſia's Chamber, ſo as ſilence being forced upon both, the talk muſt of neceſſity change; and

Aſtidamus being that day in a pleaſant humour, and moreover, having a deſign to marry Arpaſia, he reſolved to change his way of behaviour towards her, and to win upon her mind, he applyed himſelf unto her, and every one, with all imaginable agreeableneſs; but as I remember, I told you before how he paſſed from one ſubject unto another, without arguing any thing to the bottom, ſo I may now very well ſay, that within the compaſs of one hour he talked of a hundred ſeveral ſubjects: For he had up, not only all the news at Babylon, but alſo all the paſſages at Alſenes, he talked of every thing he did that day, he related what was ſpoken, in all the places where he had been, and he asked Arpaſia what ſhe had been doing, then did he chide Meliantes for his ſilence: Afterwards he talked of muſick and of painting, and brought in ſo many ſeveral things, that one of the company taking notice of this great variety, did hint it unto others by way of commending Aſtidamus, for (ſaid he) there is nothing in the World more tedious, than being in company with ſuch people as dwell upon the firſt ſubject they begin to ſpeak upon, and do ſo rip up the very bottom of a buſineſs, that for a whole afternoon together, they will never change diſcourſe, for ſince talk ſhould be free and natural; and every one in the company to have an equal Liberty of changing as they think good, it is a groſs abſurdity to ſtop the mouths of any one, or to interrupt them.

For my part, (ſaid Meliantes very faintly) I do not underſtand your rule to be general, for I do know ſome perſons who can make much better diverſion in talking upon one ſubject; than in relating all the novelties of the World. if you ſpeak of Love unto any perſon (replyed Aſtidamus) I think you have good reaſon not to change diſcourſe; and yet unleſs you paint your paſſion with variety of colours, you will but tyre the perſon and your ſelf too: Thoſe who know how to love (replyed Meliantes) are not ſo ſoon weary, as others who know not: And Love hath this peculiarity unto it ſelf, as it doth ſo ſweetly take up the minds of thoſe it doth poſſeſs, that ſilence often is a diverſion; and two perſons in Love, provided they may be together, will ſit, and gaze, and never be weary, though they ſpeak not a word unto each other.

However it be, (ſaid Aſtidamus) I love variety in all things. Variety of flowers in a meadow does very well (ſaid Arpaſia, in a languiſhing tone) but I do not love it in other things; and whether it be out of ſlowneſs or barrenneſs of wit, I know not, I uſe to talk long upon a ſubject which pleaſeth me.

After this, Meliantes driving the buſineſs a little further, he moved Aſtidamus to anſwer him ſomewhat tartly, ſo as if Arpaſia had not carried her ſelf very diſcreetly, they had quarrelled in her preſence, and yet they parted very civilly, and every one went home with different thoughts. Arpaſia for her part was much diſquieted, for ſince ſhe had concluded nothing with Meliantes, ſhe was afraid leſt he ſhould take ſome violent courſe; and the more, becauſe ſhe knew he had no other way to break off her marriage; and becauſe ſhe ſaw moſt perfectly that he was in love with her, ſo that calling me into her cloſet, ſhe acquainted me with the cauſe of all her ſorrows, ſhe told me what Gabrias ſaid unto Meliantes; and all that Meliantes had ſaid unto her, both of his birth and paſſion, and afterwards ſhe did aggravate her misfortunes with ſo many ſighs, tears, and ſignificative expreſſions, that ſhe inſpired me with all her ſorrows; yet, Madam, (ſaid I unto her to comfort her) you have this advantage, that Meliantes is both Cleonide's Brother, and your Lover: Doubtleſs it is (replyed ſhe) to prevent Aſtidamus from marrying me; but Niſide, it is an advantage which much diſquiets me, for I eſteem Meliantes more than to wiſh his ruin in my ſafety, and I eſteem him more than to deſire that his eſteem ſhould be ſeconded by a greater obligation. Since Meliantes is of ſo good a quality (replied I) you need not fear being obliged unto him: and if by breaking off your marriage with Aſtidamus, he ſhould come to marry you, I ſee no reaſon you have to complain againſt your fortune. Not ſo haſty, good Niſide (ſaid ſhe unto me) let us entertain no ſuch ill grounded hopes; Meliantes, doubtleſs hath as many charms both of ſoul and body, as any man in the world; yet for all that, though I conceive well enough of him as a friend, yet I know him not well enough to wiſh he were my Husband; though I know very well he loves me, and though I have a very particular eſteem of him, and ſince I know my ſelf to be moſt unfortunate, I dare not wiſh it, leſt I ſhould wiſh ſomething to my own diſadvantage.

Whilſt Arpaſia was thus reaſoning upon the matter, the ſoul of Meliantes was reſtleſly unſatisfied, for knowing that Aſtidamus was reſolved to marry Arpaſia, that Gabrias would force his daughter to obey him, and that ſhe, maugre her repugnancy, had a diſpoſition unto it, he ſaw that there was no remedies againſt his miſeries, but ſuch as were moſt violent.

Moreover, knowing of a certainty that Argeliſe would come, he foreſaw miſery upon miſery, and knew not how to untwiſt this ravelled clew of fortune: So that after he had paſſed over a whole night without ſleep, and without imparting his inquietudes unto Phormion, becauſe he thought him too wiſe to give ſuch violent Counſel, as that which he gave himſelf, he got up in all haſte, and without any with him but a Page, he went to the place where he knew Aſtidamus uſed to walk in the mornings, who lodging on that ſide of the Town towards the Lake, he went every morning to take the freſh air, at ſuch an hour, when men of his age have leaſt to do, becauſe it was no time for viſits, nor a time when the Ladies go into the Temple.

But Meliantes being there very early, Aſtidamus was not yet come, ſo as he had time enough to examine what he had to do; but the more he examined the preſent condition of his Soul, the leſs alteration he found in his reſolution. Think well with thy ſelf Meliantes, (ſaid he to himſelf, as he told me ſince) conſider what thou art about; Aſtidamus is brother unto Argeliſe, unto whom thou art obliged; whom thou doeſt eſteem, for whom thou hadſt a kind of amity which thou didſt think to be love, and ſo did that lovely, but unfortunate Lady, think alſo; content thy ſelf therefore with being perfidious; and do not quarrel with one who is ſo dear unto her. But, alas, (ſaid he, and reprehended himſelf) how can I conſider Aſtidamus only as Argeliſe's Brother, ſince he is to marry Arpaſia, and betray Cleonide? yet as for this laſt crime, I ſhould be ſo juſt as to pardon him, ſince I am guilty of the ſame my ſelf; but for the other, I am not able to endure it: No, no, I am not able to endure that Aſtidamus ſhould ever marry Arpaſia; and ſince I cannot prevent it, unleſs I take ſome violent courſe, I muſt reſolve upon it, and put it in execution with all boldneſs and conſtancy.

As he was in this mind, Aſtidamus appeared, having none with him but one Page alſo, ſo that going towards him he ſaluted him, to the end their Pages ſhould take no notice: After which Aſtidamus began to ſpeak; How comes it to paſs, Meliantes, (ſaid he unto him) that I ſhould meet you in a walk which I thought had been frequented by none but my ſelf? You meet me here (replied he) becauſe I came to ſeek you, and tell you, that I have a buſineſs of importance to impart, which I believe will be agreeable to your mind; For conſidering the thoughts which I know you have of Cleonide, I make no doubt but you will be glad to know that I am her Brother, and that you will make uſe of thoſe expedients which I ſhall adviſe you unto, by not marrying Arpaſia whom you love not, and by marrying Cleonide whom I know you do love.

How (replied Aſtidamus, much aſtoniſhed) are you Clidaris who paſſed by Samoſates? Yes (replied ed he) I am the ſame Clidaris of whom you received an advantageous Character, and who comes to ſummon you unto a performance of your promiſe unto my Siſter, not that ſhe is my intelligencer, but ſince the general vogue of the Town is, that you are going to marry Arpaſia, I ſhould be very glad (for my own honours ſake, which links me with hers in this buſineſs) to underſtand from your own mouth, the truth of your intentions.

But to the end you may not believe I aſſume a name which belongs not unto me (ſaid he, and ſhewed him the two Letters which he had written unto Cleonide) ſee here your own hand, which I could not have but from the hand of my Siſter, and anſwer me punctually unto what I ſhall ask you. When I writ theſe two Letters unto Cleonide (replyed Aſtidamus ſharply) I did intend to do what I writ, but now I ſee ſhe doubts my promiſes, that ſhe ſends to me for a more clear manifeſtation, and that ſhe hath concealed from me your being her Brother, her infidelity ſhall diſpence with mine, nor ever was my engagement ſo great with Cleonide, that her reputation ſhould be at ſtake, I loved her, and ſhe allowed me, but never was any noiſe made of it in the world, and though it ſhould be known I was in love with her, and was not hated, yet would ſhe not be diſhonoured by it. Whether any know it or no, replied Meliantes, it is no matter, 'tis enough I know it, to make me move you unto a performance of your promiſe which you made unto her.

I had performed it, (replied Aſtidamus craftily) had ſhe truſted unto my word, but now I do not think it fit to incenſe Protogenes, to loſe all my fortunes, and put an affront upon Gabrias and Arpaſia, to ſatisfie a perſon, who hath put an affront upon me.

Will you not then marry Cleonide (ſaid Meliantes coldly) and do you intend to marry Arpaſia? ſince reaſon requires I ſhould, I will (replied Aſtidamus) and I know not who or what can hinder me. Should I follow my own inclination (replied Meliantes) my ſword ſhould force you to that, which the conſideration of Juſtice will not. But a prevalent reaſon, beſt known to my ſelf, forbidding me to uſe that extream until I be forced, I will acquaint you further, that I am not only Cleonide's Brother, but alſo the Lover of Arpaſia, ſo as though I could conſent you ſhould ſlight my Siſter, yet I cannot let you marry my Miſtreſs: And therefore having a double intereſt in the affair, I adviſe you to examine the matter, and reſolve couragiouſly to do what becomes you, ſince as I think there is no great difficulty in it, for ſince you do not love Arpaſia but to love Cleonide, you may moſt eaſily ſatisfie both me, and your ſelf.

Since I value my honour above all things (replied Aſtidamus ſharply) I need not ſpend more time in deliberation; and therfore let the difference be terminated by Combate, to let you ſee that it is not your ſword can force me to keep promiſes, to that end let us ſend our ſervants further off: So theſe two Enemies began to fight with as much Courage as animoſity: But ſtriving to vanquiſh, and when they were ready to kill each other, a Coach full of Ladies, and many men on horſe-back appeared very near them: and they came ſo happily, that neither of them were wounded when they were forced to end their Combate.

But the wonder was, who ſhould be in the Coach but the Mother of Aſtidamus, and Argeliſe. So that the firſt object of this fair one was to ſee her Brother with a ſword in his hand fighting againſt her pretended Lover, of whoſe infidelity ſhe was ignorant. As ſoon as ſhe ſaw them, ſhe cryed out in teſtimony of her wonder and ſorrow; ſo as being parted, they knew her voice, and turned their heads to the place from whence the voice came. Meliantes looking upon her, and ſhe upon him, he was ſo aſhamed to think ſhe ſhould know of his new paſſion, that he had much ado to endure her looks. Yet he ſaluted both her Mother and her very civilly: And asking pardon for his being found in that condition with her Brother, he told her in two words, that it was an effect of his misfortune and miſery which deſerved pity.

In the mean while, Aſtidamus and Meliantes ſeeing much company come in, and their Pages appearing, they ſaw that they could not prevent their being carryed to the Town, from which they were not diſtant above two hundred paces: And in which they no ſooner were, but Protogenes ſet Guards upon them, until he knew the cauſe of their quarrel, and had ſeen Gabrias: For ſince Meliantes came with him, he thought it not expedient to do any thing in the buſineſs without him. You may imagine, Madam, what a noiſe this Combate made in Alſenes, and in what a Condition all thoſe perſons were who had any intereſt in the buſineſs.

When Arpaſia heard the news, and thought upon the danger unto which Meliantes had expoſed himſelf, and what a noiſe this quarrel would make, ſhe was extreamly troubled, ſhe was afraid leſt they ſhould think that ſhe had contributed any thing to the Combate, alſo feared that this quarrel, in lieu of breaking the Marriage, would haſten it. In the mean time, ſhe knew not how to be ſatisfied of the truth, but was forced unto patience, till time did ſatisfie her curioſity. On the other ſide, Cleonide was as angry both againſt her Brother, and againſt her Lover: She thought the firſt of theſe did not care for her, ſince he would kill a man, whom he knew ſhe affected with much tenderneſs: Alſo ſhe thought that Aſtidamus did not love her, but was a moſt perfidious man, ſince he would kill her Brother. So that being angry ſometimes againſt one, and ſometimes againſt another, ſhe was in a moſt impatient deſire to know more Circumſtances of the Combate. Aſtidamus for his part, he was not a little perplexed, for he ſtood in extream fear of Protogenes, becauſe his fortunes depended upon him, and therefore was extreamly afraid leſt he ſhould be offended at his engagement with Cleonide; the love he bore unto her never troubled him, nor made him aſhamed; and that eſteem which he had of Arpaſia made him loth ſhe ſhould know of his inconſtancy and double dealing.

Meliantes, for his particular, was in a moſt reſtleſs condition, out of fear leſt Arpaſia ſhould be offended at what he had done, and that he had told Aſtidamus how he was in love with her: The preſence of Argeliſe was no ſmall grief and ſhame unto him, though he had ſome ſmall conſolation out of a far-fetcht hope that he ſhould break off the marriage of Aſtidamus with Arpaſia.

But as for Argeliſe, ſhe knew not what to think of the Combate between her Brother and Meliantes, and ſhe was very diligent to find out the truth of the buſineſs: And though Aſtidamns was under Guard, yet ſhe could ſpeak with him, becauſe ſhe was not a perſon ſuſpected. Argeliſe then taking her Brother aſide, whilſt her Mother was with Protogenes, negotiating for a reconcilement of the buſineſs, ſhe preſſed him to tell her the cauſe of his quarrel with Meliantes: And Aſtidamus being willing to ſatisfie her, he began to relate his love unto Cleonide, his voyage unto Gabrias, his affection unto Arpaſia, his renewing with Cleonide after his return, his fears of diſpleaſing Protogenes if he ſhould confeſs his paſſion, and his ambitious deſign of forſaking Cleonide, and marrying Arpaſia.

Is it as the Brother of Cleonide (ſaid the impatient Argeliſe, and interrupted him) that Meliantes fought with you? Doubtleſs it is, replied he, and more, for he fought with me as the Lover of Arpaſia. As the Lover of Arpaſia? (ſaid Argeliſe and bluſhed) it is impoſſible. Since I had it from his own mouth (replied Aſtidamus) I need not doubt it. Is it poſſible, Brother (replied Argeliſe) that Meliantes ſhould love Arpaſia, and fight with you rather as her Lover than as Cleonide's Brother? I am ſo certain of it, replied he, that you need not queſtion it any further: But, Siſter, (ſaid Aſtidamus, and looked very earneſtly upon her) why do you think it ſo ſtrange that Meliantes ſhould be in love with Arpaſia, who is one of the greateſt beauties in the world? Did he perſwade you whilſt he was at Samoſates that he loved you? and have I the ſame intereſt of honour to be revenged upon him, as he pretends to have of me? I beſeech you tell me whether I conjecture right, as the alteration of your countenance doth perſwade me that I do. Speak, dear Siſter, ſaid he, I conjure you to tell me truly.

Alas! dear Brother, what would you have me tell you? ſaid ſhe. I would have you tell me the truth, replied he: but then I muſt hold my hands before my eyes when I tell it, replied ſhe, I mean when I tell you, that Meliantes is perfidious, who perſwaded me that he loved me, and told me that his chief deſign in coming to Alſenes was to get your love, but I perceive he hath changed his mind: yet I do not ſee what advantage I ſhall get by acquainting you with his infidelity, and my weakneſs: For truly, Brother, as long as you are reſolved to forſake Cleonide for Arpaſia, you cannot upbraid him that he ſhould forſake me. 'Tis very true, replied Aſtidamus; but he hath not ſo much right to pretend unto the love of Arpaſia, as I have: And though I receive no other advantage from his ſlighting you, but that it will hinder him from being the Lover of Arpaſia, yet that is very great, and you have reaſon to think your ſelf happy in coming ſo opportunely to be revenged on him: Alas! Brother, ſaid ſhe, you will be more revenged upon me than him, if you publiſh the innocent affection which I have unto that unfaithful man. However, replied Aſtidamus, I muſt make him appear as culpable as I am to Cleonide; and to that end I conjure you to acquaint me with all the teſtimonies of his affection which ever he gave unto you. Alas! (ſaid ſhe, and ſighed again) ſince I am not in a condition to receive any, I will not remember them any more.

As they were thus in diſcourſe, they were interrupted by ſeveral perſons of quality who came in a Complement unto Aſtidamus after his Combate: So as Argeliſe being forced to retire and hide her ſorrows, Aſtidamus remained alone with them who came to viſit him. But as ſoon as ever they were gone, he employ'd all his endeavours to get one of the Guards to carry a Letter unto Meliantes, by which he intimated unto him, that ſince he had begun a quarrel with him as he was the Brother of Cleonide, and the Lover of Arpaſia, he thought good to tell him from the Brother of Argeliſe, and from him that was to marry Arpaſia, that he ſhould endeavour to eſcape from his Guards the night following, as he hoped to do from his, to the end they might finiſh their Combate in a place which he appointed, unleſs he would yield Arpaſia to him, and marry Argeliſe.

But, Madam, this Letter was not delivered unto Meliantes; for ſince Protogenes cauſed him to be guarded more cloſely than Aſtidamus; the man who was to deliver this Letter unto Meliantes was ſtoped and ſearched by the Guards, and this Letter being found about him, he was carried unto Protogenes, when Gabrias and the Mother of Argeliſe and he were together. You may judge, Madam, what diſorder this Letter cauſed, for by it Protogenes knew that Aſtidamus was unfaithful unto the Siſter of Meliantes, and that Meliantes was unfaithful unto the Siſter of Aſtidamus. Gabrias for his part, he ſaw more plainly than before, that his Daughter had good reaſon for her averſion againſt a man who did not love her: And the Mother of Argeliſe underſtood that the heart of her Daughter was more engaged than ſhe imagined.

In the mean time, ſuch an adventure as this was not to be kept ſecret, for the Letter was read aloud by thoſe who took the man which ſhould have given it unto Meliantes: Two days were ſpent in the examination of the buſineſs, before any thing could be reſolved upon: Such an univerſal report was pread over all Alfenes, that nothing elſe was talked of. You may imagine, that Alcianipe was as buſie as the buſieſt, in giving advice; and tumbling lies and truths together. She compoſed a moſt ſtrange Hiſtory of all thoſe perſons. But, Madam, it is fit I ſhould tell you how ſadly the fair Arpaſia reſented it, when ſhe heard that Meliantes was accuſed of Infidelity to Argeliſe, though he was unfaithful, only becauſe he loved her.

However, ſhe always affirmed to me, that her ſorrows proceeded only from reſentments of eſteem and friendſhip.

But, Madam, (ſaid I unto her) ſince the infidelity of Meliantes is advantageous to you, methinks he deſerves to be excuſed, and that you ſhould not be grieved, eſpecially ſince you are in good hopes not to marry Aſtidamus; and ſince it may ſo come to paſs, that you may marry Meliantes, who is one of the beſt accompliſhed men in the world. Meliantes, replied ſhe, moſt certainly is a very excellent man, but ſince he can be unfaithful, he can never be my Lover with any hopes of being loved, my friend indeed he may be, and under that notion, I can both pity and excuſe him, but he muſt never pretend any further.

On the other ſide, Meliantes knowing that Arpaſia did know of all his adventure with Argeliſe, and that Argeliſe knew of his love to Arpaſia, he intreated two different things from Phormion, for he deſired him to go and make excuſes for him to her, unto whom he had been unfaithful, and alſo unto her who made him commit the infidelity.

Since thoſe who guarded him, had orders to let Phormion come to him, becauſe it was known he carried himſelf very moderately, he had the liberty to vent all the variety of his thoughts unto him. I beſeech you, dear friend (ſaid he unto him) uſe all your Rhetorick to ſweeten the ſharpneſs of Argeliſe's mind, provided you mention nothing which may offend my love unto Arpaſia: but when you talk with that divine perſon, who reigns Soveraign in my Soul, imploy all the faculties of your ingenuity ſo, that ſhe may not deprive me of her eſteem. Were Arpaſia a common perſon, I ſhould hope ſhe would thank me for my infidelity, but knowing her as I do, I fear ſhe will ſuſpect my paſſion; tell her then I beſeech you, who knows my heart, that I am leſs unfaithful than ſhe imagines, ſince I was never in love with Argeliſe ſo far as ſhe believed: Yet do not inſult upon that unhappy Perſon, but proteſt unto Arpaſia, that though Argeliſe was firſt my affectionate friend, yet ſhe was not my firſt Love, tell her my heart deceived me, when I thought I was in love with Argeliſe, and that the young experience which I had in that paſſion, made me tell harmleſs lies, when I aſſured Argeliſe that I loved her, ſince it is a moſt certain truth, that the power of Arpaſia's charms hath perfectly taught me that I was never really in love with any, until I firſt ſaw her, and ſince it is ſo, I ought not to be looked upon as an unfaithful man, whoſe love muſt be ſuſpected.

Phormion would have endeavoured to avert him from the love of Arpaſia, but he was not able.

In the mean time, this wiſe and faithful friend, who in that little time he had been in Alſenes, had gotten a Language which was not natural unto him, did very exactly execute that employment which Meliantes did put upon him, but he found Argeliſe ſo chollerick, that do what he could, he was not able to qualifie her incenſed ſpirit. As for Arpaſia, he found her very ſweet and civil, and ſhe told him, that ſhe thought her ſelf much obliged unto Meliantes, for hazarding his life in her behalf, though ſhe could have wiſhed he had not applied ſuch violent remedies; but ſhe deſired him to tell Meliantes from her, that ſhe wiſhed he would not any longer continue obſtinate in loving her, ſince he did but loſe his labour. Then Phormion for all that, did perſwade her with all the reaſons which his friend had furniſhed him withal, but ſhe told him again ſo reſolutely, that ſhe would never entertain a Lover whom ſhe could ſuſpect of inconſtancy, that he plainly ſaw, Meliantes had no hopes.

On the other ſide, Cleonide ſeeing infallibly, that Aſtidamus forſook her out of ſelf intereſt, ſhe was ſo incenſed againſt him, as ſhe declared that though he ſhould return again unto her, yet he ſhould return in vain: for ſhe would never marry a man, who had more ambition in his heart than love.

This example of Cleonide's generoſity, wrought ſo upon the heart of Argeliſe, that ſhe being out of hopes Meliantes would ever become her ſlave again, ſhe ſaid as much as Cleonide did, ſo as the reſentments of theſe three Perſons, being quickly known unto Protogenes, and Gabrias, they did not think the buſineſs ſo difficult to be compoſed; yet were they very ſorry to ſee, that the marriage of Arpaſia and Aſtidamus could not be conſummated; but ſince they ſtill united their intereſts againſt the King of Aſſyria, they made the beſt of this adventure they could: So that ſeeing Meliantes and Aſtidamus were almoſt equally culpable to each other, and their Siſters, and that Cleonide and Argeliſe, would not pretend unto their Lovers, nor Arpaſia unto Meliantes; they conceived that there was nothing elſe to be done, but to prevent a ſecond combate; And imploying the perſwaſions of all their friends, theſe two enemies did ſeem to yield unto the deſires of their friends, purpoſely to be rid of their guards; and they conſented to imbrace each other, promiſing to quarrel no more: But for all that, hating one another with an inveterate malice, as they imbraced each other, there paſſed a reciprocal challenge between them, and they carried it ſo cunningly, that none perceived it.

They both went out of Alſenes the night following, and fought the next morning by break of day, where none was preſent to part them, Meliantes wounded Aſtidamus very dangerouſly, and diſarmed him, ſo that ſeeing he could not enter into Alſenes, after this combate, conſidering the condition of his enemy, he retired, after he had put him into the hands of his Page, who waited upon him, and that he had ſent his own Page unto Phormion, to acquaint him with the place where he would ſtay for him, giving him a Letter alſo for Arpaſia.

Thus, Madam, immediately after this fair one underſtood, that Aſtidamus was brought in much wounded, this Page found an opportunity to give her his Maſter's Letter, wherein was writ theſe words, if my memory fail not.

To the Fair Arpaſia.

MADAM,

I Have oft heard ſay, that one may treat a perfidious Lover ill; but I cannot think it juſt, to uſe a faithful Lover ſo: I conceive, Madam, that Argeliſe cannot hate me, without ſhe be unjuſt; and I conceive you cannot hate me unleſs you be cruel. However, though perhaps you believe not this, yet I cannot chuſe but conjure you to remember, that had it not been for my love to you, you had been the Wife of Aſtidamus, and believe, that in what part of the World ſoever I am, I ſhall be eternally your Lover, and ſhall be more faithful under the name of Meliantes, than ever I was under that of Clidaris.

I being with Arpaſia when ſhe read this Letter, I obſerved ſhe could not read it without ſome diſorder, yet ſhe would not anſwer it, only intreated Phormion when he came to bid her adieu, to tell his friend, that ſhe was ſo juſt as never to forget her Obligations to him, conjuring him to think of her as a Perſon who could not be any more than his friend.

But, Madam, after Phormion had met with Meliantes, ſince it was eaſie to foreſee that Gabrias would very ſhortly return, he would not go very far from Alſenes, purpoſely to know the paſſages there, and being reſolved to ſpeak with Arpaſia ſay what Phormion could, he would meet Arpaſia upon the way.

In the mean time, whilſt we were at Alſenes, Gabrias was much perplexed; for ſince Meliantes did firſt come with him, and ſince it was he who preſented him unto Protogenes, this man grieving to ſee his Nephew in danger of death, pretended that Gabrias muſt needs know where Meliantes was, and that it was fit he ſhould inform him.

Gabrias for his part being perſwaded, that this Duel was fought without any foul play, and with equal advantage, and thinking it againſt the Laws of honour to purſue Meliantes, he told Protogenes, that he knew not where he was: But though he did know, he would not tell him, unleſs his thoughts were better than he ſaw them. So as growing inſenſibly very bitter one againſt another, though their intereſts required an Union, they parted upon ill terms, and much animoſity one againſt another.

But I do verily believe, the black tongued Alcianipe did blow the bellows of their anger very much, for ſhe divulged a report, that Protogenes had a deſign to diſcover the intentions which Gabrias had of taking part with Ciaxares; and to make his own peace with the King of Aſſyria, intended to ſend both him and Arpaſia unto Babylon: and at the very ſame time, ſhe told others, that Gabrias thinking to betray Protogenes, had ſecretly conveyed ſome Souldiers into Alſenes, and that Arpaſia did ſet on Meliantes to fight with Aſtidamus; but the wonder was, that ſhe thinking to tell a lye did tell a truth, for ſhe affirmed, that Meliantes was to meet Arpaſia upon the high way, as ſhe travelled. Moreover, ſhe ſaid, that ſhe was ſure there was a moſt intimate affection between them: Again, ſhe would not allow that this duel was fought with fair play, and vented ſuch invectives, both againſt Cleonide and Argeliſe, that her venomous tongue did become odious unto all that had any intereſt in theſe two Ladies, or had any ſparks of virtue in them; and ſhe had drawn ſuch an univerſal hatred upon her ſelf, when we came from Alſenes, that all the Ladies intended to forbear any more viſits unto her, as the moſt dangerous and deteſtable perſon upon earth.

In the mean time, after our departure was reſolved upon, and that Gabrias and Protogenes, though they defied one another, yet carrying it as if they were good friends, all the Ladies came to bid adieu unto Arpaſia, and to teſtifie their ſorrows to loſe her, yet Argeliſe muſt be excepted; who feigning to be ſick, could not find in her heart to viſit a Perſon, who had taken the heart of her Lover from her, and who ſhe thought had cauſed her Brother to be in that condition he was, but as for Cleonide, ſhe came, and had much diſcourſe with Arpaſia, in a very obliging way.

However, Arpaſia telling her, that ſhe believed Aſtidamus would return unto her as ſoon as he was recovered; Cleonide anſwered her, that thanks be to the Gods, her recovery had preceded his; for, Madam, (ſaid ſhe unto her) if Aſtidamus had caſt me off, only out of love to you, then your rare beauty, and excellent merit, might have excuſed him; and I ſhould have eaſily pardoned him, but that he ſhould quit me out of ſelf intereſt, this is a thing which moves me to ſcorn him, and to rejoyce that I have thrown him out of my heart. And indeed, Madam, this fair one deſiring to be out of that place where ſhe had received ſuch a moſt ſenſible injury, deſired her Aunt, that ſhe might go back unto her Father, where ſhortly after ſhe was very advantageouſly married.

However, we underſtood before our departure, that Aſtidamus would not die of his wounds, and we underſtood further, how it grieved his very ſoul, that he could not ſatisfie neither his ambition nor his love, and therefore conceived a moſt horrible hatred againſt his Conquerour, for Protogenes was much incenſed againſt him: Cleonide, ſhe went away, and he ſaw there was no likelyhood of ever marrying Arpaſia.

But in concluſion, Madam, we parted; and not dreaming of Meliantes, we met him upon the Road. 'Tis true, Gabrias did not ſee him, and it is as true, that Arpaſia had not ſeen him, but for me: For be pleaſed to know, that as we came to the Town, where he ſaw her the firſt time, and informed her concerning the Column which was erected by Seſoſtris, a man unknown unto me brought me a Letter from Meliantes, which conjured me to help him unto an opportunity of bidding Arpaſia adieu, and that ſince he had been inſtrumental in breaking off her marriage with Aſtidamus, ſhe would not deny him that favour, upon which conſideration, I thought it not fit to deny him what he asked, and knowing Arpaſia's mind ſo well as I did, I did not think ſhe would be ſorry to ſee him. Yet I thought it expedient not to ask her permiſſion, ſince perhaps her ſcrupulous virtue might dor at it, ſo as returning an anſwer unto Meliantes, who was concealed in the Town where he lay, I told him, I would uſe my beſt endeavours of getting Arpaſia to walk in a Garden belonging to the houſe where we lodged, and if he would be at the door of the Garden which was towards the River, I would open it unto him, when Arpaſia was there, and accordingly it was carried; for it being an eaſie matter to perſwade Arpaſia unto a walk when it was fair, becauſe ſhe loved it extreamly, I moved it unto her as ſoon as ſhe did riſe from Supper: Arpaſia then went whither I deſired, with very little company, and Meliantes ſaw her, and ſpoke to her in an Alley where none but I was with her, and without her contributing unto it: for ſince it was her cuſtom to talk often in private with me; as ſoon as ſhe called me, all the reſt of her women withdrew.

I need not tell you, Madam, how ſhe was ſurprized at the ſight of Meliantes; but I will tell you, that as ſoon as he came near her, he addreſſed himſelf, I beſeech you, Madam, (ſaid he unto her) permit me to receive ſo much ſatisfaction, as to hear from your own mouth, the reaſons of my condemnation, and to know by what motives, the beſt and moſt ſweet Lady upon earth is become the moſt rigorous; for truly, Madam, as long as I paſſed under the notion of the ſtranger Meliantes, you eſteemed me, and was very friendly, but as ſoon as ever you knew who I was, and knew that I did infinitely love you, then you began to be unjuſt. To teſtifie that I am not ſo (replied Arpaſia) I aſſure you that I do remember all my obligations unto you, and will never forget the good ſervice you did me in preventing my marriage with Aſtidamus; and to manifeſt my ſincerity, more than it may be I ought, I will ingenuouſly tell you, that if you had never loved Argeliſe, or at leaſt had not promiſed eternal affection unto her, perhaps I ſhould have permitted you to love me in ſuch a way as you deſire; ſince ſetting your infidelity aſide, I do find you a man every way worthy of my Father's choice and mine.

The truth is, your birth, your wit, your courage, your goodneſs, your generoſity, and a thouſand other good qualities, are very complaiſant; but ſince you have been ſo perfidious unto Argeliſe who is infinitely amiable, you may as well be ſo unto Arpaſia if ſhe ſhould permit you to love her. Alas, Madam, (ſaid he unto her) I never bore unto Argeliſe more than tender friendſhip: By excuſing your ſelf one way, replied ſhe, you accuſe your ſelf another, for if you were in love with Argeliſe, then you were only an inconſtant man, and if you were not in love with her, then you were worſe than inconſtant, in not telling her as much, but ingaging her heart without ingaging yours alſo: if Phormion told you at Alfenes what I deſired him (replied Meliantes) he told you that indeed I thought my ſelf in love with her, but yet it was only amity, and therefore I ought not to paſs for a perfidious man in your opinion, though I may paſs for an unconſtant man in Argeliſe's.

However it be, replied Arpaſia, I muſt never rank you in any other form, than in the degree of friendſhip; and therefore I pray you regulate your mind accordingly, and believe that it is ſo impoſſible I ſhould ever be ſure of your affection, as you would be a very unhappy man if I ſhould ſuffer you to love me: For Argeliſe is fair and charming, and ſince ſhe was not able to retain your heart, it is unlikely I ſhould; and to tell you truly, as the ſtate of things are, I ought to diſpoſe of my ſelf; for ſince my Father did once intend to ſacrifice me unto his revenge, he may perhaps do the like again, and in all probability I am deſtined to make the moſt advantageous treaty for him; and I conſider my ſelf as an Hoſtage, not knowing into whoſe power I ſhall fall.

If I would oblige you unto many things, Madam, (replied Meliantes) then you had reaſon to uſe theſe arguments againſt me, but, alas! I do not, Madam; all I deſire is, that you would let me love you, and that you would be pleaſed to refer the knowledge of my infidelity to time, which is the beſt Judge of faithful affections: and I beg this of you before the beginning of a moſt rigorous abſence, and my love will be put upon a moſt dangerous teſt, ſo as if I prove an inconſtant man, I ſhall never trouble you again, ſince I ſhall never ſee you any more; and if I prove faithful, I ſhould be unjuſt if I did not deſire the honour of ſerving you again. Therefore I beſeech you, Madam, grant me the liberty to love you, and conſider how ſmall a thing it is I ask, for though you ſhould not grant it, yet I could not chuſe but ſtill adore you, and though you ſhould forbid me, yet I muſt diſobey. But though I ſhould love you whether you will or no, yet I ſhould imagine it a great happineſs if I could obtain your leave for it; therefore deny it not, I conjure you, Madam, ſince I beg it without condition.

I freely conſent (ſaid ſhe unto him) that you ſhould ſtill continue my friend, but as for matter of love, never look for any leave from me: If you do drive me into deſpair, Madam, (ſaid he unto her) you will force me to follow you, and never leave you, until I have obtained what I now beg. I think you more generous Meliantes (replied Arpaſia) than to expoſe my honour. And ſince the venomous tongued Alcianipe hath given it out that I obliged you to fight with Aſtidamus, it would be believed, if you ſhould take that courſe, and therefore I conjure you not to think of it, nor deſire any thing which doth croſs my inclination. Let us part therefore, ſince reaſon requires it, and ſubmit to your deſtiny, without deſiring to be the arbitrator of your own fortune.

If the gods be reſolved you ſhould love me, and that I ſhould change my mind, they will do it by ways unknown unto us, and if they will not, you will trouble your ſelf in vain.

Do therefore I pray you what prudence requires you ſhould, and without any complaints againſt my rigour, be aſſured that you have more of my eſteem and confidence than ever any perſon had; alas! Madam (ſaid Meliantes then) how little do I want of being happy? for you need but add four or five words more unto what you have ſaid, to make me moſt compleatly happy.

After this he uſed many tender expreſſions, which indeed did tender the heart of Arpaſia, but did not make her reſolutions ſtagger, ſo as ſhe parted from him, without giving him leave either to love or follow her, and his fears of incenſing her, made him reſolve upon a patient departure the next morning, ſo he returned home with a violent paſſion, and without hope, and Arpaſia returned unto her Father, having a very great eſteem of Meliantes.

In the mean time, thoſe who are tied unto others by ſuch intereſts are as mutable and various, are never well united longer than the reaſon which united doth continue, and therefore Protogenes thinking it better to ſit ſtill than ingage himſelf in a doubtful war, he broke off with Gabrias, ſo that he alone gave juſt ſuſpicions of revolt from the King of Aſſyria, and prudence requiring, that he ſhould do what his deſire of revenge had inſpired him withal, he fortified his Palace, and made it a Garriſon, and prepared himſelf to take part with Cyrus, (as ſoon as that Prince, who then went under the name of Artamenes) ſhould approach.

In the mean time, we underſtood Aſtidamus was ſtill very ill of his wounds, and kept his bed a long time; alſo we heard that Meliantes was not yet cured of his paſſion, for he writ very often unto Arpaſia, though ſhe did never anſwer any of his Letters: 'Tis true, ſhe ſuffered me ſometimes to write unto him, but ever commanded me to forbid him writing any more unto her, unleſs he could better regulate his mind: And ſometimes methought, that I had ſome reaſons to think, that if Meliantes were but with Arpaſia, and were obſequious in courting her, ſhe would forget his infidelity unto Argeliſe, but ſo many ſeveral occaſions obliged Meliantes to ſtay in his own Country, that he could not poſſibly leave it: for beſides his fathers unwillingneſs to part with him, he was engaged in a buſineſs which would not allow him with honour to depart from the place, where his enemies would draw an advantage from his abſence.

In the mean time, all Aſia being up in arms, either for the illuſtrious Artamenes, or for the King of Aſſyria, nothing elſe was talked of, and the name of Artamenes was ſo famous, that it was continually in the mouths both of his friends, and enemies, with equal admiration. Gabrias, being reſolved to take his part, he heard to his great grief, that his Army was not ſo ſtrong as the King of Aſſyria's, but he heard alſo to his great joy, of the happy Omen which he had, when in beginning to march, he ſaw a great Eagle flying upon his right hand, which making towards Babylon, ſeemed to teach him the way he was to take; and he heard further, to his great ſatisfaction, that he had repulſed the firſt troops of his Enemies, and forced his paſſage over the River Gnides. But, Madam, a few days after, we heard with wonder, of the invention which the famous Artamenes had to make his Army paſs the River, dividing it into threeſcore ſeveral Channels, alſo we heard further to our hearts joy, how he had diſordered the Aſſyrian Troops, after he had paſſed the River, and how great a terrour he had ſtruck into the body of the Army, ſo as Gabrias now ſeeing nothing but a River between him and Artamenes, from whom he looked for protection, he prepared to go and ask it himſelf in perſon. He went then in the head of three hundred Horſe only to meet this Hero, to offer him all that was in his power: I need not tell you, Madam, how the renowned Artamenes received Gabrias, for you need not doubt of the goodneſs of that Prince, nor with what magnificence Gabrias entertained him at his Palace; and yet there hapned ſome paſſages ſo pertinent, unto the Hiſtory of Arpaſia, that I muſt not omit them, I ſhall therefore tell you, Madam, that the firſt day Artamenes ſaw the fair Arpaſia, an illuſtrious Perſian called Hidaſpes, was then with him; ſo as after the firſt civilities, Artamenes being obliged to talk with Gabrias, who had mentioned unto him ſomething concerning a negotiation which he had with the Prince Gadates, to engage him in the intereſt of Cyaxares, it was Hidaſpes only who talked moſt unto the fair Arpaſia, but her wonder was to hear him ſpeak in her own language very exactly.

I being an eye witneſs of all paſſages at this enterview, muſt needs confeſs, that I thought Hydaſpes to be infinitely lovely, yet he was not very tall, being neither too high nor too low, he was very handſom. Moreover, all the features of his face were excellent, and his air infinitely noble; though he was highly brave, yet there was no feroſity in his humour, or behaviour, but on the contrary, he had a marvellous charming ſweetneſs in his phyſiognomy, his wit was nimble and ſmooth, and indeed fortune could not bring a more dangerous Rival unto Meliantes than he.

Not that I intend to commend the merits of the one above the other, for I muſt ingenuouſly confeſs, I am not worthy to be a Judge between two ſuch ſuperlative men; but I am confidently perſwaded that none but Hydaſpes could ever become a competitor with him in the heart of Arpaſia, ſo it chanced, that their firſt diſcourſe was ſomething diſadvantageous unto Meliantes, becauſe it was advantageous unto Hydaſpes, for the conference between Artamenes and Gabrias being very long, the diſcourſe between Hydaſpes and Arpaſia was not ſhort, but they had time enough to talk of many ſeveral things: So that after Hydaſpes had elegantly commended the beauty of Arpaſia, and that ſhe had rejected his applauds, with much ingenuity and modeſty; they began to talk of the alteration and revolution which war brings upon all things when it continues long, for it often happens (ſaid Hydaſpes) that war makes ſtrange ſubverſions in the dominions of love, ſince it ſeparates many Lovers from the Perſons loved, and many do either cure themſelves of their paſſions, or change their Miſtreſſes by changing places, but as for the laſt of theſe, it never befals any Perſians; Perfidiouſneſs in love, is a crime which they can never be upbraided with in any Juſtice. Since it is natural for every one to be Lover of their own Countries (replied Arpaſia) I do not wonder, to hear you commend your own; but I believe, Sir, that there are Infidels of that nature in all Countries of the World.

Truly, Madam, (ſaid he unto her) I know none in Perſepolis, and the whole Court of Cambyſes cannot produce an example to convince me of a Lye. Doubtleſs there are ſome who ceaſe loving ſometimes out of reaſon, either becauſe their Miſtreſſes are too rigid, or for ſome other good cauſe; but never was any found who changed their affection out of any natural inconſtancy, or becauſe they found other Ladies more fair than thoſe they firſt loved; and they are ſo fully perſwaded, that changing without a good cauſe is perfidiouſneſs, that they make it a point of honour not to change affection out of fantaſticalneſs, but to reſiſt their own inclinations, if they offer to change affection without very good cauſe.

As Hydaſpes ſaid ſo, the remembrance of Meliantes made Arpaſia bluſh, at leaſt ſhe told me ſo ſince, ſo as to hide this little diſorder, the cauſe whereof ſhe knew very well, ſhe begun to ſpeak, and told Hydaſpes (who ſhe ſaw obſerved her) that to keep her ſelf in his good opinion ſhe would tell him the cauſe of that alteration in her face, for truly (ſaid ſhe unto him) I cannot hear you blame infidelity, but I muſt needs be ſorry for a friend whom I do accuſe alſo.

For my Particular, (ſaid Hydaſpes) were I a woman, I ſhould never love a man who had taken his affection from another, for who ſoever will be perfidious to one, will alſo be perfidious to two, and conſequently to all the world. I ever had that opinion, Sir, replyed Arpaſia, but to go rationally to work, I conceive it beſt neither to truſt thoſe who are perfidious, nor thoſe who are not, ſince though they be not yet they may be.

Indeed, Madam, ſaid Hydaſpes you muſt always except Perſians, and of all Perſians, you muſt put Hydaſpes in the firſt Rank of thoſe who are uncapable of any change in their affections. Truth is, Madam, I do ſo reſolutely love what I do love, that I know not how to retreat: what I think once fair I ſhall think it ſo as long as I live, and I am ſo extreamly jealous of my own thoughts, that I can never change: And I dare aſſure you that as I have this day begun to eſteem you, ſo I ſhall eſteem you till death; for I cannot think I ſhall ever diſcover any thing in your Soul which is not as fair as your face, nor do I doubt but that you have as much generoſity as wit.

After this, they talked of many other things which I remember not, but I remember very well that Arpaſia talked of nothing but Hydaſpes all the reſt of the day; and I underſtood ſince that Hydaſpes talked of nothing but Arpaſia after he left her. The day following he ſaw her again, and applauded her more than the day before; and to perfect their acquaintance, Gabrias intending to put his Palace into the hands of Artamenes purpoſely to purchaſe his confidence; Artamenes left Hydaſpes in it, until Gabrias had finiſhed his treaty with Gadates, and then both to come unto Cyrus before he gave any Battel.

Hidaſpes was not a little joyed to remain in a place where Arpaſia would be under his power; for the truth is, Madam, there was ſuch a powerful ſympathy between theſe two perſons, as I may very well ſay, that never was greater progreſs of affection made in ſo ſhort a time. In the interim, Gabrias left a Siſter in Law of his with his Daughter during his abſence, for he followed Cyrus, and never left him ſince: What inclination ſoever Arpaſia had unto Hydaſpes, yet ſhe was troubled to ſee him Maſter of the houſe where ſhe was: but he did uſe his power with ſo much ſweetneſs and diſcretion that ſhe had all the reaſon in the world to commend him for the reſpect he uſed to her: And indeed as it is impoſſible for a Lover to be without reſpect, ſo his awe of her is not to be wondred at, ſince he fell in love with her at the very firſt ſight, yet he durſt not give her any teſtimonies of it, leſt ſhe ſhould imagine that his boldneſs was an effect of that authority which he had upon him. Thus he ſighed and durſt not tell her until ſome happy accident would give him an opportunity of manifeſting his love. Not but that he ſaw her at all hours when handſomneſs would permit; for ſince he had very little to do in that place, and ſince he took extream delight in ſeeing her, he was almoſt inſeparable from her; but for all that, his fears ſealed up his mouth. Yet to acquaint you how he came to diſcover his paſſion, be pleaſed to know, that Hydaſpes being very careful of keeping the place which was of a very great conſequence, the Guards were very exact, ſo as a man who was uſed to bring Letters from Meliantes coming to the Gates, he was ſtayed, and ſince he did not give a very good account of his buſineſs, he was ſearched, and they found about him a Packet without ſubſcription, which Hydaſpes opened as ſoon as it was was brought unto him, but in lieu of finding any deſigns againſt the place, he ſaw it concerned the poſſeſſion of ſome fair ones heart, and ſo far from martial matters, that the Letter treated all of Love, and a Love unſatisfied and worſe recompenced; ſince the ſtile of theſe Letters were full of reſpect, Hydaſpes imagined that they were intended unto Arpaſia: So as the growing paſſion of his Soul being full of curioſity, he would ſee him who brought this Packet, unto whom he put many queſtions, purpoſely to make him confeſs from whom he brought thoſe Letters (for there was one unto him) and unto whom he was to deliver them. But, Madam, Hydaſpes was ſo over-joyed to know by this Letter that Meliantes was treated ill, and that he had hopes Arpaſia was not in love with any, as he grew more in love with her than before, yet he knew not what to do with this Letter: for he conceived that Arpaſia would hereafter know how it fell into his hands; ſo as he told him who had confeſſed from whom it came and to whom they were addreſſed, that he ſhould take ſpecial care of not betraying the ſecrets of his Maſter: After which he went to ſee Arpaſia, having theſe Letters in his Pocket.

After ſhe had talked with him of ſeveral things, ſhe asked him whether he heard any news from Ciaxares or from Artamenes? No, Madam, (ſaid he unto her) but I have this day received a Packet, which was not directed unto me, which I will impart unto you. In ſaying ſo, he took the two Letters from Meliantes out of his Pocket, and telling her how the Guards at the Gate had ſtopped him who brought them, he told her afterwards, that ſince the man would not tell unto whom he was to carry them, he would firſt before he reſtored them unto him, know whether ſhe was that fair ſevere one unto whom they were intended: for certainly, Madam, (ſaid he, and gave them unto her) that it muſt be unto ſome Perſon of Quality. Arpaſia was exceedingly perplexed at this, becauſe as ſoon as ever ſhe ſaw the Letters, ſhe knew they were from Meliantes to her: ſo as to get out of this perplexity, ſhe told Hydaſpes, that ſhe was ſo ſcrupulous in point of Letters, as ſhe would not ſee whether they were to her or no, nor did ſhe think it honeſty to ſee too far into the ſecrets of others; yet Arpaſia ſpoke this after ſuch a manner, as let Hydaſpes know that ſhe knew them to be the hand of Meliantes: but he was ſo joyed that ſhe ſhould think her ſelf ſo little concerned in thoſe Letters, that he could not chuſe but let his joys appear in his eyes; yet notwithſtanding ſince Arpaſia did not think he knew ſhe had any intereſt in them, ſhe would have been very glad that they were cut of his hands, for ſhe perſwaded him to reſtore them back to the man, or elſe to tear them in pieces: Since, Madam, you give this advice before you know what they contain, replied Hydaſpes, I think that as much as I do reſpect you, yet I ſhall not follow it; If reading them will oblige you to burn them (ſaid ſhe, and took them) I had rather ſee them, and indeed Arpaſia having really a deſire to know what was in them, ſhe took them, and turned towards the light to read them as if ſhe had not well enough ſeen, purpoſely to hide her bluſhes: Yet all would not do, for Hydaſpes turned as ſhe did, and looked attentively upon her as long as ſhe was reading theſe two Letters which I can ſhew you; for by chance having them about me the ſame day Arpaſia was carried away, I kept them ever ſince: and therefore not to truſt unto my memory I will read them unto you, that you may the better know what thoughts Hydaſpes and Arpaſia had, that unto me was thus directed.

Unto the moſt cruel Confident of my Paſſion.

MADAM,

I Wonder not ſo much at the cruelty of that moſt admired Perſon whom I adore, as at yours, nor do I wonder ſo much that ſhe ſhould never anſwer me, as that you ſhould write unto me, to aſſure me that ſhe will never write; for ſince I cannot leave loving her, I would delude my ſelf, and live leſs miſerable, and not run into mad deſpair as you would make me: I am reſolved to come ere long and ſee whether your words will be better than your Letters.

In the Interim, be ſo good as to ſhew this unto her who reigns in my heart, and tell her that it is ſo abſolutely impoſſible for me to be only her friend, as I ſhall diſobey her as long as I live, if ſhe continue obſtinate in ſo unjuſt a command.

As long as this Letter was in reading, Hydaſpes all the while looked upon Arpaſia, who ſeeing there was nothing in it which would admit of an ill conſtruction, did ſo well recover her diſorder, that ſhe began to read this which I ſhall read unto you without any agitation of ſpirits, though it was intended unto her in theſe words.

Unto the moſt Fair, but moſt inhumane Perſon in the World.

MADAM,

YOU are ſo very unjuſt, that no Patience can indure it without complaint, for you are pleaſed not only not to anſwer me, and to cauſe another to write, that you will not write any more unto me; but you command me by her that my love ſhould turn it ſelf into friendſhip, and if I do not, that then your friendſhip would turn it ſelf into hatred: I cannot tell, Madam, whether your Soul be capable of ſuch a Prodigious change or no; But I am ſure my love cannot become friendſhip, and no more. Believe it, Madam, I beſeech you, that all your tranſcendent Merits are not able to work this change in me; But on the contrary know, that be as rigorous as you can unto me, yet I cannot chuſe but ſtill love you.

After Arpaſia had read this Letter, ſhe told Hydaſpes that ſince it appeared it was intended unto ſome virtuous Perſon, it was pity it ſhould be made publick, and therefore to prevent it, ſhe would be keeper of it, for (ſaid ſhe, and ſmiled) ſince ſhe unto whom it is intended does not anſwer him who writ it, I have changed my opinion, and do not think it fit to be reſtored unto the man who brought it, leſt ſince it hath been opened he ſhould abuſe it: Alſo it is fitter to remain in my hands than yours, Sir; for ſince ſhe unto whom it was meant, is very virtuous and reſerved, I will ſpare her the ſorrows of any ever knowing that any is in love with her. I do imagine, Madam, replied Hydaſpes, that you do know who this fair and virtuous Perſon is, and if it be as I do imagine (added he, and looked her in the face) I am contented to leave theſe two Letters with you, upon condition you will promiſe me that ſhe ſhall never return any anſwer to them, or at leaſt, not anſwer them favourably. I profeſs, Hydaſpes (ſaid Arpaſia, and laughed) I do wonder you ſhould ſpeak thus, for you know not who writ thoſe Letters, nor unto whom they were written, and yet you would intereſt me in this innocent buſineſs. Indeed, Madam, replied he, I do intereſt my ſelf more in this buſineſs than ever I did in any other; and therefore I conjure you to honour me ſo far as to promiſe me that ſhe unto whom this unknown Lover hath written will not make any anſwer: All I can do, replied ſhe, is to promiſe you that if I do come to know her, ſhe ſhall not anſwer with my conſent: I ask no more, Madam, replied he, for ſo ſhe will never anſwer. But, Madam, (purſued he, and would not give her time to reply) I beſeech you ask her whether all who ſhall pretend to love her muſt expect to be as unhappy as this Lover, and whether ſhe will not anſwer unto words ſpoken no more than ſhe will Letters? There is ſo little reaſon in your demands, Sir, replied ſhe, that I know not what to anſwer, for you cannot tell whether ever I ſhall know her unto whom this Letter is intended, nor do I know her my ſelf, and and yet you would have me diſcover the ſecrets of her heart, and tell her your thoughts, and that I almoſt think you are in love with her. As for the laſt of theſe, Madam, replied he, I beſeech you never doubt it, but be confidently perſwaded that I am more in love with her unto whom this Letter was written, than he who writ it can be. As Arpaſia was ready to reply, her Aunt entred; ſo that the conference being broken, the Letters remained with Arpaſia, who gave them unto me before Hydaſpes, to teſtifie unto him that ſhe did not value them, for ſhe knew by his own laſt words that he either knew or ſtrongly ſuſpected that it was ſhe who had the greateſt intereſt in them: But, Madam, to avoid being tedious, after ſo long a relation, Hydaſpes carried himſelf ſo well and reſpectively unto Arpaſia, and he ſo fully perſwaded her that he had never been unfaithful, nor ever could be, that he was more happy than ever Meliantes was ſince the fair Arpaſia permitted him to love her. Thus this fair Perſon dividing the tenderneſs of her heart, ſhe kept all her friendſhip for Meliantes, and all her love for Hydaſpes who was more obſequious unto her than ever any other Lover was. But, Madam, one ſtrange accident chanced: for be pleaſed to know that Hydaſpes having ſent back the man who brought the Letters unto Meliantes; this Lover was ſo grieved at the adventure, that haſting his Journey, he came diſguiſed unto the Palace: But ſince none was permitted to enter without very ſtrict inquiſition, and ſince he had a noble air which he could not diſguiſe, he was ſtayed, and known who he was by ſome men who waited upon Gabrias at Alſenes, and who believing him to be on the King of Aſſyria's ſide, advertiſed Hydaſpes, who in lieu of being glad to ſee his Rival in his power, was very ſorry for it, for he found him ſo handſom and amiable that he feared his being loved.

In the mean time, Arpaſia quickly hearing that Meliantes was ſtayed by Hydaſpes, ſhe believed that her obligations to him for breaking off her Marriage with Aſtidamus, and her real eſteem of him, did require that ſhe would entreat Hydaſpes to uſe him well, but to do it and not make him jealous, ſhe deſired him to ſet him at liberty, and ſend him away with a Convoy, leſt he ſhould fall into the hands of Artamenes, who might perhaps take him for an Enemy, though he had not yet declared himſelf. On the other ſide, Meliantes who had wit at will, did know very well by the proceedings of Hydaſpes, that he was in love with Arpaſia; for when he was ſtayed, as having ſome deſign upon the place, Meliantes deſired he might be carried before Arpaſia, that ſhe might anſwer for his innocency, aſſuring himſelf that as ſoon as ſhe ſaw him, ſhe would clear him of any ſuch deſign: Hydaſpes anſwered him ſomewhat nicely, he gave Meliantes ſome cauſe of ſuſpition that Hydaſpes loved her, and that he knew of his love alſo, ſo as he thought himſelf in a worſe condition than before, and the worſe when he knew all the certainty of it by a man of his acquaintance who belonged to Arpaſia; but he thought himſelf worſt of all, when Hydaſpes told him, that at the requeſt of Arpaſia he might go whither he pleaſed, and that he would let him have a Convoy to Guard him; but he would by no means depart until he had ſeen Arpaſia, and was ſo reſolutely obſtinate, that Arpaſia hearing of it, and fearing he ſhould make too great a blunder in the buſineſs, ſhe intreated Hydaſpes to let him ſee her. Until now Hydaſpes was ſo reſpective unto her, as he ſeemed to be ignorant of Meliantes his love; but when ſhe deſired to ſee him he could not chuſe but hinder him, yet he did it with ſo much reſpect, as he was ſo far from offending her, as he obliged her to confeſs all her adventure with Meliantes, and not to diſguiſe her eſteem and amity to him. But, Madam, ſaid Hydaſpes, what ſecurity can I have againſt ſuch an accompliſht Rival as he is, if you ſhould grant him the honour to ſee you? you, I ſay, who have done nothing for me but what friendſhip may require you ſhould do for him. I pray Hydaſpes (ſaid ſhe, and bluſht) oblige me not to tell you what difference I make between Meliantes and you; content your ſelf with this, that I deſire of you a Favour which he can never enjoy without loſing me, ſince if you give him that liberty which I ask for him, he muſt go far enough from me.

In concluſion, Hydaſpes commanded that Meliantes ſhould be brought unto Arpaſia's Chamber, before he was conducted out of the Town. But ſince ſhe did not think that Meliantes had any ſuſpition that Hydaſpes was in love with her, ſhe was not afraid to ſee him: but on the contrary, did deſire it in hopes to perſwade him to think no more upon her. But after the firſt ſalute ſhe told him he was beholding unto Hydaſpes for ſetting him at liberty and not acquainting Artamenes: Alas, Madam, (ſaid he unto her) though I do not acknowledge the liberty which he gives me for a favour, yet I ſhall not be ungrateful: But I think that I have more reaſon of complaint againſt his baniſhing of me, than to thank him for my liberty: For, Madam, I ſee Hydaſpes loves you, and if I be not much miſtaken, Hydaſpes is much more fortunate and happy in your favour than ever Meliantes was. All that I can ſay unto you, is (replied Arpaſia) that I will do juſtice unto you both, and what place ſoever you had in my heart, you ſhall hold it as long as I live; nor is it ſo bad a one as you imagine, for I hold you in the degree of Eſteem, Acknowledgment and Friendſhip: how glorious ſoever that honour be, Madam, (replied he) yet would I moſt willingly exchange with Hydaſpes; however I am moſt ſure he cannot love you with a zeal comparable to me: However it be, Meliantes (ſaid Arpaſia) ſince I do look upon you only as my Friend, it will not concern you whether Hydaſpes be my Lover or no, but if you value my friendſhip, it concerns you to ſpeak nothing which may offend me; and therefore I conjure you for your own ſake to conform your mind unto mine, and to be perſwaded of two things; the firſt is, that your friendſhip may preſerve mine as long as I live: The ſecond is, that your love may not procure you my hatred: for Meliantes do not deceive your ſelf, and know that I did never deceive you, but as ſoon as ever I knew of your infidelity to Argeliſe, I always told you, that neither I would nor could truſt your afſection. But I beſeech you, Madam, (replied Meliantes) who ever told you that Hydaſpes is a perſon who hath not committed as great a piece of infidelity as this wherewith you upbraid me? yet Meliantes may talk and complain as long as he will before he can change the heart of Arpaſia: ſhe tells him indeed that ſhe doth infinitely eſteem him, but ſhe tells him withal that his love muſt never find recompence, nor be indured, and he muſt part from her without ſo much leave as to love her without any hopes, although ſhe doth promiſe friendſhip as long as ſhe lives. Hydaſpes being extreamly deſirous to know how his diſcourſe with Arpaſia had thriven, he would be ſatisfied by ſeeing him, and gueſs by his eyes whether he had been well or ill received; and indeed it was apparent by the ſadneſs of Meliantes, that Hydaſpes had good cauſe to rejoyce. The interview of theſe two Rivals was very hollow-hearted, and never Priſoner received his liberty with fewer ſigns of acknowledgement. Thus, Madam, the amiable and unhappy Meliantes went much againſt his will from a place where he left his Miſtreſs in the power of his Rival; 'Tis true, ſhe was not long there, for preſently after we heard that Gabrias had finiſhed the Treaty of Gadates with Artamenes; that the King of Hyrcania, and the Prince of the Caduſians having received ſome diſcontents from the King of Aſſyria, took part with Ciaxares. That the King of Cyprus had ſent Forces unto Artamenes under the command of the two famous Grecians, the one named Themocrates, the other Philocles, and that within a few days after a Battel would be fought, which in probability would be deciſive: So as Hydaſpes being perſwaded that Artamenes would ſend for him, he began to prepare himſelf for a ſudden departure, as ſoon as ever he ſhould receive orders for it, and he knew that love and honour do not always require the ſame things; for he had a good mind to go whither his honour called him, and he had a good mind alſo to ſtay where his affection invited him.

In the mean time, Artamenes having now a full confidence in Gabrias, who had linked Gadates unto his intereſts, would needs out of his generoſity give back the abſolute Authority of his Palace unto him; So as we were much ſurprized one morning when we heard that Hydaſpes had received commands to go unto the Army: That the Forces which Artamenes had left in the Town, had orders alſo to go out, and that Gabrias ſent a Couſin of his to command there in his Palace. I ſhall not inſiſt upon any relations unto you, Madam, what Hydaſpes and Arpaſia thought upon this occaſion, for you will eaſily conceive them, ſince I have already told you that Hydaſpes was infinitely in love with Arpaſia, and Arpaſia had a ſtrong inclination towards Hydaſpes, yet ſhe would not ingage her ſelf further than to permit her Lover to love her, and to ſend her news during his abſence.

But, Madam, preſently after, fame ſpoke loud in the glory of Artamenes, and very advantageouſly of Hydaſpes, for we heard that the firſt of theſe gained the Battel againſt the King of Aſſyria, and the ſecond having orders to fall upon the King of Phrygia, had overcome him, and took him Priſoner, and which added to his glory, in writing to Arpaſia, he mentioned not a word of himſelf, nor any thing, but of Artamenes only; in whoſe applauſe he told ſuch wonders as was hardly credible the valour of man could reach ſo high as he did ſet him out.

After this, Madam, ſuch was ſtill the affection of Hydaſpes unto Arpaſia, that in what place ſoever either he or ſhe was, ſhe was never above ten days without a Letter from him. During the Siege of Babylon, ſhe received one conſtantly every four days; and whiſt he was at Sinope, ſhe received one oftner than ordinary, becauſe he had matter enough to ſend her.

Indeed, Madam, during all the Armenian and Lydian war, there was a conſtant commerce of intelligence without any interruption, until the renowned Artamenes left that name for that of Cyrus, and ſent Hydaſpes from the Camp at Cumes to releaſe the King of Aſſyria.

But, Madam, I forgot to tell you, that when Cyrus went into Armenia from Sinope, there was a moſt peſtilent infection in the place where we were, ſo as the Aunt of Arpaſia, with whom we then were, was conſtrained to go out into another ſtrong Caſtle belonging unto Gabrias, purpoſely to avoid the contagious air, and in that place ſhe continued until that accident hapned, which cauſed her to be at preſent under the power of Thomyris. And to acquaint you with this misfortune in few words, be pleaſed to know, that this Aunt unto Arpaſia had a Son by a former husband, who had been a long time from her, and returned juſt when we came to that Caſtle: He was no ſooner arrived, but he fell in Love with Arpaſia, but durſt not at firſt acquaint her; not but that this man whoſe name was Aſtidamus, was audacious enough naturally, but Arpaſia being then very ſollitary, ſhe would not give him any occaſions of talking in private with her: For I being ſhe, who knew all the ſecrets of her ſoul, ſhe was never better pleaſed, than when ſhe could freely talk with me without any witneſſes, and indeed, we had always a hundred things to talk of, though we had nothing to do. That which moſt did amaze us, was, that we never heard any thing of Meliantes, and to increaſe our wonder, we heard afterwards, that he was not in his own country, nor knew any where he was. As for Aſtidamus the Nephew of Protogenes, we had better information concerning him, for we heard, that after he was recovered, he ſought for Meliantes to fight with him, and not meeting with him, he returned unto Alſenes, where he carried himſelf ſo, that he ſo much offended Protogenes, as that he would not acknowledge him for his ſucceſſor, but baniſh'd him his preſence, ſo as leaving Alſenes, he went to travel, ſo as when the other Aſtidamus fell in love with Arpaſia, we knew not where Meliantes, nor his ancient Rival was.

In the mean time, ſince the paſſion of this freſh Lover augmented, ſo that it was impoſſible for him, but, if ever he ſaw Arpaſia alone, to diſcover his paſſion unto her, but he did diſcover it in ſuch an arrogant manner, that Arpaſia was extreamly angry with him, and anſwered him with ſuch authority, forbidding him to make the leaſt mention of any ſuch thing, as he ſaw there was little hopes of ever being loved, yet the ſlenderneſs of his hopes did not quench the flames of his paſſion, but on the contrary, they blazed out more violently, ſo as deſpair made him take up a reſolution, as unjuſt as violent.

For, Madam, his deſign was to ſuborn the guards of the Caſtle, and ſeize upon it, afterwards to force Arpaſia to marry him. But, Madam, whilſt he was plotting this deſign, the other Aſtidamus plotted another alſo, for being out of favour both with Protogenes and alſo his Mother, he knew not what courſe to take; and ſince he had heard ſomthing how Hydaſpes was in Love with Arpaſia, he could not find a heart to take that ſide he was on, nor could he attempt any thing for the King of Aſſyria, who was out of all hopes to get upon his Throne again. So that in this perplexity of mind, knowing Arpaſia was in this Caſtle, his deſign was to ſurpriſe it; and make himſelf Maſter of it, and to be revenged upon Meliantes whereſoever he was, by poſſeſſing Arpaſia, of whom he had ſuch a miſcellany of thoughts, as I think no man living is able to deſcribe them.

But, Madam, to let you know more than our ſelves did at that time, give me leave to tell you that Meliantes, who was not heard of in any place, had alſo a very odd deſign.

As I remember, Madam, I told you that Hydaſpes had given him a convoy to conduct him whither he pleaſed, when at the requeſt of Arpaſia, he was releaſed. But as fate cannot be avoided, ſo it hapned, that Meliantes wandring from one place to another, he was met by ſome forces belonging unto Artamenes, who was not then known to be Cyrus, ſo as by this means he was made a priſoner, and as chance would have it, this accident hapned juſt as Hydaſpes had orders to go unto Artamenes, and upon his way, did meet thoſe who took Meliantes, whom he knew as he paſſed by, ſo that being a Rival unto whom he ſtood in fear of, he was very glad to ſee him in ſuch a condition, as that he could not make any uſe of his abſence, nor go diſguiſed unto Arpaſia: Alſo it chanced, that the Officer who commanded that Party which took Meliantes, was his very particular, and ſingular good friend, ſo as coming to him, he asked him, what he intended to do with his Priſoner? and the other anſwering, that all Priſoners belonging to thoſe who took them, he ſhould go into a little Caſtle under his Command, and ſtay there until Artamenes did know the quality of the Priſoner: As ſoon as he had ſaid ſo, a reſentment of love and jealouſie, moved Hydaſpes to tell his Friend, that this Priſoner was his Rival; and leſt he ſhould take any advantage of his abſence, he was glad he was a Priſoner, and would be glad he did continue ſo until the war were ended; obliging him notwithſtanding to treat him very well, during all the time of his Captivity, which ſeemed would be long.

Meliantes was accordingly conducted unto this little Caſtle, and left there under the keeping of him who commanded there in chief. But, Madam, to return unto the laſt Lover of Arpaſia, and unto the Nephew of Protogenes, give me leave to tell you, that the deſign which Aſtidamus of Alſenes had of ſurprizing the Caſtle, and the deſign of the other Aſtidamus alſo, was to make a mutiny in the Garriſon, againſt him who commanded it, to the end they might become Maſters of Arpaſia, and they were ſo ſtrangely conducted by the deſtinies, that the execution of both their deſigns was to be in one and the ſame night, and alſo in one and the ſame hour: So as, Madam, never was diſorder like unto this, in which we were; for whilſt the Souldiers which this new Lover had gained, went unto the Chamber of him who commanded in chief, with intentions either to turn him out of the place, or to kill him if he reſiſted, Aſtidamus of Alſenes, in the head of three hundred men, which the Governour of a neighbour Garriſon (who was his friend, and called Lycander) had given him, he came and ſet Ladders againſt the walls of the Caſtle.

You may eaſily imagine, how the Commander in chief was ſurprized; to ſee himſelf aſſaulted by his own Souldiers; alſo you may imagine, how the other Aſtidamus was aſtoniſhed, to ſee that the Caſtle ſhould be ſtormed by men whom he knew not; however, be they who they would; he muſt think upon defending himſelf: but ſince he would not have enemies both without and within alſo, he cauſed him who commanded the Caſtle for Gabrias to be ſtabbed, and alſo all the Souldiers who were of his intelligence to be killed.

But ſince the execution of this cruel Command required ſome time, it gave ſo much time unto Aſtidamus of Alſenes, as to get many of his men into the Caſtle; then there began ſuch a horrid combate, as the very memory of it makes me quake, we no ſooner heard this hideous noiſe, but we got up in all haſte, and not being able to do any thing elſe, we fell unto our prayers.

But, Madam, whilſt Aſtidamus of Alſenes did his beſt to make himſelf Maſter of the place, and whilſt the other Aſtidamus did reſolutely defend it, they heard a noiſe of armed men approaching, ſo as both ſides taking the allarm, both Aſtidamus of Alſenes, and the other Aſtidamus, thought how only to get away Arpaſia, ſo as both of them underſtanding where her Chamber was, they both went unto it, but by two ſeveral ſtairs.

Imagine, I beſeech you, what a pitiful caſe we were in; for on the one ſide, we heard a voice of the ſecond Aſtidamus, who we heard had killed the Commander of the Caſtle, and all his Souldiers; and on the other ſide, we heard a voice which we knew not, for Aſtidamus of Alſenes did not ſpeak, or if he did, we knew not his voice. But our greateſt amuſe was to hear on both ſides the name of Aſtidamus called upon, ſo as we would not open the door unto either of them. But at laſt, Aſtidamus of Alſenes firſt breaking open the door, we ſaw him enter with a drawn ſword in his hand, and immediately after, three of his men forced Arpaſia to go down the great ſtairs, and I following her very cloſe, we were carried into the Court, we were forced upon horſeback, thus they carried us away, maugre all our complaints and cries, before the other Aſtidamus could oppoſe it, for he being in a ſtrait ſtair-caſe, Aſtidamus of Alfenes ſet ſome of his men to hinder his coming out, until he himſelf was got out of the Caſtle.

In the mean time, thoſe armed men which were heard, and who haſtened the carrying away of Arpaſia, were not ſuch as he ſuppoſed them, for he underſtood by Lycander, whom he met, that the Inhabitants of the town, no ſooner heard that the Garriſon was weakned, but they took up arms, and forced him to go out of their Town, with the remnant of Souldiers which he had.

Thus, Madam, it was he who came to Aſtidamus of Alfenes, who underſtanding how he had cauſed a misfortune unto his friend, and by this means had no place of retreat near, he thought himſelf in a ſad condition.

But Lycander and Aſtidamus were in a worſe ſtate, when at break of day they perceived that their Souldiers had left them, and having now alſo ſome twenty horſes remaining, they forced us to make all imaginable haſte, we not knowing whither they would carry us.

But, Madam, the ſtrangeſt thing was that Aſtidamus of Alfenes in carrying away Arpaſia, out of reſentments both of revenge and intereſt, was more in love with her than ever, and had been culpable of being moved by adulatory Language, had ſhe pardoned this unjuſt Lover.

On the other ſide, Lycander his friend who had never ſeen Arpaſia before, was ſo taken with her beauty, that it was impoſſible for him to look upon her without wonder.

Mean time, we marched on ſtill, not knowing whither they carried us, but at laſt we came to a wood where we ſaw the other Aſtidamus appear in the head of ten or twelve horſe, who came to aſſault that Aſtidamus who carried us away. As for Lycander, he was parted from us, with four or five of his men to find out the way through the wood, through which we were to paſs: The Combate, Madam, was fierce and bloody; the two Aſtidamus's were driven to ſuch a neceſſity of thinking upon themſelves, as I do not think they thought upon Arpaſia.

She and I alighted whilſt thoſe who looked unto us, went to defend the lives of their Maſters, and the other Aſtidamus was ſo buſie in fighting with his enemy, that he took no notice of us. So that taking this opportunity, we ran into the thick of the wood, whilſt they were fighting. In the mean time, as we underſtood ſince, the ſecond Aſtidamus was killed by the other, and Lycander turning back at the noiſe which he heard, was accuſed by his friend for carrying away Arpaſia whilſt he was fighting: for the affection of Lycander unto that fair one was ſo viſible, that he perceived it: Yet this accuſation was falſe, for there was no appearance of it, ſince Lycander returned home with his men; but for all that, they quarrelled, and fought, and Lycander killed him with his own hand. After this Victory, he ſought us all the day and all the night, and all in vain, for we had hid our ſelves in a Cave, which at this time ſerved us for a Sanctuary, but the fear of wild beaſts and famine together forcing us out the next morning, we were ſo happy as to meet Hydaſpes, who after he had delivered the King of Aſſyria, whom he accompanied unto Cyrus at Cumes, he loſt his way in the wood where we met with him.

Niſide making here a ſtop, related more particularly what Hydaſpes had done for Cyrus, and the joys which Arpaſia expreſſed to meet with him, telling afterwards how an empty Coach came accidentally by, in which Hydaſpes put her: How they had ſeen men lie dead in the Wood, amongſt which Arpaſia knew her Raviſher to be one, likewiſe ſhe related the arrival of Lycander, the conteſt between Hydaſpes and him, their Combate; and all that Hydaſpes did, until he fell dead cloſe by the Coach of Arpaſia. Afterwards ſhe told the Princeſſes how Lycander having formerly an acquaintance with Atergatis in Aſſyria, intended to carry Arpaſia into that Court as his retreat; but afterwards when he ſaw that ſhe was troubled at it, he altered his deſign, and imbarked upon the Euxine Sea, and how by tempeſt they were driven unto Cholcides, where Arpaſia fell ſick through ſorrow.

The truth is, Madam (purſued Niſide) ſhe was ſo extreamly grieved at the croſneſs of her fortune, and at her fears of Hydaſpes his death, that her health was much impaired; She did nothing but talk unto me of all her misfortunes, among which ſhe reckoned this for one, that ſhe knew not what was become of the unfortunate Meliantes. But when ſhe was a little recovered, we underſtood, that Lycander hearing of Cyrus his approach, reſolved to take part with Thomyris, and obtained her protection. But to our wonder, I thought one morning at the firſt opening of our Tents, that I ſaw the miſerable Meliantes diſguiſed in the habit of a Meſſagettan; ſo that, Madam, ſince Arpaſia hath three Lovers living, and all brave men, I cannot think her at the end of her miſeries; nor that you can add any comforts unto her, but to pity her, and to let Gabrias know the miſerable condition in which ſhe is, and to intereſt your ſelf in her misfortunes.

Niſide having ended her Relation, the Princeſſes expreſſed much ſatisfaction from her, and thought it convenient, that as ſoon as they ſaw Intaphernes and Atergatis to make known by them unto Gabrias and Hydaſpes the true ſtate of Arpaſia's fortunes. But whilſt they were preparing for their great interview, which was to add conſolation unto them, they knew not that the heart of Thomyris entertained ſuch thoughts as were like to prevent them. The truth is, this Queen, who her ſelf deſired this Truce, and who wiſhed for a ſight of Cyrus, being upon the point of meeting, her heart began to tremble, ſo that ſhe could not maſter it; and as all paſſionate perſons are more apt to change their opinions than others, becauſe they are wholly guided by the motions of thoſe paſſions which poſſeſs them, ſo Thomyris now feared what before ſhe deſired, and began to be quite of another mind. For (ſaid ſhe) what is it I would ſay unto Cyrus? and what can I hope he will ſay unto me? ſhall I ſpeak unto him concerning hatred, or concerning love? Shall I appear unto him as a Lover, or as an Enemy? Is it poſſible I ſhould ever think he can change his thoughts of me, ſince I cannot change my thoughts of him? Am I now more amiable than I was when he ſtole out of my Court? No, no, but on the contrary, I am ſo unlike what I was, that I can hardly know my ſelf: When I look in my Glaſs I find mine eyes are not ſo much changed as I imagined, but yet my Glory is ſtained, and I am ſo diſhonoured, that it is impoſſible Cyrus ſhould now eſteem me, though I am not culpable of any other fault but too much loving him: And therefore ſince there is no manner of likelyhood that I ſhould change his heart, by ſuch an interview as this, I will not ſee him, or at leaſt until after Ariantes hath ſeen him: For if he ſpeak ſtill with much affection of Mandana, I muſt not ſee him at all; for if I do ſee him, I cannot afterwards treat him as the murtherer of my Son: I know very well that I can ſay I have learned ſome things which I knew not of before; but I know again, that I ſhall expoſe my ſelf by ſeeing him unto the moſt cruel adventure that can poſſibly befall any one that is in love, which is to find hatred and ſcorn in the eyes of the perſon loved. Stay therefore I will, until Cyrus hath ſeen his Rival, and I will not expoſe my ſelf to be ſcorned by a Prince whoſe Glory is ſo firmly grounded, that all the world will think whomſoever he ſcorns is worthy to be ſo.

After this, Thomyris being ſettled in her reſolution, gave all requiſite orders for the interview of Cyrus and Ariantes, for that of Intaphernes, Atergatis, Iſtrina, and the Princeſs of Bythinia. Cyrus on his ſide, prepared to ſee his Rival, and endeavoured to perſwade him, not to be her Perſecutor after he had been her Deliverer.

But to loſe no time in the interim of this Truce, in caſe that all perſwaſions proved fruitleſs, that Ingeneer with whom Cyrus had agreed, was ſo diligent in his buſineſs, that he had prepared ſo many Trees as were requiſite to burn all the wood between the two narrow paſſages, and he did it ſo cunningly by the help of thoſe Souldiers which Cyrus appointed to follow his orders; that not one of either-ſide knew of the buſineſs, excepting thoſe who were neceſſary for the execution of it.

In the mean time, the day and hour for this interview being come; both ſides prepared themſelves for it, yet theſe two interviews were performed ſeveral ways, for Intaphernes and Atergatis were conducted by the Officers of Thomyris unto a Tent where thoſe two Princeſſes whom they were to ſee ſhould be brought: That of Cyrus and Ariantes was to be on Horſe-back between the two Frontier Guards of both Camps, and in a place where the wood being divided into three ſeveral diviſions, there was a great Plain between for this interview.

In the mean time, Intaphernes and Atergatis went unto the place which they longed to be at, and they had undertaken ſo many ſeveral buſineſſes, that if they had diſpatched them all, they would not have had any time to talk of love unto their Princeſſes; for Cyrus deſired them to talk unto them concerning Mandana: Myrſiles conjured them to enquire of Doraliſa; Gabrias obliged them to know all Circumſtances concerning Arpaſia: Hydaſpes alſo conjured them unto the ſame, by the ſenſibility of their own Paſſions: So as ſince all Lovers do more willingly ſerve ſuch friends as are in love, than others, they were more ready to do a good Office for Arpaſia in conſideration of her Lover, than in conſideration of her Father, but they thought principally of thoſe joys which they were going to receive, which were ſo great, that when they entered into the Tent, where their Princeſſes were permitted to meet them, they could not expreſs their thoughts by their words.

As for the Princeſſes they were more Miſtreſſes of themſelves than the Princes: For though the Princeſs Iſtrina perhaps had as great a deſire to ſpeak unto Atergates, as unto Intaphernes, yet ſhe went to her Brother before ſhe went unto her Lover.

Atergatis for his part, without any conſideration of the Princeſs of Bythinia's rank, he ſaluted Iſtrina firſt, and went where his love invited him: The diſcourſe of theſe four Perſons at firſt was general, for ſince they were acquainted with all the ſecrets of each others hearts, and ſince their fortunes were ſo twiſted that they could not ſever them, they repeated all the misfortunes which hapned ſince they ſaw one another: They ſpake of Spitridates and Araminta, of Gadates and Gabrias, of Cyrus and Mandana: Atergatis remembred the requeſt of Myrſiles, and Intaphernes that of Hydaſpes, and the Princeſſes told them all that they thought conducing to the ſervice of Arpaſia. But afterwards falling inſenſibly into Particular talk without changing of places, Intaphernes talked in private with the Princeſs of Bythinia, and Atergatis with Iſtrina: So as in this hours private diſcourſe they renewed their affections, and tyed ſtronger knots of love than ever.

On the other ſide, the hour of the interview between Cyrus and Ariantes being come, theſe two Rivals with equal numbers of men met in the Plain which I ſpoke of before in the Wood, and according to the agreement they met on horſe-back; yet they might very well talk in private, becauſe all the company kept purpoſely at convenient diſtances.

In the mean time, the ſpirits of theſe two Rivals were very different: for Ariantes knowing he had betrayed Cyrus, he was much aſhamed to look him in the face, and if he durſt have diſobeyed Thomyris he would not have conſented unto this inrerview; yet love being a Paſſion which excuſeth all things, he conceived that his Crime being cauſed by exceſs of love, he was not ſo criminal as he thought himſelf; and he no ſooner ſaw Cyrus, but looking upon him as a Rival, and a Rival loved, his anger did diſſipate a great part of his ſhame. As for Cyrus, he looked upon Briantes as that Traitor, and ungrateful Anaxaris, who had robbed him of all his felicity in carrying away Mandana; yet conſidering how he had her in his power, his exceſs of love did cool his reſentment, alſo the laſt generoſity of Briantes, diſpoſed him to look leſs fiercely upon him. Cyrus at this time, was waited upon by Mazares, Myrſiles, Araſpes, Aglatidas, Sylamis, Mneſiphiles, Chyrſias, Chryſantes, Lygdamis, and many others. And Ariantes was followed by Octomaſades, Agathirſis, Andramites, and all the moſt conſiderable men in the Court of Thomyris, except Aripithes, who could not endure the ſight of Cyrus, but with a ſword in his hand; for being perſwaded that if Thomyris had not loved this Prince then he had been happy, he hated him moſt extreamly. But at laſt, Cyrus and Ariantes being met, and having ſaluted each other, only out of complemental generoſity, Cyrus began to ſpeak firſt.

Before I begin to ſpeak unto you (ſaid he unto him) I would gladly know from your own mouth whether I ſhould look upon you as the valiant Anaxaris, whom I moſt dearly loved, or as the Raviſher of Mandana, whom I am obliged to hate: Were it poſſible (replied he) that I could be the ſame Anaxaris I was at Lydia, or when I was Priſoner at Cumes, I ſhould wiſh your friendſhip; but ſince it is impoſſible for me to be any other than the Lover of the Princeſs Mandana; I believe that I ſhall hardly be the friend of Cyrus: Not but that I am extreamly ſorry, fortune ſhould force me to be ungrateful; but ſince, Sir, you know the power of Mandana's charms, I have no excuſe for my paſſion, but that it is above my reaſon. Though I were the moſt in love of any man living (replied Cyrus) yet love ſhould never make me do any thing which I ſhould repent of, nor which ſhould bring reproach upon me. It is ſo eaſie a matter to be juſt, when one is happy (replied Ariantes) and ſo difficult a buſineſs not to be unjuſt when one is miſerable, that it is no wonder at the difference betwixt you and me in this buſineſs: ſince you have no mind, (replied Cyrus) that I ſhould conſider you as a man which will hearken unto Reaſon, Juſtice, or Generoſity; but as a man whom Love muſt diſpence with all the duties of rational Society, I muſt tell you, that looking upon you ſimply as the Lover of Mandana, I muſt look upon you as a man who does even the very worſt he can do: For (added he, without ſpeaking a word of Thomyris's paſſion) in keeping Mandana in the power of the Maſſagettan Queen (who moſt unjuſtly accuſeth me of her Son's death) you expoſe me unto all the Rigours which Revenge is capable of, and you are the moſt unworthy Lover in the world, if you prefer your own intereſt before the life of her you love; and therefore to do juſtly, let not Mandana be in the power of Thomyris, make choice of ſuch a Sanctuary for her as may be inviolable, in any place in the world: And then not to ruin your protectors by an unjuſt war, let us end our difference by ſingle combate: It was a thing which I engaged my ſelf unto with the King of Aſſyria, though he was a Priſoner, and I have more reaſon to offer it unto a man who is in the head of an Army. For (ſaid he) out of his high generoſity, to ſhew that Love does not make me ſo unjuſt as you are, I do confeſs, that if my moſt faithful paſſion had not ſet me above all my Rivals, or if death had made me quit the right which I have unto the poſſeſſion of Mandana, then there were none in the world but Mazares who could diſpute with you for her. To give you a direct anſwer unto the propoſition which you make (replied Ariantes) I muſt tell you, that I am not in a condition to accept of it; for doubtleſs, I am ſtrong enough to hinder Thomyris from attempting any thing againſt the life of the Princeſs, but not to get her out of her hands.

Moreover, to make it appear that I am unjuſt only in matters relating to my love, I do declare, that in conſideration of thoſe obligations upon me when

I was Anaxaris, I will never fight againſt you, but in the way of war, unleſs fortune ſhould bring us together as it did in the wood, near the Fort of Sauromates, ſo as all I can ſay unto you is, that I will defend the life of Mandana, againſt the Queen my Siſter, as if ſhe were my utter enemy, and I will keep the poſſeſſion of that Princeſs againſt you as if you had never engaged me by your obligations. Provided you will defend her againſt Thomyris, (replyed Cyrus ſharply) I care not what reſolutions you take againſt me, for ſince the war I make is juſt, and ſince the gods are ſo likewiſe, and ſince my arms uſe to be fortunate, it may ſo come to paſs that the Meſſagettan Queen may come to repent of her injuries, and you alſo repent of what you have done. Fortune replyed Ariantes, is ſometimes weary with always favouring the ſame man; I know not whether fortune be weary (replyed Cyrus) but I am ſure the gods are never weary of being juſt, nor will I ever be weary of perſecuting the perſecutors of Mandana all the world over: Think therefore of what I propoſe before we part, I offer once more to fight with you, and to lay aſide all thoſe advantages which war hath given me, provided Mandana may be ſafe, yes (added this Illuſtrious Prince) I will engage my ſelf, to ſurrender the Fort of Sauromates, to carry my forces beyond Araxes, and never to make more war upon Thomyris, provided you will oblige her to put the Princeſs Mandana in ſome place of ſafety. I have already told you (replyed Ariantes) that I am able to defend the life of Mandana againſt Thomyris, but I cannot get her out of her power. Then there's an end of the truce this very hour (replyed Cyrus very angrily) nor will I ſee Thomyris; for ſince you cannot perſwade her, I am ſure I cannot: However, be you the Protector of Mandana againſt Thomyris, and to give you an example of my equity, I declare unto you, that if Mandana do prefer you before me, and have a mind to make you happy, I do declare, I ſay, that I will lay down arms and out any thoughts of revenge either upon Thomyris or upon you, I will only think to cure my ſelf by death, but yet I will hear her declaration of it from her own mouth.

Alas, alas, ſaid Ariantes, you know too well, that Mandana will not pronounce ſentence on my ſide, and therefore I can ſay no more unto you, than what I have already: Since it is ſo (replied Cyrus ſharply) I muſt retire and prepare my ſelf to fight with you in the head of my Army, ſince you will not otherwiſe. When I meet you ſo, replied Ariantes, I ſhall defend my ſelf as I have done. And perhaps I ſhall vanquiſh you as I have done (ſaid Cyrus, and retired.) As this Prince pronounced theſe laſt words with much haſte, ſo Ariantes did not well underſtand them, but returning a doubtful anſwer which Cyrus underſtood not neither, they both of them retired looking fiercely upon one another, and ſaying no more. Yet a very notable difference might be ſeen in the fierceneſs of theſe two Princes: for there appeared in Ariantes a mixture of ſhame and melancholly amongſt the fierceneſs of his countenance, but in Cyrus, nothing could be ſeen but great and Heroick: For though the fire of his anger ſparkled in his eyes, yet he had a majeſty in his Countenance, and ſuch a kind of nobleneſs and grandure in his carriage, and ſuch a ſprightly activity in his looks, as his anger appeared to be very terrible. He turned himſelf twice or thrice towards his Rival after he was parted; but as for Ariantes he had not power to do the like, for he having virtuous inclinations, he had a ſtrange repugnancy in himſelf, as oft as his love did force to things or thoughts againſt virtue.

However, as ſoon as Cyrus ſaw Mazares and Myrſiles, he told them all the diſcourſe which Ariantes and he had, for ſince they ſtood at diſtances in the wood they had not heard what they ſaid: but he ſpoke unto them with ſuch a ſprightly countenance, as made it apparent to them, that he thought of nothing ſo much as to be fighting. On the other ſide, Thomyris who waited impatiently for the return of Ariantes, that ſhe might deliberate after that, whether ſhe would ſee Cyrus or no, and ſhe no ſooner ſaw the Prince her Brother, but ſhe deſired an account of this interview. Since Ariantes could not faithfully relate all the conference, leſt he ſhould move her unto ſome violent reſolutions againſt Mandana, he would never touch upon that ſtring; but though out of a reſentment o love unto his Miſtreſs, he durſt not incenſe Thomyris againſt his Rival; yet that Princeſs having a piercing apprehenſion, plainly perceived that there was no hopes, Cyrus would not ceaſe loving Mandana, ſo that having no diſpoſition to ſee him, ſhe coloured it with a pretence, that ſhe had received ſome Letters which adviſed her that it was not expedient to expoſe her ſelf unto that interview, which ſhe reſolved upon with Cyrus, ſo as by this means that Prince was delivered from this trouble: Yet he had the conſolation to underſtand by the return of Intaphernes and Atergatis, that Manaana was not ill treated, and excepting the ſollitude in which ſhe lived, ſince the death of Spargapices, ſhe ſuffered under no notion of violence. However, the truce being ended, Cyrus bethought himſelf of excecuting his deſign; ſo as giving all requiſite orders for it, he was ready the next night to try the rare ſecret of the Ingineer, which would burn all the wood between the two ſtrait paſſages, and cut of all communication between the enemies quarters. Cyrus then having made choice of ſuch troops as were to aſſault the enemy at that place which was moſt weakly guarded, he prepared himſelf for the excecution of this enterprize which was of ſo great importance.

Yet he did not quit that quarter which he poſſeſſed near the other paſs, leſt the enemy ſhould diſcover his deſign.

In the mean time, the project of the Ingineer did take admirably well: For he judiciouſly foreſaw, that the wind would riſe to favour his enterprize, and would riſe ſo, as would blow the flames towards thoſe Enemies which would relieve thoſe which Cyrus aſſaulted and not towards the troops of that Prince. Night being come, Cyrus ordered his men fit for an aſſault; but before he marched, he acquainted the officers with the fire, which would be on their left hand, and they acquainted their ſouldiers, ſo as the thing paſſing from mouth to mouth, every one was prepared in a quarter of an hour, not to wonder at an accident ſo extraordinary, but on the contrary, to believe that the victory would be certainly theirs, almoſt without any danger.

This being the ſtate of things, Cyrus in the head of his troops, began to march towards the paſs: But leſt the aſſault ſhould precede the burning, aſſoon as that Prince began to march. the Ingineer according to his firſt deſign, did ſet fire unto twelve trees which he had prepared to receive it; and ſo judiciouſly, that thoſe twelve trees being in ſeveral places, and in the midſt of many others which were rubbed with the ſame compoſition, immediately all that wood which ſeparated the two paſſes was in a flame, Cyrus making his aſſault at the ſame time that the fire began, the enemy was ſtrangely ſurprized, yet ſince he who commanded that paſs, was a very brave and gallant man, he made a ſtout reſiſtance, in hopes that the fire would not run through the wood, and in hopes he ſhould be relieved by Aripithes who was at the other paſs, but he was deceived in his hopes, for the conflagration was ſo great, that never was object more full of terrour and aſtoniſhment.

In the mean time, ſince the wind wafted the flames towards that ſide on which Aripithes was, they never hindred the march of Cyrus his troops, ſo as they had all fire on their left hand without any trouble unto them; but on the contrary it helped them in their way with light, and was a terrour to the enemy they were to fight withal. Not but that this valiant Commander who had the Guard of that paſs, and was a Sauromate by birth, did moſt couragiouſly oppoſe Cyrus; and Aripithes on his ſide being advertiſed of the Aſſault which was made upon that Paſs, he would needs come in perſon to defend it: But the flames being an obſtacle unto him, he was forced to go a great way about to oppoſe the paſſage of Cyrus: but this great Prince did not give him any time for it; for ſeeing that the valiant Sauromate whom he had before him, would rather periſh than forſake the paſs which he guarded, he would needs make the aſſault in perſon, and fell on ſo couragiouſly, that he forced him to give ground. And as thoſe who fight retyring do not always preſerve their uſual judgment; ſo this valiant Sauromate retyred towards the Wood which was on fire, yet ſince Cyrus conceived that by driving him further, he ſhould leave the paſſage ſo open unto his Troops, that Mazares and Myrſiles might paſs whilſt he was fighting; he did force him on ſo vigorouſly, as it might in ſome ſort be ſaid he did drive him too far. And indeed this couragious Sauromate ſeeing himſelf and his men in a moſt terrible extremity, he turned his valour into deſpair, and did ſuch prodigious Acts of Valour, as Cyrus was never in all his life in ſo much danger as now: And that you may the better know into what danger this great Prince was expoſed; be pleaſed to know that driving thoſe valiant Sauromates towards the inflamed Trees, in hopes to force them to yield themſelves, he alſo had engaged himſelf in the fire; for ſince the Souldiers who did according to the commands of the Ingineer, he unluckily prepared ſome Trees to receive the fire in a place where he did not command them, and where Cyrus did not think any had been prepared, ſo it chanced that the fire took hold of theſe Trees, inſomuch as Cyrus who was fighting with the Sauromates, was upon a ſudden in the midſt of fire and flaſhing flames; yet he was ſo fully reſolved to vanquiſh this valiant Sauromatan Commander, that he ſtill purſued him: Never was Combate more terrible than this; the great light which was in all the Wood, did make a ſtrange fury appear in the countenances of the Combatants: Their Arms did gliſter exceedingly, and the fire and ſmoak together did ſo alter objects, as Cyrus was hardly knowable; but though he could not be known by the colour of his Complexion, yet he was by his valour. In the mean time, the flames increaſed, and the blows of Cyrus falling thicker, the Sauromates to avoid them, did run into that part of the Wood which was moſt in flames, and thinking thereby to avoid his purſuit, a huge Tree did fall and gave a ſtop unto their flight, ſo as they dyed in a moſt horrid manner. Moreover the horſes being frighted at this fall of fire, they carried their Maſters into the moſt dangerous places of the Combate, theſe miſerable Animals chuſing rather to avoid the flames than their Riders Enemies: the rumbling of the wind which blew the flames, added unto the crackling of leaves, the falling of fiery Trees, and to the ſhrieks of dying and vanquiſhed men, did make a noiſe more hideous and terrible than the murmuring of the enraged Sea and moſt loud thunder together could do. Cyrus thus being in this condition, at laſt ſaw all his Enemies dead, except that valiant Sauromate whom he deſired to overcome, and one other, and he ſaw himſelf abandoned by thoſe few men which followed him, not that they were fled, but the fall of an enflamed Tree having ſeparated them from Cyrus, they knew not how to come at him again; ſo as this great Prince was alone in the midſt of fire and flames, againſt two moſt terrible Enemies. However in lieu of being aſtoniſhed, he became more valiant and hardy, and fought it out with ſuch ſtrange vigour, that he vanquiſhed the two Sauromates, for he ran the one through the body, and wounded the other in his right Arm and thigh, and came with ſuch fury upon him, that he overthrew his horſe, which to avoid the flames left his Maſter wounded and diſarmed, for his Sword broke in the fall, ſo that getting up again with much ado, he ſaw himſelf at the mercy of this Conquerour, and at the mercy of the fire. But Cyrus being infinitely admired for his valour and clemency, when this Sauromate had yielded himſelf, and Cyrus ſaw him without Arms, or Horſe, or power to walk, he let him get up behind him, purpoſely to ſhew him the way through this enflamed Wood and Labyrinth of fire (as I may call it) in which he was engaged: So this valiant Priſoner accepting the offer of his illuſtrious Conquerour, he got up behind him, and turning ſometimes to the right hand, and ſometimes to the left, to avoid the Flames and fall of Trees, they came at laſt to the place where Mazares and Myrſiles had drawn up all their Troops, not taking any care for him, becauſe they imagined that he was returned unto the entrance of the Wood, as ſoon as he was aſſured of the paſſage: But he was no ſooner with them, than they underſtood from the mouth of his Priſoner what miracles he had done, and how generous he was in ſaving his life. However, the better to merit the commendations which his Priſoner had given him, he cauſed him to be ſet on horſeback behind Ortalgues, who had orders to carry him unto the Fort of Sauromates, to ſee him dreſſed, and to have a great care of him: Afterwards this great Prince left Mazares and Myrſiles to bring all the Troops through the paſſage, whilſt he himſelf went beyond the Wood, and drew them up into Battalia as they paſſed, leſt Aripithes or Ariantes ſhould come and charge them in diſorder. And to act with as much Prudence as Courage, he did not disfurniſh that Quarter which was near the other paſſage, but guarded that which he had already paſſed, that he might make uſe of it upon all occaſions.

In the mean time, he had no reaſon to fear his being aſſaulted; for the fireing of the Wood, and the noiſe of Cyrus his paſſage had put the Enemy into ſuch a terrible diſmay, as they were not in any condition to make any attempts: So that within two hours after the Sun was up, Cyrus was gotten on the other ſide of the Wood, in the head of his Army, drawn all up into regular Battalia, with the loſs of a very inconſiderable number of men.

PART

PART X. BOOK II.

AS Fortune is pleaſed to entail happy events upon ſome, and miſery after miſery upon others after her own Capritious humour; So Cyrus had not only the advantage to paſs his Army, but he had alſo the joys to know that Claxares had ſent him a very conſiderable body both of Horſe and Foot; and he underſtood alſo that Tigranes and Spitridates would arrive within three days at the Town where the Princeſs Oneſile and the Princeſs Araminta Quartered, and by conſequence to have two of the moſt valiant men in the world in his Army. But whilſt he had theſe Conſolations, Thomyris who was come unto her Troops which were not far off from the Vanguard of Cyrus, was in a moſt incredible deſpair, when ſhe ſaw the Army of an Enemy whom ſhe could not chuſe but love, and when ſhe ſaw it had paſſed thoſe ſtraits which ſhe hoped to have kept until all the reſt of her Forces were come up which ſhe expected, ſo as never thinking of defending or guarding the paſſes ſhe called back the Troops of Aripithes, and was extreamly offended at him, though he was in no fault, yet ſhe chid him as if he could have kept the wood from being burnt; or as if he could have marched through the Flames to relieve them whom Cyrus aſſaulted.

In the mean time, the Wood continued ſtill burning, and Thomyris beheld the Flames from off a little Hill, thinking all the Horizon that way had been circled with a Girdle of fire. The truth is, the Conflagration was ſo great, that if the wind had not ceaſed upon a ſudden, it had not been ſo ſoon extinguiſhed. But at laſt, the Air being ſerene and calm, the fire did not communicate it ſelf, but as ſoon as thoſe trees which were on fire were conſumed, the fire extinguiſhed of it ſelf, ſo that after this, that wood which was ſo pleaſant and delightful, was become one of the moſt affrighting objects in the world; for beſides the great heaps of cinders, and extinguiſhed coals, which might be ſeen, one might behold ſome trees ſtanding, but without leaves or branches, only ſtumps blaſted, though not burnt down, ſo as it was become a terrour to the pretty birds which harboured in it, and could not afford them the branch of one tree for an umbrage. Cyrus alſo could ſee the Fort of Sauromates from his camp, and indeed the place was ſo altered, that it ſeemed not the ſame it was.

In the mean time, though Cyrus had a great deſire to march towards Thomyris, yet he durſt not advance any further, until he had ammunition for his Army; and though he was not far off from Thomyris, yet he knew he could not force her to fight, becauſe of a little River which favoured her retreat: And indeed, Ariantes thinking it not expedient to fight until all the forces which Thomyris expected were Joyned, he ſent ſome Troops to defend the Ford over that River, and retired himſelf near the Tents Royal, intrenching himſelf ſo advantagiouſly, that it was very dangerous to aſſault him: After which they held a council of war, wherein it was reſolved to hazard a battel, as ſoon as thoſe forces which they expected were arrived.

On the other ſide, Thomyris and Ariantes were like to fall out again, for that Queen ſeeing that Mandana's guards were more affectionate unto Ariantes than unto her, ſhe intended to change them; to the end, that if ſhe loſt the Battel, yet ſhe might have that Princeſs in her power, and to make uſe of her, either for her revenge or for her ſafety. But ſince Ariantes was no leſs afraid that Mandana ſhould fall under the power of Thomyris, than under the power of Cyrus, he did ſo earneſtly oppoſe her deſign of changing him who commanded Mandana's guard, that ſhe durſt not perſiſt in her reſolution, in a time when the leaſt diviſion in her Army might make them eaſily overcome.

However, ſince ſhe ſent ſeveral orders to haſten up the troops, they made ſuch haſte, that they came unto the general Rendezvous, before Cyrus was in a condition to advance, and arrived without any danger, for being beyond the Tents Royal, Cyrus could not hinder them from joyning. But this great Prince was ſo extreamly impatient of fighting, that as ſoon as all things neceſſary for the ſubſiſtance of his army were ready, he marched towards the Enemy, who for a time diſputed the paſſage over the River, but at laſt they left it, and Cyrus cauſing immediately, many bridges to be made with faggots and planks, for the paſſage of his Infantry, he got over all his Army in a day and a half, and put them into battel array. But as he was juſt ready to march, the wiſe and vertuous Anacharſis came unto him, who ſeeing things at the very laſt extremity, beſeeched Cyrus to let him go and feel the pulſe of Thomyris once more: For, Sir, (ſaid he unto him) I conceive that Mandana will be in more danger if ſhe loſe the Battel, than if you loſt it. Could you perſwade me of that (replyed Cyrus) I think that I ſhould ſuffer my ſelf to be overcome. However it be, Sir, (replyed Anacharſis) I conceive that to make the gods propitious unto you, it is requiſite that you take ſuch a courſe as that you may not be accuſed of all the blood which will be ſpilt in this Battel, which you are going to fight, and therefore, I beg of you three days to try what my laſt endeavours can do: I muſt confeſs wiſe Anacharſis (replyed Cyrus) I cannot chuſe but wonder you ſhould have any hopes that Thomyris will change her mind: But ſince I cannot deny ſuch a man as you, I am contented you ſhould ſee Thomyris, though I conceive it is againſt my honour to talk of any peace, after ſuch advantages as I have gotten. On the contrary, Sir, (replyed Anacharſis) Conquerours may make propoſitions of peace with honour, it is only the conquered who can demand it with ſhame, nor would I go unto this Queen as an Envoy from you, Sir, but only as a bare Mediatour, and as a man who ſeriouſly conſiders the loſs of ſo many brave men, as muſt needs be loſt in the battel; ſo paſſing for no more than a Mediatour between you and Thomyris, you may both of you deny what I ſhall propound, if you have a mind, but however I will never be upbraided with neglecting any thing that may ſtop the effuſion of ſo much innocent blood as needs muſt be ſpilt, be the War never ſo juſt. After this Cyrus being unwilling to deny Anacharſis who ſaid he would not retard his deſign above three days, he told him that he conſented unto it; and commanding a Herald to conduct him, this wiſe Scythian went unto Thomyris. As ſoon as he came unto the firſt of her Troops he was ſtopped, and that Princeſs being immediately advertiſed of his Arrival, ſhe imagined that this virtuous Scythian was come more at the inſtance of Cyrus than his own, ſo as flattering up her ſelf in a falſe grounded hope, ſhe commanded he ſhould be very civilly uſed and brought unto her.

In the mean time, Anacharſis knowing that things difficult are never brought to paſs at firſt, he reſolved to behave himſelf ſo as that Queen might imagine that he did not tell her all he had in commiſſion to impart, to the end that ſtill hoping for more ſhe might not ſuddenly ſend him away as ſhe was wont, but might give him time to tell her all his reaſons, and might let him ſpeak with Ariantes alſo: And indeed this Sage Scythian carried himſelf with ſo much Prudence that Thomyris did hearken unto him very plauſibly, and he tempered her ſpirit, that he wanted but a little of perſwading her, that if ſhe would ſet Mandana at liberty, ſhe might hope Cyrus would change his mind; yet he ſpake nothing which might poſitively be ſo interpreted; but telling her in general ſhe could never be happy as long as ſhe was unjuſt; her prepoſſeſſed imagination did ſo deceive her, that ſhe demanded a Truce the ſecond time: So that Anacharſis returning unto Cyrus, and coming back again unto Thomyris: A Truce was concluded for five days before any of either ſide knew why it was made, or upon what they would treat. However, made it was, and all well meaning perſons about Thomyris and Ariantes were buſier then ever to inſpire their thoughts with more juſt reſentments than thoſe which love gave them. As for Cyrus, there was no queſtion but he would yield unto peace with Thomyris, provided ſhe would reſtore Mandana.

But whilſt all theſe uſeleſs Negotiations were tranſacting, Spitridates and Tigranes came unto the Town where Oneſile and the Queen of Pontus were; And Fortune at laſt, as averſe as ſhe had been unto Araminta and Spitridates, permitted them the joyes of ſeeing each other again: Yet the interview of theſe four perſons had ſome ſadneſs mixed with their ſatisfactions; for it was impoſſible for them to meet without remembrance of the King of Pontus his death, and of that of Phraartes, and that with thoughts ſuitable to the cruelty of their Fates. But the Princeſs Oneſile did ſo manage the matter that their joyes were above their ſorrows. After they had talked a long time in Oneſile's Chamber, Araminta going unto her own, Spitridates waited upon her, and had private conference with that Princeſs, whom he had never ſeen, ſince he cauſed her to get out of Cabira whither Artanus had carried her, and from whence ſhe intended to go into Armenia, where ſhe thought the King of Pontus her Brother was: He not being able to expreſs his joyes at the ſight of that fair, virtuous, and charming Princeſs, after ſo many misfortunes, he made his complaints unto her in a moſt paſſionate manner. I ſee, Madam, (ſaid he unto her) that miſeries are inſeparable from Spitridates, ſince I am extreamly grieved that my words are not able to expreſs my joyes that I have the honour once more to ſee you. I aſſure you, Sir, (replyed Araminta moſt obligingly, that to imagine your joyes, I need only meaſure them by my own. Ah, Madam, (ſaid Spitridates) as obliging as your Language is, yet I am ſure it is unjuſt, for it is not poſſible you ſhould be ſo glad to ſee me again, as I am to ſee you, and to have the liberty of telling you all the Torments that I have endured: you have had one, Sir, (anſwered ſhe, and half ſmiled) which I adviſe you not to remember me of, for after ſo many reaſons of commending you, I have no mind to complain againſt you. I underſtand you very well, Madam, (ſaid he unto her) you would know all the Torments which the unfortunate Spitridates hath endured when he was a Wanderer, a Fugitive, a Priſoner, wounded and abſent; but you would not hear of the Torments which he endured when he was ſo bold as to be jealous: And yet he hath been more miſerable by reaſon of his jealouſie, than by all the reſt of his misfortunes: But, Madam, ſince it is your pleaſure to have it ſo, I will ſubmit, and will not excuſe my weakneſs, but ask a pardon for it, and will undergo any puniſhment you ſhall pleaſe to inflict.

Afterwards theſe two illuſtrious perſons calling unto memory all the adventures which had befallen them from their Infancy until now, they found the number of them ſo great, that they admired how they were able to endure them, and they had ſeen ſo great an example of giddy Fortunes inconſtancy, as they durſt not aſſure themſelves of any long continuance of the happineſs which they then enjoyed; yet upon ſecond thoughts, they believed that ſince they had now met together, there could not any fortunes befal them worſe than before: So as confirming that innocent affection which they had formerly promiſed, it may very well be ſaid, that the knot was faſter tyed than ever before. Spitridates not knowing that Cyrus treated Araminta as Queen of Pontus ſince the death of her brother, he ſpoke unto her as acknowledging her ſo, although her Father was in poſſeſſion of that kingdom which gave her that Title; and indeed he behaved himſelf like a Prince who was worthy to reſemble Cyrus, and who indeed did reſemble him as near in the Qualities of his Soul, as in the Features of his face. On the other ſide, the particular diſcourſe between Tygranes and Oneſile, was with as much tender, ſolid, and ſincere affection, as could poſſibly be found in two perſons who loved moſt dearly: For Tygranes had not renounced all the Civilities and reſpects of a Lover, though he was the husband of the admirable Oneſile: The fair Telagene had alſo a ſhare in the joys of theſe two illuſtrious Perſons; and the wiſe Heſionide was ſo glad to ſee Spitridates again, that Araminta her ſelf could not be more.

In the mean time, ſince Spitridates and Tygranes underſtood that there was a Treaty in agitation, they made no ſuch haſte in going unto Cyrus: But Oneſile conceiving that if the Army of this Prince ſhould move further off, Araminta and ſhe ſhould hear ſeldomer from thoſe who were ſo dear unto them, ſhe propounded unto the Queen of Pontus, to go unto the Fort of Sauramates, of which Cyrus was Maſter, and there wait the Succeſs of the War: Araminta liking the motion, they propounded it afterwards unto Tygranes and Spitridates, who not thinking of any danger unto the Princeſſes in that place, and finding it very convenient for them if the War continued, they thanked them for their intentions, and prepared to wait upon them thither; and ſo they departed the next morning: But to the end they might be received unto the Fort without any ſtop, Tygranes ſent to acquaint Cyrus, with the intentions of the Queen of Pontus and the Princeſs Oneſile, ſo as that Prince being very glad of the news, he gave all neceſſary orders for their fit reception into that Fort, preparing himſelf to make a viſit unto theſe Princeſſes, ſince the Treaty would permit him, and ſince it was not above four hours riding between his Camp and the Fort: and he was ſo quick in his buſineſs, that Tygranes and Spitridates intending to come unto the Camp, were not ſet out of the Fort when he arrived; ſo as being much aſhamed they ſhould be thus prevented, they went to meet him, and aſſured him that had they not thought he had been buſie about the Treaty, they would not have ſtayed ſo long before they had kiſſed his hand. I come not hither, Sirs, (anſwered that Prince) to receive excuſes for a buſineſs which deſerves none, but only to participate of your Joys which you have both given and received to and from the moſt excellent Princeſſes in the world. Afterwards Cyrus asked them why they ſtayed ſo long in the Port where they landed, and they told him that at firſt, it was to put themſelves into an equipage fit for coming into the Army, and that afterwards they ſtayed there a while, to know whether the great reports of a Rebellion in Bythinia were true or no, but hearing no certainty of it, came at laſt to the place where love and honour did invite them.

After this, Cyrus and Spitridates making a ſhort repetition of both their misfortunes, Cyrus moſt obligingly told that Prince how he was very glad that he did not reſemble him in one thing. It is ſo glorious, Sir, to reſemble you in all (replied Spitridates) that I wonder you ſhould ſay ſo: Doubtleſs you will agree with me (ſaid Cyrus) as ſoon as I have told you that you have great reaſon to be well ſatisfied in being not ſo far off the Princeſs you love, as I am off her whom I adore, but that you may be no longer from her (ſaid he moſt ſweetly) let me carry you unto her, and ſo Cyrus went unto the Chamber of that Princeſs with whom was Oneſile: The ſight of this Prince did ſo ſurpriſe Araminta, that ſhe could not chuſe but bluſh in remembrance of that unjuſt jealouſie which Spitridates apprehended: yet ſince ſhe knew him to be perfectly cured, ſhe preſently recollected her ſelf, and the converſation was that day very agreeable.

The Prince Indathenſis, Atergatis, Silamus, Mneſepherſes, and Cherſias, did wait upon Cyrus this little journey, ſo as it was impoſſible that ſo many excellent wits ſhould be together, and their diſcourſe not be infinitely pleaſing. Spitridates and Intaphernes imbraced each other by the orders of Cyrus, and ſo did Atergatis and Spitridates, from whom that Prince underſtood that it was they who had delivered Araminta.

But Cyrus intending to dine at the Fort, after he had made his firſt viſit unto the Princeſſes, he would make a ſecond unto the King of Hyrcania, who was brought thither after he had received his wounds in the laſt battel; afterwards he would go and ſee the valiant Sauromate alſo, whoſe life he had ſaved after he had vanquiſhed him, by carrying him out of the Flames, in which he had periſhed, had not his generoſity ſaved him. But in going thither, one of the Guard belonging to the Fort, brought two men unto him, who ſaid they were ſent thither; and Cyrus was very gladly ſurprized to ſee that one of them was the jealous Leontidas: Alſo he no ſooner ſpied him, but he went and very kindly imbraced him.

Dear Leontidas (ſaid he unto him, after the firſt complement) I pray tell me whether I muſt owe my joys of ſeeing you unto your jealouſie, or unto my good fortune? Truly, Sir, (replied he) I know not well unto whom I owe the honour I have to ſee you, but I am come hither, becauſe the Prince Thraſibulus ſent me, becauſe my own inclination invited me, and becauſe my bad fortune hath driven me from Alcidamie, before I have had experience of the worſt kind of jealouſie; and yet I think, replied Cyrus, that you have had experience of all ſorts that are, for you have been jealous of Policrates, who was your ſuperiour, and of Hyparchus, who was your inferiour in all things. I think, I ſay, you have been jealous of a man who was your friend, and of another who was your enemy, and had tryal of all ſorts of jealouſie under the Sun.

There was only one kind, replied he, but ſince it is the moſt terrible of all, I have no mind to expoſe my ſelf unto it. When we are in a place more convenient, replied Cyrus, and when I have more leaſure, you ſhall inſtruct me with the concluſion of your adventure, ture, but in the interim I pray tell me how fares the Prince Thraſibulus, and the fair Alcionide? They are both of them ſo happy in each other, replied Leontidas, that nothing can trouble their felicity unleſs the thought of your misfortunes, and of that they are very ſenſibly grieved; alſo they both of them charged me to tell you, how ſadly they think themſelves concerned for you, and the Prince Thraſibulus in particular commanded me to make a tender unto you of all that is in his power, and I left him in a reſolution of coming to ſerve you in perſon, if he underſtood from me that the war was like to laſt long; and to ſend him word how the true ſtate of things doth ſtand, was the chief reaſon of his ſending me unto you.

After this, and after Cyrus had returned a very obliging anſwer unto the kindneſs of Thraſibulus, he thought upon his deſign of viſiting that valiant Sauromate, whoſe life he had ſaved: So as Leontidas followed him with the other who was with him, whom he preſented unto Cyrus as his friend, whoſe name was Democedes, and they were witneſs of the diſcourſe between this generous Conquerour, and this brave Priſoner, and they took greater delight in it, becauſe it was in Greek, their natural Language. As for Cyrus, it was no wonder to them he ſhould ſpeak it as well as his own, but they were extreamly aſtoniſhed to hear a Sauromate ſpeak Greek, and they could not chuſe but expreſs their admiration unto one another. Cyrus half hearing them, and half gueſſing what they ſaid, he told that valiant Priſoner who ſtill kept his bed, that he was much hououred in being commended by Grecians, and ſuch as were the moſt accompliſhed men in all Greece; for Leontidas is ſuch a one of my own knowledge, and Democedes in being his friend muſt needs be the like. If Democedes had no other advantage than in being my friend (replied Leontidas) he would not have gotten that great opinion which is due unto his merit; But, Sir, when I ſhall have acquainted you, that he is the intimate and particular friend of Sapho, and that he is brother unto the deareſt friend of that famous Lesbian, I believe you will think the commendations which he gives, are of a far greater value than mine. How, ſaid Cyrus, is Democedes the friend of Sapho, and Brother unto the fair Cydnon, whom I ſaw at Mytilene: Yes, Sir, (replied Democedes) I am the Brother of Cydnon, and the friend of Sapho, who hath talked a thouſand times of the illuſtrious Artamenes: For you know, Sir, that when you landed at Lesbos, you went under that name. I beſeech you do me the favour (replied Cyrus) to tell me in what condition that illuſtrious perſon is? Sir, (replied Democedes) I cannot well tell, for I come into Scythia to ſee if I can hear any news of her: If you only deſire to know how ſhe does (replied the Priſoner) I am able to ſhorten your journey, for it is not long ſince I ſaw her; you do both of you ſo much ſurpriſe me (replied that Prince) as I cannot tell what I ſhould think: For Democedes, ſays he, came into Scythia to ſee Sapho, and at Sauromates, ſays he, I ſaw her not long ſince; and if the laſt of theſe be true, ſaid Democedes, I ſhould be very glad of it; and if what you ſay be true, replied Cyrus, I ſhould think it very ſtrange: For how could Sapho leave her own Country, and come unto one ſo far diſtant? The adventure of that admirable Lady is ſo extraordinary, replied he, as nothing can be ſtranger; yet her life is not filled with ſuch great events, as commonly happen unto perſons of a higher fortune than ſhe is of. But for all that, there is ſomething ſo ſingular and particular in her Fate, as that it may very well be ſaid, ſuch things have hapned unto Sapho, as never hapned unto any: Happen what will (replied that valiant Sauromate, whoſe name was Mezontes) I am able to tell you of ſome things which you cannot know without me.

Cyrus was extreamly deſirous to know what both of them knew, but ſince he was afraid of making the Queen of Pontus and the Princeſs Oneſile ſtay over long, he left Democedes with Mezontes, conjuring him to tell at better leiſure, what he had heard and knew concerning Sapho; after which, he went unto the Princeſſes. Oneſile who was giving an excellent Judgment upon a queſtion in diſpute, the Princeſs Araminta to commend her, ſaid, that ſhe did not think that the famous Sapho who was talked of over all the world, could judge better upon verſes, than ſhe could do of every thing, ſo this giving Cyrus an occaſion to ſpeak of her, he told them all that he heard of that illuſtrious perſon, and commended her ſo highly, that they were confident ſhe did merit that reputation which ſhe had: So as much deſiring to know her adventures, they beſeeched Cyrus, that he would intreat Democedes to relate them; ſo as coming with Leontidas and many others into Araminta's chamber, preſently after dinner, Cyrus acquainted him with the curioſity of the Princeſſes, and deſired him to give them that ſatisfaction, yet ſince there is a neceſſity of my returning to the Camp, (continued he) I muſt needs ask you whether the relation will be long, and whether it will be told in the compaſs of two hours? Sir, replied he, one may if he pleaſe, Epitomize the largeſt Hiſtory into that time, and I will ingage my ſelf Sapho's ſhall be no longer, though there be many long diſcourſes which I ought not to omit if you deſire theſe Princeſſes ſhould very well know the life of this excellent Perſon. Since time is ſo precious, ſaid Araminta, let us not loſe it, but to the end this ſtory may be better heard, let us go into my Cloſet; ſo Araminta, Oneſile, Cyrus, Telagenes, Spitridates, and Indithyrſes, went into a little Tent, which ſhe uſed as a Cloſet, and all the reſt ſtayed with Intaphernes, and Atergatis, and Tigranes, who diſcourſing upon this conflagration which helped the Army of Cyrus unto an eaſie paſſage, they never thought of following them.

However, theſe ſix perſons were no ſooner in a place with Democedes, but Cyrus intreated him to begin his relation; but I beſeech you, ſaid he, ſince theſe Princeſſes do not know Sapho, only by reports, tell them exactly who ſhe is, before you acquaint them with her adventures; for doubtleſs nothing doth more attract the ſpirits of thoſe who are to hear the Hiſtory, than to make them well acquainted with the perſon whom it concerns; the commands you impoſe upon me, Sir, replied Democedes, are very hard to be obeyed; for it is not ſo eaſie a matter to draw the picture of the heart, and mind, and all the inclinations of a perſon, as it is to draw the picture of her face, ſince there is requiſite a certain ſpirit of diſcernment, which does know to find out a difference between things ſemblable, and things real, and without which, one cannot make a true reſemblance: He ought to know how to diſtinguiſh all the ſeveral degrees of melancholly, and mirth, and not content himſelf to ſay in general, that ſuch a one is ſerious, or ſuch a one is merry, as many men do, for certainly there are a thouſand petty obſervations to be made, which make a great difference in tempers which ſeem not oppoſite; yet that is it which makes the reſemblance true: For as all women, who have great, gray, and ſweet eyes, do not reſemble one another, ſo there are a million of perſons of whom the ſame things may alſo be ſaid, which yet do not reſemble one another, neither in their minds, nor faces, and therefore as I ſaid before, it is requiſite to have the art of putting a difference between the melancholick and the ſerious, and between the diverting and the merry, when one will draw ſuch a Picture as requires neither penſils nor colours. I perceive by what you ſay (replied Oneſile) that when you have ſhewed us the picture of Sapho, I ſhall know her better than I do my ſelf. Though I have the advantage to know that admirable Lady (replied Cyrus) yet I am confident that you will know her better by Democedes than I do.

To ſpend no time in commending the painter, who muſt draw this fine piece (ſaid Spitridates) I beſeech you oblige him to begin his work. A- raminta ſeconding Spitridates, Democedes began his relation, addreſſing his ſpeech unto the Queen of Pontus.

The Hiſtory of Sapho.

SINCE it is very natural for every one to commend ſuch things in which themſelves have intereſts, I think, Madam, it will plead my excuſe, if in commending the admirable Sapho, I alſo commend her Country, becauſe it is my own; and if in obſerving unto you all the advantages of her birth, I tell you that ſhe was born in one of the moſt delectable places in the world. The very truth is, Madam, the Iſle of Lesbos is both ſo pleaſant, and ſo fertile, as the Egean Sea hath none comparable unto it: This Iſle is big enough in ſome places to make one think it is joyned to the Continent, but it is none of thoſe which are ſo mountainous as they ſeem to be, only a huge maſſe of Rocks in the midſt of the Sea: Nor is it like ſome of thoſe which have no riſing ground in them, but ſeem always expoſed unto the fury of the waves, which inviron them: But on the contrary, the Iſle of Lesbos, can boaſt of all the varieties which any great Kingdom joyned to the continent, can produce. For towards the Eaſt, it hath mountains and great woods, and towards the Weſt, Meadows and pleaſant Plains. The air there is pure and healthy, the goodneſs of the ground produceth plenty: Commerce is great and free, and the Continent ſo near towards Phrygia, that in two hours one may when they pleaſe ſee a Foreign Court. Moreover, Mytilene the Metropolis, is ſo excellently well built, and hath two ſuch goodly Ports, that ſtrangers admire them, and find much delight in ſtaying there.

This, Madam, is the place of Sapho's birth, the wiſe Pittacus is the Prince of it, and attracts an infinite number of accompliſhed men. He had a Son called Tyſander, a man the moſt rarely qualified in the world, and who did contribute much to the pleaſure of the place, yet ſince it is long ſince he died, I ſhall ſpeak no more of him, though he was one of Sapho's Adorers.

Now, Madam, after I have acquainted you with the place of her birth, I will ſay ſomething of her quality, ſhe was the daughter of a man of note, called Scamandogenes, of ſo noble a race, that no family in Mytilene could ſhew a longer or more unqueſtionable pedigree: Sapho again had the advantage to be the daughter unto a Father and Mother, who were perſons of great ſpirits and virtue, but ſhe was ſo unfortunate as to loſe them ſo ſoon, as ſhe received from them only her firſt inclinations unto goodneſs, for ſhe was but ſix years of age when they died, 'tis true, they left her under the tuition of a Couſin, who had all requiſite qualities for the education of a young perſon, and they left her an eſtate much below her merit, yet enough, not to ſtand in need unto any: nay more, to appear very decent and handſomly in the world.

Yet ſhe had a Brother called Charaxes, who was left very rich: For Scamandogenes when he died, divided his Eſtate very inequally, and left much more unto his Son than his daughter, though, to ſay truth, he did not deſerve it, though ſhe deſerved a Crown. Indeed, Madam, I do not think all Greece ever had any perſon comparable unto Sapho, yet I ſhall not now relate unto you any paſſages of her infancy: for ſhe was ſo very little while a Child, that at twelve years of age, ſhe was ſpoken of as a perſon whoſe beauty, ſpirit, and judgment were already ripe, and made all the world to wonder: only thus much let me tell you, that never was in any found inclinations more noble, nor a greater aptneſs to learn any thing ſhe deſired to know.

However, though Sapho was charming even from her very Cradle, yet I will draw you the picture of her perſon and mind, only as ſhe is at this preſent, to the end you may the better know her.

Give me leave to tell you then, Madam, that though you hear ſpeak of Sapho as the moſt charming perſon of all Greece, yet you muſt not imagine her to be one of thoſe, in whom Envie cannot find a fault: But yet you muſt know, that though ſhe be none of thoſe which I ſpeak of, yet ſhe is able to inſpire greater paſſions than the greateſt beauty of the Earth: And though ſhe ſays ſhe is very low, when ſhe would detract from her ſelf, yet ſhe is of a reaſonable ſtature: but ſo noble, and ſo well made as poſſibly can be deſired As for her Complexion, it is none of the higheſt Luſtre, yet ſo well, as none can ſay but that ſhe is very fair: But her eyes are ſo unexpreſſibly lovely, ſo fair, ſo ſweet, ſo quick, ſo amorous, and ſo ſprightly, as the luſtre of them ſtrikes to the very heart of thoſe ſhe looks upon: The truth is, they ſparkle like fire, and yet have ſuch a paſſionate ſweetneſs, as ſhews that Vivacity and Languer are not things incompatible in the eyes of Sapho: That which made their greateſt luſtre was, that there never was a greater oppoſition than was between the black and white of her eyes, and yet this great oppoſition did not cauſe any harſhneſs to appear in them: But there was ſuch an amorous kind of ſpirit which did ſweeten them in ſuch a charming manner, as I do not believe there was ever any perſon, whoſe looks were more dreadful. Moreover, ſhe had many things which are ſeldome found together: For her phyſiognomie was both ſubtle and modeſt, and yet ſhe had a kind of grandure and haughtineſs in her Garb and Air: Her face was oval her mouth little and red, and her hands ſo admirable, as if they were made to take hearts; or if you knew how dearly ſhe loved the Muſes, you would ſay they were worthy to gather the faireſt flowers of Pernaſſus. But, Madam, theſe are not they which make Sapho moſt amiable: For the charms of her wit do infinitely tranſcend thoſe of her beauty: And indeed it is of ſo vaſt an extent, as it may moſt truly be ſaid, that what ſhe underſtands not, cannot be reach'd by any other: And ſhe is ſo wonderfully pt to learn any thing, that ſhe hath made it her own, before you would think ſhe began to learn.

Firſt, ſhe had naturally an inclination to compoſe Verſe; and ſhe has ſo happily improved her ſelf, as none whoever excells her: And ſhe hath invented ſuch ſingular meaſures as Heſiode and Homer were ignorant of; and they have found ſuch an approbation in the world, as that they bear the name of the inventor unto this day, and are called Saphiques.

She wrote alſo moſt admirably in Proſe, and there was an amorous Character upon all the works of this rare Lady, that ſhe moved and ſoftned the hearts of all ſuch as read what ſhe writ. I have ſeen her compoſe a Song upon a ſudden, which was a thouſand times more moving than the mourning Elegie could be: and her wit had ſuch an amorous way with it, as none other beſides her ſelf ever had. She expreſſed her ſelf in ſuch things as were moſt difficult, moſt dilicately: And ſhe knew ſo well how to read an Anatomy Lecture upon an amorous heart (if it be lawful to ſay ſo) that ſhe could make an exact deſcription of all its jealouſies, all its inquietudes, all its impatiencies, all its joys, all its diſguſts, its murmurs, its deſpairs, its hopes, its fears, its revolts, aud all the tumultuous imaginations of it.

Moreover, the moſt admirable Sapho did not only know what belonged to matters of Love, but alſo much better what belonged to matters of generoſity: Indeed ſhe knew ſo perfectly how both to write and ſpeak of every thing, that there was nothing which did not come within the compaſs of her knowledge; and yet one would not imagine it a knowledge infuſed: For Sapho had ſeen all that was worthy of ſight, and took much pains to be inſtructed in all that was worthy of curioſity.

Moreover ſhe played upon the Lute, and ſung paſſing well, ſhe danced with an excellent grace, and would divert her ſelf and others moſt admirably in a harmleſs Rallary, and which was moſt admirable in her: This perſon who was ſo knowing in ſo many ſeveral things, knew them without the leaſt ſpark of oſtentation or pride, and without ſcorning thoſe who knew them not; her diſcourſe is ſo natural, ſo free, ſo eaſie, and ſo gallant, as one ſhould never hear her talk in general Company, but of ſuch things as a perſon of a good wit might talk of without having ſtudyed for what ſhe knew: Not but that knowing men might ſee that Nature alone could not arrive at that height ſhe did; but it was becauſe ſhe was ſo careful to keep her ſelf within the Sphere of her own Sex, as ſhe almoſt never ſpoke of any thing but ſuch as was within the compaſs of a Ladies knowledge, and it was to her very ſingular good friends, that ſhe would impart the depth of her knowledge unto: yet it muſt not be imagined that Sapho affected any groſs kind of ignorance in her Converſation: But on the contrary, ſhe was full of witty and pleaſant conceits.

Moreover, ſhe could ſpeak ſo ſingularly well, both unto things ſerious, and things gallant and Airy; as it was admired one perſon ſhould have talents ſo oppoſite. But what is moſt worthy of commendations in Sapho is, that in the whole world there was not a Perſon fuller of goodneſs than ſhe, nor more generous, nor more officious, nor leſs intereſted. Again, her friendſhip was full of fidelity: her ſoul was ſo tender, and her heart ſo paſſionate, that queſtionleſs, it was a ſupream felicity to be the friend of Sapho: For ſhe had ſuch an ingenious ſpirit, and ſuch a witty way of inventing new means to oblige thoſe whom ſhe eſteemed, and to make them know her affection, that though ſhe ſeemed not to do any extraordinary thing, yet ſhe perſwaded them that ſhe loved them dearly: She was abſolutely incapable of envie: And ſhe would do Juſtice unto any merit, with ſo much generoſity, that ſhe took greater delight in commending others, than in being commended. Beſides all this, ſhe was full of complacency, which without the leaſt dram of baſeneſs in it, was infinitely agreeable: and if ſhe at any time denied her friends, ſhe did it with ſo much civility and ſweetneſs, that ſhe obliged them by her denyal: And imagine, I pray, how ſhe would oblige them if ſhe ſhould grant them her friendſhip and confidence. This, Madam, is the compoſition of the rare Sapho, whoſe brother is fraught with inclinations far different from thoſe of his admired Siſter: Not but that Charaxes had ſome qualities which are good, but with all he hath many bad ones.

He had courage indeed, but it was a beſtial courage, ſuch as makes a Dog more valiant than a Deer, and not ſuch a generous valour as is requiſite in a compleat man. But, Madam, this rare woman being ſo accompliſhed as I have deſcribed her, ſhe made ſo great a rumour in Mytilene, notwithſtanding all her modeſty, and care to conceal her knowledge, that fame carried her name throughout all Greece, and that ſo glorious ly, that until then, never any of her Sex had ſo great a reputation.

The greateſt wits of the world were greedy of her Verſes, and all Greece preſerved them with care and admiration, yet ſhe did impart them with ſo much difficulty, and ſeemed to value them ſo little, that it augmented her Glory. Moreover, one could never know what time ſhe took to make them, for ſhe was a daily viſitor of her friends, and one ſhould hardly ever ſee her either read or write: and ſhe was ſo good a diſpoſer of her time, that ſhe had ſome for her ſelf, and ſome for her friends. Moreover, ſhe was ſuch an abſolute Miſtreſs of her own mind, that what cares ſoever were in her Soul, they never appeared in her Eyes, unleſs it was her mind they ſhould. But, Madam, I have not ſaid enough yet of the moſt admirable Sapho; for I muſt further tell you to the end you may the better perceive her judgment, that there were ſome perſons whom ſhe honoured with her amity. And amongſt the reſt there were four who had the principal ſhares in her diverſions: The firſt was called Amithone, the ſecond Erinne, the third Athys, and the fourth Cydnon my Siſter.

However, though it be not handſome to commend ſuch as are near allied unto us, with the ſame ſincerity and applauſe as others, yet to the glory of Sapho, I ſhall ſpeak of them all very advantageouſly. For ſince Cydnon was her firſt friend, it is but juſt I ſhould juſtifie her choice.

And to begin the deſcription of theſe four, give me leave to tell you, that Amithone was a very big woman, of a very advantageous ſtature, and a goodly preſence; who though not rarely fair, yet ſhe attracted looks, and pleaſed infinitely; her humour was weet and agreeable, ſhe ſpoke moſt elegantly, and without any learning but what ſhe gleaned from the diſcourſe of Sapho, and ſuch accompliſhed men as talked with her, ſhe underſtood things of moſt deep and difficult knowledge: And the great natural parts which the gods had given her, together with the ſociety of learned people, enabled her to ſpeak with much judgment.

As for Erinne, it was otherwiſe with her; for her wit and ingenuity was all cultivated with abundance of care; ſo as though her natural endowments were not ſo great as thoſe of Amithone, yet Art had ſo ſuppli'd the deficiency of Nature, that her company was infinitely charming; her fancy would not reach ſo high as Amithone's, yet ſhe would compoſe good Verſe; and if the modeſty of Sapho may be credited, they are to be preferred before hers.

As for the fair Athys, it may well be ſaid, that ſhe had all the goodneſs of the other two; for ſhe had naturally abundance of wit, and did polliſh it by many noble Sciences, and the converſation of all the accompliſhed men in Mytilene. Sapho alſo had inſpired her with that air of modeſty which rendred her ſo charming, inſomuch as ſhe could not endure any ſhould tell her, that ſhe knew any thing more than other Ladies did; nor would ſhe ever confeſs that ſhe knew any thing, but by the guide only of common ſenſe, and the uſage of the world; her Perſon was infinitely charming, her ſtature good, her Hair flaxen ſo light, that it may be well termed fair, the whole proportion of her Face was infinitely agreeable, her Mouth was a wonder; her Noſe well proportioned, her Eyes ſparkling, her Air modeſt, and her Humour ſweet.

However, though theſe three Ladies were moſt admirable, yet Cydnon was more loved by Sapho than they all three. And further than this, Madam, I know not how to give you my own Siſters Picture, and yet I think it is allowable to commend her, though only in juſtification of Sapho's choice; and therefore let me tell you, that all thoſe who uſe to ſpeak of her beauty, do report her fair and handſome, though ſhe be little and brown; but ſince it is not by the handſomneſs of her perſon, that ſhe got the amity of Sapho, I will ſpeak more of her humour and wit, than of her beauty. Be pleaſed to know then, that Cydnon is naturally merry, gay, ſweet, obſequious, and complaiſant: ſhe has a certain ſpirit of expedition which makes her never find any difficulty in doing any thing for her friends. Doubtleſs ſhe was knowing enough in all excellent Sciences, and verſed her ſelf in ſuch things as moſt ſuited with the humour of Sapho. The mirth of Cydnon is not exceſſive, nor at all given to Rallary, unleſs it be in a moſt innocent manner.

Theſe four perſons, dwelling near Sapho, they were ſo often together, that they were inſeparable. Not but that they viſited other Ladies alſo, but not with ſuch Aſſiduity as they did her: And the union betwixt them was ſo great, that none uſed to invite any one of them unto a Feaſt, unleſs they invited all.

You may imagine, Madam, that theſe Ladies were followed and courted by all the Gallants of the time, which I aſſure you were no ſmall number, eſpecially when the Prince Tiſander the Son of Pittacus was in love with Sapho. Since this Prince was her firſt Conqueſt, I know not whether I ſhall keep within my preſcribed compaſs, and be a little longer in my ſtory than I reſolved, yet I ſhall not ſtand to make any exact deſcription of his merit: for ſince he is dead, that will but ſerve to move pity for his ſad fate, only let me tell you thus much, that he was a man who merited the eſteem of the illuſtrious Cyrus, and his ſorrows for him alſo after death. Tiſander then being a moſt rarely accompliſhed man, and in the prime of his youth, there was a great meeting at Mytilene about the marriage of Amithone, who married a man hugely rich, and who for certain reaſons of ſtate was much looked upon by Pittacus: who honouring the Feaſt with his preſence, and with the Prince his Son. Tiſander then ſpoke unto the fair Sapho the firſt time. But his wonder was to find her ſo ſad, though at a Wedding, and the Bride her Friend. So that taking occaſion at that lovely melancholly which appeared in her eyes to begin acquaintance with her: Perhaps you may think me very bold, lovely Sapho, (ſaid he unto her) for beginning my diſcourſe with you, as if you had as great a confidence in me as I wiſh you had, yet I cannot chuſe but ask you why you are more ſerious this day, than I have uſed to ſee you in the Temple, where ſometimes I had the honour to meet you; for truly, having a long time deſired the happineſs to ſpeak unto you, I ſhall now be exceeding glad to know whether I ought to pity you for any misfortune which hath fallen unto you, to the end I may at the firſt beginning of our acquaintance, render you ſome teſtimony of affection by my ſenſibility of whatſoever concerns you. Your language, Sir, is ſo obliging, replied Sapho, that it deſerves I ſhould acquaint you with the cauſe of my ſadneſs, which perhaps you will find ſo ſlight, that you will not be much troubled to be a ſharer in it, for truly, Sir, (ſaid ſhe, and ſmiled) I muſt acquaint you that I never was at any marriage feſtival, without melancholly, and my mind is ſo very irregular, that I cannot rejoice at the happineſs of Amithone, though ſhe be one of my deareſt friends, and though I am as ſenſible a perſon as any is in the world of any joys which happen unto thoſe I love. Doubtleſs, Madam, dam, replied Tyſander, then you do not look upon marriage as a happineſs. The truth is, Sir, replied Sapho, I look upon it as a ſlavery. Then, Madam, replied Tyſander, do you look upon all men as Tyrants. I do look upon them (replied ſhe, as men that may be ſo, as ſoon as they become huſbands. This imagination comes always into my mind when I am at any marriage, and I am ſure, that a melancholly will ceaſe upon me, by reaſon of that little intereſt which I have in the happineſs of that perſon who is to be married. I am extreamly afraid, Madam, replied Tiſander, that this your hatred of Marriage in particular ſhould proceed from your hatred of all men in general, and yet, believe me, you would be very unjuſt, if you ſhould advance your own Sex ſo much above ours. The truth is (continued he) if there were many ſuch women as your ſelf, you had ſome reaſon for it, nay if there were only two or three ſuch in the whole world, I ſhould conſent unto it. But lovely Sapho (purſued he) ſince you are the only one in the whole world, who hath found out the Art, to unite all the virtue, and all the good qualities of both Sexes, in one ſingle perſon: I beſeech you content your ſelf to be eſteemed or envied by all women, and ſo to be adored by all men without hating them in general.

Since I cannot be unjuſt (replied ſhe) I know very well, that I ought not to aſſume unto my ſelf any ſhare in thoſe praiſes which you give me, and I know that there are many men ſo excellently accompliſhed, as they deſerve all my eſteem and may obtain ſome ſhare in my friendſhip: But as ſoon as ever I look upon them as Husbands, then I do look upon them as Maſters; Maſters are ſo apt to become Tyrants, as I cannot chuſe but at that time to hate them, and to thank the Gods, that they have not given me any great inclination unto that fatal thing, which they call marriage. But, Madam, replied Tiſander, when ſome happy and rarely accompliſhed man ſhould move your heart, perhaps then you will change your mind: I cannot tell, Sir, replied ſhe, whether I ſhall change my mind or no; but I am ſure, that I had rather even loſe my wits than ever loſe my liberty; and I am fully reſolved never to make my Slave my Tyrant. I am ſo far from conceiving (replied Tyſander) that there can be any one in the world who dares be ſo bold as to ceaſe obeying you, that I am confident none dare command you. For how can it be imagined that a moſt admirable Lady who is knowing in all things: Nay, I beſeech you, Sir, (ſaid Sapho, and modeſtly interrupted him) do not ſpeak thus, for I know ſo very little, that I know not whether I have any reaſon for what I ſay. As ſoon as ſhe had ſaid ſo, one calling away Tyſander about ſome buſineſs, he was forced to leave Sapho, but he left his heart with that fair one, nor was this love long concealed; for Tyſander being young, and of a quality which attracted many eyes upon him, every one did preſently perceive his love unto Sapho; for he went unto her the next day after the marriage of Amithone, and was obſequious and courtly to her, as there was no doubt, but that he was in love with that moſt admirable Lady. At that time all manner of pleaſures were in their higheſt luſtre at Mytilene, and every day had its freſh diverſions.

In the mean time, Tyſander's Fate being not to get the love of Sapho, and her Fancy could not comply that way, ſhe only eſteemed him, and acknowledged the favour of his affection, but could not follow the counſels of her brother, who adviſed her to ſacrifice her liberty unto Fortune, by anſwering the love of that Prince. But Sapho naturally hating Marriage, and not affecting Tiſander, ſhe would by no means conſent unto it, though ſhe were ſure ſhe might marry him with the conſent of Pittacus. However, ſince he was ſtill in hopes to win her affection, he courted her with a thouſand Entertainments, and filled the Town full of diverſions, inſomuch as the little Court was ſo full of gallantry as none could be more. Indeed the admirable rable Sapho had inſpired ſuch a ſpirit of politeneſs into all that converſed with her, which alſo did communicate it ſelf unto thoſe who never ſaw her, as it was a wonder that it ſhould not ſpread it ſelf through all the Town of Mytilene, and alſo throughout all the Iſle of Lesbos, but it did not; for Envy, Ignorance, and Malignity, kept almoſt half the Town from being benefited by the converſation of Sapho and her friends. But to ſay truly, ſhe was no loſer by not ſeeing theſe kind of People, unto whom the Grandure of her ſpirit and wit was a terrour. Few ſtrangers ever came to Lesbos, who went not immediately unto the admired Sapho, and who went not out charmed with her diſcourſe: And certainly they had reaſon, for it was impoſſible for any to talk two hours with her without a high eſteem of her, and without a great inclination to love her. Alſo there was a knot of five or ſix of us men who were inſeparable, and who always waited upon Tyſander when he went unto Sapho, and who ſometimes went unto her without him, when her ſeverity made him ſo melancholly, that he would not go.

In the mean time, the ignorant and envious Caball which was oppoſite unto ours, did talk of us in ſuch pleaſant manner, as I cannot think upon it without a little wonder: For they ſaid, we never talked of any thing at Sapho's but Poetry, Philoſophy, and myſterious queſtions; and I think they ſaid, that we taught Magick there alſo. The truth is, theſe profeſſed Enemies unto all Wit, Senſe, Reaſon, and Virtue, are a moſt dangerous ſort of People; for I found that the moſt rational amongſt all thoſe who ſhunned Sapho and all her friends, were a ſort of Young, Fine, Sturdy, and merry Fellows, who made it their brag, that they were no Scholars, and whoſe ignorant vanity made them ſo bold as to cenſure and judge of what they knew not, and who were perſwaded that men of parts and wit did nothing but talk of things which they underſtood not: Thus did they talk of theſe Perſons whom they ſhunned with much care, and made ſuch extravagant Tales of them, as were moſt ridiculous unto ſuch as were in their Senſes. But beſides this generation of People who are capable only of a Vapory and diſordered kind of Jollity, there was alſo a ſort of women which I rank together with them who ſhun the company of Sapho and her friends, and who are alſo full of their own frothy Rallary: Truth is, they are a ſort of women who think it their duty to know nothing unleſs that they are fair, and how to dreſs themſelves; women I ſay, who never talk of any thing but Faſhions, whoſe Gallantry conſiſts in eating the Collations which their Gallants beſtow upon them, and whoſe diſcourſe is nothing but moſt egregious folly.

There was alſo another generation of Women, who thinking that exact Virtue requires a Lady ſhould know no more than how to be wife unto her Husband, Mother unto her Children, and Miſtreſs of her Family, they think Sapho, and her friends ſpend too much time in Converſation, and that they ought not to diſcourſe ſo much upon things which are not of abſolute neceſſity.

There are alſo ſome of theſe men who look upon their wives as the chief Servant in the houſe, who forbid their Children to read any books but Prayer-books, and who will not allow them upon any terms to ſing one of Sapho's ſongs.

Again, there was ſome both men and women who ſhunned us, and who without Injuſtice cannot be counted amongſt the dull herd of beaſtly people, ſince they are Perſons of quality. And indeed, there were ſome men of ingenious parts, being prepoſſeſſed with a falſe imagination, who believed our way of living was ſuch as theſe ignorant men reported; and who not endeavouring to un-deceive themſelves, reſted in their errour. Truth is, there was one thing which did much contribute unto their implicite belief: For, Madam, be pleaſed to know, that there was a woman in Mytilene, who having ſeen Sapho when ſhe was very young, ſhe took up a fancy to imitate her, and ſhe thought that ſhe did imitate her ſo well, that changing her lodging, ſhe pretended to be the Sapho of her quarter. But the truth was, ſhe imitated ſo ſcurvily, that never were two Perſons more unlike. You may be pleaſed to remember, Madam, how I told you, that Sapho, though ſhe was admirably knowing in all things, yet ſhe would not make a ſhew of it, and that her diſcourſe was natural, eaſie, free, and gallant. But, alas, it was quite contrary with this Lady, whoſe name was Damophile, for all her pretended imitation of Sapho.

But to make a deſcription of her, and to let you ſee the difference between theſe two perſons, be pleaſed to know, that Damophile taking a toy in her head to imitate Sapho, ſhe did not attempt to imitate her in every particular, but only in being as knowing as ſhe was, and thinking ſhe had found out a moſt myſterious way of getting more reputation than ſhe had, ſhe did all that the other did not. Firſt, She had always about her, five or ſix ſeveral Maſters, the leaſt learned of all which, I think did read Aſtrology unto her, ſhe was continually writing Letters unto ſuch men as made profeſſion of profound learning, and knowledge: She ſcorned to caſt an eye upon an illiterate perſon; fifteen or twenty books were always upon her Table, and when any came into her Chamber, one of them was always in her hand, and I am moſt certain ſhe had many more books in her cloſet than ever ſhe looked into, and ſhe read more than ever Sapho had. Moreover, Damophile was all fuſtian and bigg words, which ſhe pronounced with a grave and imperious tone, though ſhe ſpoke but of a trifle, whereas Sapho on the contrary, lapped up the moſt ſublime learning in the loweſt language.

Moreover, Damophile not thinking that knowledge and learning was comparible with Oconimick affairs, ſhe never medled with any family affairs, but Sapho, ſhe looked into every thing, even of the meaneſt conſequence: Again, Damophile did not only ſpeak in the ſtile of books, but ſhe would be always talking of books themſelves, and cited Authors in her common talk, as faſt as if ſhe were a profeſſor in ſome famous Univerſity. But the rareſt paſſage of all was, that ſhe was ſuſpected to have promiſed a very favourable ear unto an ill-favoured fellow, who had expreſſed ſome kind of tender affection to her, upon condition, that he would compoſe a copy of Verſes, and let her paſs for the Author of them, to the end ſhe might reſemble Sapho; ſhe ſought all manner of opportunities of publiſhing what ſhe knew, and even tyred people with a relation of her learning; ſo as I aſſure you, that as there is nothing more taking and charming than a woman whoſe mind is furniſhed with excellent knowledge when ſhe knows how to uſe it, ſo there is nothing more ridiculous nor troubleſome, than a woman that is fooliſhly learned.

Damophile being then ſuch a one as I have deſcribed, ſhe was a cauſe why thoſe people who ſhunned Sapho and her friends, did imagine that our converſation was like unto that Damophile, who was ſaid to imitate Sapho; ſo as a thouſand odd reports were divulged concerning us, at which we laughed when we heard of them, thinking our ſelves very happy, that the opinion which theſe men had of our ſociety, did keep them from troubling us by their preſence. As for Tyſander, ſince he was in love, he had much ado to endure theſe fooliſh reports; but puniſhed two or three of theſe wicked ſcoffers at wit, and handled them ſharply that they were forced to quit the Court.

But, Madam, to inſiſt no longer upon the love of that Prince, I will only tell you, that after he had tryed all ways poſſible to win the heart of Sapho, the Prince Thraſibulus his friend came unto Mytilene, after he had loſt his Dominions and all his Fleet, having nothing left in the world but only two ſhips. Yet that Prince having a great and reſolute ſoul, after he had been a while at Mytilene, was very deſirous to ſee the admirable Sapho, whom he eſteemed very highly.

But, Madam, ſince Tyſander's love is not the principal ſubject of Sapho's hiſtory, I will not inſiſt any longer upon it; but to tell you, that ſhe could not love him, and that he was in ſuch a deſperate condition, that he reſolved to imbarque with the Prince Thraſibulus when he went from Lesbos, and try if abſence could eure him; but he did not depart before he bade adieu unto the admirable Sapho.

Since my Siſter did know all her ſecrets, and ſince ſhe imparted all unto me after his departure from Lesbos, I underſtood all the paſſages between them, and how this adieu was taken with the fineſt diſcourſe that ever was. For Sapho carried her ſelf ſo ingenuouſly, that ſhe perſwaded Tyſander ſhe was nothing to blame in not anſwering his affection, and that ſhe had taken almoſt as much pains in forcing her heart to affect him, as he had to win her affection: Inſomuch as he parted from Sapho without complaining againſt her, though he parted from her the moſt ſad ſoul that ever breath'd.

When he was gone from Mytilene, he left a man behind him, whoſe name was Alces, a man of a ſubtle wit, who alſo had a notable faculty in Verſe, with orders to ſpeak of him as oft as he could unto the moſt admirable Sapho, and in his abſence to give him an exact account of all paſſages, to the end he might return it occaſions required. To ſay truth, he could never have choſen a man more aſſidiouſly diligent, than he was with the fair Sapho: For he being in love with the charming Athys, who was continually with her, it was an eaſie matter for him to be a faithful ſpie unto Tyſander; and the fitter for that purpoſe, becauſe Alces had a nimble and witty boy, and one that was a notable prier into privacies.

In the mean time, Sapho only eſteeming Tyſander, his abſence was no hinderance unto her Diverſions, and our ſociety was within a few days as jocund as ever it was, and more; for the diſcontents of Tyſander did ſometimes make it melancholly. Then were we a knot of five or ſix of us, who had nothing thing elſe to do, but to ſee Sapho every day: Not but that we made many other viſits; but to tell you truly they were ſhort ones, and we always returned betimes, to the end we might meet at Sapho's, where Amithone, Erinne, Athys, and Cydnon, always were. When the weather was fair, we went to take the Air, either upon the Sea, or by the Sea ſide: And when the weather would not permit us, we ſtayed at the houſe of the admirable Sapho, which was as pleaſant a ſeat as was in the world, for her Chamber, her outer Chamber, and her Cloſet were upon one floor, and looked towards the Sea.

However, to tell you the very truth, few men ever looked upon Sapho, but they loved her, or at leaſt eſteemed her above the degree of a friend: And though Alces was in love with the fair Athys, yet I have heard him confeſs that the eſteem he had of Sapho was of a higher nature than that he had of me, though he loved me exceeding well: but certainly there is a kind of ſubtile and penetrating fire in the eyes of Sapho, which at leaſt heats, if not burns all hearts.

Moreover, it muſt be imagined that our Society was full of Ceremony, for it was all natural and full of freedom: and if there was any conſtraint, it was in that we had a continual deſire to commend Sapho, but durſt not, becauſe it was offenſive to her. Sometimes we ſhould mutiny againſt her, becauſe ſhe would neither give us, nor ſhew us any of her verſes, but were put to a thouſand devices before we could obtain them.

For my particular, I had the advantage of all the reſt; for ſince ſhe truſted my Siſter, I ſaw the excellent works of the admirable Sapho by her means: And I did ſo admire the rarities which ſhe ſhewed me, and the fierceneſs of her illuſtrious friend from all manner of vanity, as I thought it a thing impoſſible to overſteem the moſt admirable Sapho. For Cydnon ſhewed me Elogies, Songs, Epigrams, and a thouſand other pieces of rare wit, ſo as I could not chuſe but wonder that a womans capacity could poſſibly reach the height of them; for her verſe was ſo true, her expreſſions ſo even, her fancy ſo noble, and paſſions ſo tender, as to think them incomparable was the leaſt I could do. However, this excellent woman whoſe knowledge was ſuperlative in all things, was more modeſt than thoſe who knew nothing: And an accident one day chanced which did plainly evidence the truth of this unto all thoſe who were together in a place where Sapho and Damophile met.

But, Madam, the better to acquaint you with the accident, I muſt tell you, that there was in Mytilene a moſt rare conſort of Muſick which the whole Town uſed to go and hear at a Lady of qualities houſe, whether Sapho and all her company went, with the reſt of the Ladies: It was an Aſſembly where the gates were open to all, where acquaintance was not requiſite, and where one might ſee a hundred perſons whom they never ſaw before, nor perhaps ever ſhould ſee again, and where all ſorts of company reſorted: Chance had ſo contrived it, that Sapho ſate next Damophile, ſo that until the Muſick began, ſhe was conſtrained to hold diſcourſe with her, and with thoſe about her. Damophile never being without two or three half-witted perſons about her, ſuch as make themſelves more able than really they are, Sapho was moſt terribly perplexed, for ſhe ſtood in fear of none more than that ſort of people: and certainly it was not without reaſon that ſhe feared them that day: For ſhe was no ſooner ſet, but one of Damophile's friends put a Grammatical queſtion unto her. Unto which Sapho negligently anſwered; and turning her head the other way, ſaid, that ſince ſhe never learned to ſpeak but only by cuſtome, ſhe could not give him any anſwer.

As ſoon as ſhe had ſaid ſo, Damophile told her in a low voice with intolerable impudence, that he would conſult with her upon a doubt concerning a verſe in Heſiode, which ſhe did not well underſtand.

I aſſure you (replyed Sapho very modeſtly, and ſmiled) you would do much better to conſult with ſome body elſe; for I never uſe to conſult with any but my Mirrour to know what worſt becomes me, and therefore I am far unfit to conſult upon difficult queſtions. As ſoon as ſhe had ſaid ſo, one came from the other end of the Room very haſtily, and asked whether it was ſhe who made the ſongs which were going to be ſung? I aſſure you (ſaid ſhe, and bluſht for anger) that I have done nothing this day but weary my ſelf with vexing; for I am ſo impatient till the Muſick begin, that I never wiſhed for any thing in my life more earneſtly.

For my part, Madam, (ſaid one of Damophile's friends) I had much rather hear one of your ingenuous Epigrams than all the Muſick: As Sapho was ready to anſwer unto this, another came with a paper in his hand, and deſired her ſhe would be pleaſed to read that Elogie, and give her opinion of it: So as ſince ſhe had much rather read the Verſes of another, than to hear others talk of hers in ſuch an odd manner, ſhe began to read them to her ſelf, or at leaſt ſeemed to do ſo; for ſhe was ſo vexed at her place, as that ſhe could not judge of Verſes though ſhe had attempted it. But that which cauſed the greateſt diſtraction, was to hear both men and women behind her, talking of her Wit, of her Verſes, and of her Learning, ſhewing her unto others, and every one ſhooting a fools bolt according to their fancies: One ſaid, ſhe did not look like a learned perſon, others ſaid that ſhe knew more than ſhe would ſpeak: And one man amongſt the reſt ſaid, that he would not have his Wife ſo wiſe as ſhe was; and a woman wiſhed that ſhe had but half her knowledge; and every one according to their inclinations commended her, or diſcommended her, whilſt ſhe ſeemed to be intent upon the paper of Verſes.

In the mean while, Damophile talked with two or three of her half-witted Companions, and ſpake ſuch thundring words, which ſignified nothing, that they being at laſt deſirous to hear two ſuch oppoſite perſons as Sapho and Damophile talk together, I was the firſt who deſired her whether ſhe would or no give back the Elogie unto him who gave it unto her, purpoſely to force her unto this Conference. And indeed Sapho being glad to ſee me ſo near her, becauſe ſhe hoped then to talk unto none but me, ſhe reſtored the Elogie unto him who made it, unto whom ſhe ſaid, that ſhe had not wit enough to judge, and therefore durſt not commend him.

After which, turning her ſelf towards me; well Democedes (ſaid ſhe unto me in a low voice) though I was very unhappy in ſitting ſo near Damophile and her friends, yet I am very glad you came to my relief: Nay, nay, Madam, (ſaid I unto her, and laughed) I came not hither to that end; for in my opinion it concerns your honour to talk, to the end the world may know that you uſe not to talk like unto Damophile: And indeed, after this I intruded into the company of Damophile, and thoſe ſhe talked unto; addreſſing my ſpeech always unto Sapho, as angry as ſhe was.

In the mean time, there was one man amongſt thoſe that were with Damophile, who indeed ſpoke very well, and began to talk of harmony, and of the nature of Love very eloquently. But, Madam, it was admirable to ſee the difference between Sapho and Damophile; for the laſt of theſe never left interrupting him who ſpoke, and making impertinent objections, which ſhe underſtood not her ſelf, nor could any elſe make any ſenſe of them. As for Sapho, ſhe never ſpake but when a queſtion did abſolutely require an anſwer from her: And though ſhe always ſaid ſhe underſtood not the thing in diſcourſe, yet ſhe ſpoke as one who underſtood better than ſome that would undertake to teach: And for all her modeſty and vexation, and maugre the ſimplicity of her expreſſions, it was apparant ſhe underſtood all things, and that Damophile underſtood nothing. The laſt of theſe, in ſpeaking much, ſaid little; and the other in ſpeaking almoſt nothing, yet ſpoke enough to make her ſelf admired. At laſt the Muſick begun; and as ſoon as it was ended, Sapho did riſe up in all haſte; and pretending ſome earneſt buſineſs, ſhe removed from Damophile, who not being willing to let her go before ſhe had given her ſome other freſh diſguſt, ſhe told her, that doubtleſs her buſineſs was to finiſh a Song which was yet in her Chamber unperfected: Sapho underſtood very well what Damophile ſaid, but ſhe would not trouble her ſelf ſo far as to anſwer. On the contrary, ſhe took me by the hand, and went on the other ſide of the room where Amithone, Erinne, and Cydnon were placed.

They were no ſooner met,but ſhe preſſed them very earneſtly to be gone, and indeed forced them to go ſooner than otherwiſe they would: I pray, Madam, (ſaid Cydnon, ſeeing her bluſh and all in diſorder) what accident hath hapned which makes you deſire to be gone ſo haſtily? When we are all in my Chamber (ſaid ſhe) I will tell you; for I muſt have a little time to recollect my ſelf, after my adventure: However (ſaid Amithone unto me) I pray tell us what hath hapned unto Sapho, for you were with her? For my part (ſaid Athyes, and gave me no time to anſwer) I cannot deviſe what it ſhould be: Perhaps replyed Erinne, that Democide doth know no more then you do. Pardon me, replyed I, for I do know, but I will not know, unleſs the fair Sapho be pleaſed to give me leave to impart it. I would not only have Amithone, Erinne, and Cydnon know it (replyed ſhe) but I would have all the world alſo know (if it were poſſibly) how I do hate Damophile and all her friends, and how ſorry I am to find ſo many fools in the world.

Sapho expreſſed her ſelf in ſuch a pretty chafe, that ſhe made me laugh: and as we were thus diſcourſing, Alces (who I told you was a man who paſſed for a good wit in Mytilene, and who was ſo) came unto us with another man of good note named Nicanor: And they came to Sapho's gate, where alſo we met a Lady called Philire, who entred alſo. As ſoon as we were entred into the Chamber, and ſet, all the Ladies asked me what the matter was: When Sapho heard this queſtion asked me, ſhe turned towards them: No no (ſaid ſhe) it is not Democedes which can tell you what I vex at: For there is none who knows it but my ſelf: I beſeech you tell us then, ſaid Nicanor, who was a well-accompliſhed man, and who had none of thoſe faults which moſt young men of his quality uſe to have. The thing you ask (replyed Sapho) is not ſo eaſie to be told as you imagine: But ſince I muſt tell you, it is, that I am ſo weary of being thought a wit, and of paſſing for a Schollar, as I begin to make it my chief felicity neither to read, nor write, nor ſpeak; and if it were a thing poſſible to forget them, I proteſt I would begin this very houre to be dumb, and would forget to read and write, and ſpeak as long as I lived: So weary am I of the fooliſhneſs in people, and of the perſecution which inſeparable is upon ſuch as have a reputation of more wit or knowledge, then how to curle their hair, and make choiſe of their Ribbands.

Sapho ſpoke this in ſuch a lovely fret, and with ſuch a ſprightly aire, that her handſome anger did cauſe more love, more liking, and more amity in the ſouls of all her Auditors. But I beſeech you (ſaid Cydnon) tell us a little more preciſely what's the cauſe of all this? How is it poſſible (replyed ſhe) that you ſhould ſee me ſit ſo long, ſo near Damophile and her pack of quarter witted perſons, and not pity me, and think that I ſpent my time very ill? Had you been of the ſame ſide where I was, (replyed Phylere, and laughed) you would not have been troubled with any over wiſe Ladies: I aſſure you (replyed ſhe) I know not where I ſhould be; for I ſaw about you four or five women, who making an open profeſſion of hating every one that has any wit, and who affect ſuch dull groſs kind of ignorance, as hath vexed and wearied me, but had you been, where I was (ſaid Nicanor) you had found better entertainment, and more complacency; for there were none but ſuch men about me as would have highly commended you. Happily they might (replyed ſhe) but perhaps not after my mode; for, Nicanor, moſt men of your quality do ſo little know how to ſpeak unto ſuch a one as I am, that they do anger me when they think to oblige me: And except theſe who are preſent with me, I know very few who have ſpoken any thing which hath pleaſed me, and yet there are ſome here alſo who have ſometimes vexed me; at leaſt I have reaſon to complain that they will not acquaint every one, how I deſire to be treated. As for Alces (added ſhe) I am ſure he knows my mind better than all the reſt of the company. Tis true, (ſaid he, and laughed) that this profeſſion of wit is very troubleſome.

How can it be troubleſome, (replyed Phylire?) and what hurt can that reputation which Sapho hath over all the world do unto her? has ſhe not great reaſon to rejoyce, that all the wits of Athens, Corinth, Lacedemon, Thebes, Argos, Delphos, and in all Greece, ſhould talk of her with admiration: As for ſuch men as know me not (replyed Sapho) I am contented they may talk as they pleaſe; but I am very ill ſatisfied with moſt of thoſe who daily ſee me; and if you pleaſe, I will make all my complaints unto you, to the end Nicanor may inſtruct the Court how they ought to behave themſelves towards wits, and to the end Phylire may acquaint the Ladies of her neighbourhood how to live with thoſe of ours, and alſo to the end that Amithone, Erinne, Athys, and Cydnon may not accuſe me of being fantaſtical in my complaints.

Therefore to ſpeak unto the point in general, I muſt tell you once more, that there is nothing more troubleſome than to have a good wit, and to be treated accordingly, if one have any birth, and nobleneſs of heart: For this is an infallible Maxim, that when one gets an applauſe from the multitudes by the flaſhes of that wit, or any reputation above another nother by writing Verſes or Proſe, they do loſe half of their nobleneſs, and are not like any of their family or kin if they meddle with writing any books; and indeed they will be treated after another manner than thoſe who never meddle with any writing; and it will be ſaid, that ſuch were deſtined only to pleaſe others, and are obliged by a Law to be ſtill writing piece after piece; and if they leave writing, they will be no longer regarded: If they be rich, it will hardly be believed, and if they be not, it is the worſt of fortune; a poor man who is not guilty of any wit, is better uſed than if he were. Yet I ſee (replyed Nicanor) that all the Court doth very much cheriſh thoſe who are addicted to writing.

I do aſſure you, (replyed Sapho) that they are cheriſhed after a very ſtrange manner, for almoſt all young gallants uſe to treat thoſe, who are addicted to writing, as they uſe to treat their Taylors and Shoomakers. Indeed they think that they have rendred all that is due to their merit when they have curſorily commended them: For my part, they cannot do me a greater diſpleaſure, than to talk impertinently of thoſe Verſes which I write only to pleaſe my ſelf. I cannot endure that one ſhould come unto me, and deſire me to make an Elogy for him, another, a Song, and a third come and ask me whither ſuch an Epigram was mine; I cannot endure that they ſhould not ſpeak unto me as they do unto others, ſince I deſire to be as others are, and cannot be diſtinguiſhed after ſo odd a manner: They do not ſpeak unto me as they uſe unto others; if they would make an excuſe for not ſeeing me, they tell me it was becauſe they were afraid to interrupt my ſtudy; if at any time they accuſe me of being too reſerved, they tell me that I am never well but when I am by my ſelf; if I ſay my head akes, they tell me it is the diſeaſe of all good wits: Nay my Phyſician, when I complain of any little pain, he muſt be telling me alſo that the ſame temper which cauſeth my good wit, cauſeth my diſeaſe. The truth is, Verſes, Wit, and Knowledge, are ſuch troubles unto me, that I begin to look upon Ignorance, and ſtupidity as the only happineſs.

The truth is, replyed Alces, the fair Sapho hath great reaſon for her complaints: and were it not for the ſatisfaction which her writing does give unto her ſelf, ſhe had never uſed her pen, though never ſo learnedly, for my part I have ſeen many Courts in the world and I have obſerved moſt horrible Injuſtice done unto all writers, every Grandee deſires to be commended but they receive the incenſe which is offered, unto them as a tribute due, without any regard unto the hand which offered: For my particular I once preſented a poem unto a Prince, who took it and liked it, but never did ſo much as ask to ſee me; yet to tell you truly, conſidering how he uſed me, I took heart and loved the Author, better than I did the Prince: And my mind better ſatisfied in having a heart more genuine than his, then if fortune had ſet me as much above him as he was above me. Oh! my dear Alces (replied Sapho) how infinitely do you joy me? For nothing gives me greater ſatisfaction than that I am able to tell my ſelf, my ſoul is more noble than thoſe, whom giddy fortune has ſet above me. But for all this I cannot choſe but oftentimes be very ſenſible of thoſe diſguſts which my reputation of wit doth cauſe unto me, for I obſerve both men and women when they talk unto me are much perplexed becauſe they have a fancy, that they muſt not ſpeak unto me as they do unto others, and they are ſo perſwaded, that I conſtrain my ſelf in ſpeaking unto them, that they conſtrain themſelves alſo to go beyond their laſt, inſomuch as I wiſh that I could Un-Sapho my ſelf; and if my heart could be ſeen, it would manifeſt, that nothing could more vex me than to take me for a witty and underſtanding woman. And therefore I conjure all the company, to eaſe me of this perſecution, by publiſhing to all the world, that I am not as I am taken to be, but that it is Alces who compoſed thoſe verſes; which paſs under my name, and that I have nothing in me which is worthy of eſteem; to the end all ſorts may let me alone in quietneſs, without either ſeeking for me, or ſhunning me: For I muſt confeſs, I would neither be courted, or ſhunned as a woman of wit.

As ſoon as ſhe had ſaid ſo, much company came in, who cauſed the diſcourſe to change; but as for Sapho, ſhe ſpoke very little all that day (as my Siſter told me) for I went out as the company encreaſed, becauſe I heard of the arival of two of my old friends, who had been long abroad in Travels. But, Madam, ſince one of them whoſe name is Phaon, hath a great ſhare in the Hiſtory which I am relating, it is requiſite I ſpeak of him a little more particularly then of the other who was called Thimiſtogenes, yet I muſt acquaint you that they were both of them Lesbians, that were practiſed in one exerciſe together, and that during our firſt years I did equally love them, and yet at their return me-thought I had loſt the one, though I ſaw them both: And to explain this Riddle, be pleaſed to know that when Phaon and Thimiſtogenes departed, I loved the laſt of theſe a little beter than the firſt, becauſe indeed he was then more amiable both in his humour and in his Perſon: But at their return I found a very great alteration, for the one was grown very ill-favoured, and the other much more handſom; the wit of Thimiſtogenes was not at all improved, but Phaon was ſo mended, that I aſſure you he much excelled him, and few men could be found more amiable then he: As for his Perſon, doubtleſs it was incomparable, for he was extraordinary fair, but ſuch a fairneſs as does not reſemble the beauty of Ladies, though he had all the good deportments of his own Sex, and all the beauty of others, his ſtature was tall and noble, though not of the higheſt pitch, his hair very brown, his eyes black and lovely, his cheeks plump, his Teeth white, his Noſe even proportioned, and his Air haughty; moreover for a man, he had moſt fair hands, a ſprightly look, a promiſing Phyſiognomy; and I know not what kind of paſſionatneſs in his aſpect without any affection, which ſpoke him very apt to become a moſt compleat Gallant. Indeed, Madam, Phaon is ſo fair, and every way ſo handſome, that the people of Lesbos invented the oddeſt Fable of him in the world: For he being the Son of a man in great reputation at Mytilene, who had commanded Navies in ſeveral Wars: The dull people ſay, that when he was very young, and playing in a little Boat near one of his Father's Sips, Venus came to him, and deſired him to carry a meſſage for her in that Boat unto a certain Iſland: And in recompence of his Service ſhe made him ſo fair as he was. Thus without any cther ground for this Fable (unleſs becauſe Phaon, contrary to cuſtom of men, was not ſo fair when he was a Child as ſince he became a man) all the people of Lesbos do believe this Fable as really as if it were a very truth. But, Madam, as Phaon is amiable in his perſon, ſo is he alſo in his humour and ſpirit; for he is very civil, ſweet and affable, and without too much mirth, or too much melancholly, he is all that is imaginable to pleaſe: Beſides this, his Air is natural, eaſie, and agreeable, he ſpeaks well, and home to the purpoſe: Moreover he had a natural inclination of Gallantry, and there was ſuch a ſutableneſs between his Perſon, his Humour, and his Wit, as one would ſay, they were made for one another. As for Thimiſtogenes, he did not at all reſemble him, not that he was very ill-favoured, but becauſe he did not pleaſe, and becauſe his Air was forced and conſtrained: Nor was it that he is without any wit at all, but becauſe, that wit he has is wrong byaſſed, and he was very ſeldom in the right, but is ſo accuſtomed to be in the wrong, that one may be almoſt aſſured to choſe well if they only take that which he choſeth not; and he is very much addicted to love all excellencies, and to court accompliſhed men, though it is beyond his reach to know them.

Theſe two men whom I have deſcribed had long travelled together without any great affection, or without much ſociety together: For as ſoon as they came into any Town their inclinations parted them, and that which pleaſed the one did never pleaſe the other. Thus they were together upon the highways, but never in any other place; according to this their cuſtome, as ſoon as they arrived at Mytilene, they ſevered, ſo as I alſo ſought them ſeverally, but could not find them; for as I ſought them they were ſeeing others, inſomuch that it was the next morning before I ſaw them: But as ſoon as I found the difference between Thimiſtogenes and Phaon, I changed alſo as they had done, for I loved Phaon better then I did Thimiſtogenes: However, ſince I was not the firſt whom they had met with in Mytilene, I found them already informed of the great beauty in Sapho, yet not by men who knew how to commend her according to her Merit: For they had only told them that ſhe was a great Wit, and underſtanding Perſon, and one that had a moſt admirable faculty in compoſing Verſes. But the wonder was, that though the ſame Character was given unto them both, yet it produced ſeveral effects, for Thimiſtogenes, out of the curioſity to ſee all Excellencies, was extreamly impatient of ſeeing Sapho. And Phaon on the contrary, who had ſeen Damophile the night before as ſhe came from the Muſick houſe, had no deſire at all to be acquainted with Sapho; and indeed he was ſo far from deſiring it, when I ſpake unto him, and offered to carry him thither, that he refuſed the viſit, in lieu of deſiring it.

But Thimiſtogenes was ſo eager, that he was extreamly importunate with me to carry him unto Sapho, though I would not, becauſe I found him unworthy of her acquaintance: And I was as importunate with Phaon to ſee her, though he would not, out of a conceit he had, that it was a thing almoſt impoſſible for a woman to be learned and not ridiculous, or at leaſt not troubleſome: Alſo the little experience which Phaon had in matters of love, had ſuffered an error to grow in his mind (which was quickly rooted out,) That it was better to be in love with a fair fool than a woman of a great wit; So as one day when I had preſſed him to go and ſee Sapho, and he obſtinately had refuſed, I was very angry with him for not giving credit unto what I told him; for (ſaid I unto him) what reaſon can you give me, why you will not ſee Sapho? Firſt, (ſaid he unto me) they ſay that Damophile is a Copy of Sapho. Secondly, I profeſs, that if ſhe be, it is impoſſible the Original ſhould ever pleaſe me, for I have found Damophile ſuch a ridiculous piece of folly, that I would run from Country to Country rather than meet with her whom ſhe reſembles. Oh moſt unjuſt friend, (ſaid I unto him) did you but know what wrong you have done unto the moſt admirable Sapho you would abhor your injuſtice, and repent of the injury done unto me, in accuſing me of ignorance in true merit: I accuſe you not (ſaid he unto me) but friend, you know every one has a ſeveral guſt, and a ſeveral fancy: And for my part I deſire only the ſight of ſuch Ladies as will divert me, and not teach me: For I am moſt terribly afraid of ſuch as ſwell themſelves into big words, for ſmall matters: Such as are always upon the top of Parnaſſus, and never talk unto men, but in the language of gods: And if you will needs have me diſcover the ſecret of my ſoul unto you, I muſt confeſs, that in Sicily I was in love with a fair fool; and I will not run the hazard of being in love with a fair wit, who perhaps will make me deſpair. Therefore I conjure you, to trouble me no more; for if Sapho be ſuch a one as I do imagine her, ſhe will make me moſt horribly hate her; and if ſhe be ſuch a one as you ſay ſhe is, perhaps I ſhall love her too well to keep my ſelf in quietneſs. But is it poſſible (ſaid I unto him) that you could fall in love with a fool; the truth is (replyed he, and laughed) I was not in love with a fool but I muſt confeſs, that there was ſuch a fair fool whom I did not hate.

I perceive then (ſaid I unto him) that one may love beauty whereſoever it is, though in a fair woman man without any wit, but I cannot imagine one ſhould love her perſon be ſhe never ſo fair: Alſo I perceive you do not know all the delicate delights of rough paſſion, ſince you never loved any but a fair fool. I know not whether I knew all the delights, replied Phaon, but I am ſure that I know all the torments: Alas, my dear friend (ſaid I unto him) you are but a Novice in love, for none are ever happy in it, unleſs they be firſt miſerable. Thoſe do not deſerve the ſweet which will not taſte the bitter; a thing muſt be deſired with inquietude before it can be enjoyed with delight: and before one can know all the ſweets of love, he muſt love a woman that hath wit. For my part, continued I, I love a fair picture which cannot talk fooliſhly, better than a fair woman who tattles, and commits a thouſand impertinencies. As we were thus talking, Themiſtogenes came in, whoſe mind being oppoſite unto Phaon's, he entreated me to carry him unto Sapho, telling me he had a very earneſt deſire to ſee her; and adding, that in all likelyhood he ſhould fall in love with her, if he found her ſuch a beauty as he imagined. If ſo, Sir, (ſaid I, purpoſely to prevent him) I muſt not carry you thither, for you would be extreamly miſerable if you ſhould become the Lover of a perſon, who has ſo many others. Thus I not being able to perſwade Phaon, and Themiſtogenes not being able to perſwade me, we parted; but I wondred when after dinner, being at Sapho's, ſhe ſhould tell me that Nicanor and Philire who had ſeen Phaon, did give him ſuch a noble Character, as though it was not her uſe to affect freſh acquaintance, yet ſhe could not chuſe but deſire his. The very truth is, Madam, replied I, Phaon is a perſon of very extraordinary merit. Since he is your intimate friend, replied ſhe, I ſhall hope he will come and viſit Cydnon, and ſo happily I ſhall ſee him at her Chamber.

I believe, Madam, replied I, that he would ſee you at your own houſe before any other place, did he not ſtand in fear of you: Alas, Democedes (ſaid ſhe unto me) why ſhould any friend of yours ſtand in fear of me? but to be plain with you, I ſhall think you have infuſed a bad opinion of me into him, if he do not come and ſee me; you may imagine, Madam, how this expreſſion of Sapho's perplexed me, knowing the mind of Phaon, as I did; but I engaged my ſelf to bring him unto Sapho, and accordingly I went very ſeriouſly unto Phaon, and deſired him to make this viſit for my ſake, if not for Sapho's; but I had much ado to perſwade him, yet being afraid to fall out with me, he yielded, but told me withal, that I muſt take this complacency as a great argument of his friendſhip, and afterwards promiſed me to go the next day with me unto Sapho: But that which moſt troubled me was, that I durſt not carry him, unleſs I carry Themiſtogenes alſo, becauſe he would be very angry with me if I had not; ſo that to carry a very pleaſing man unto her, I was conſtrained to carry a very ill Companion alſo. I advertiſed Sapho of this intended viſit, and ſhe acquainted all her dear friends with it, ſo that Amithone, Erinne, Athys, and Cydnon, were all with her when Phaon, Themiſtogenes, and I came thither: Sapho being one of the moſt pleaſing perſons in the world at the firſt ſight, and the moſt obliging when ſhe pleaſed; ſhe received us extreamly kindly, and in ſuch a gallant manner, that I ſaw very well Phaon was much ſurpriſed, and that he did not expect to find her Air ſo free, ſo amiable, and ſo natural.

As for Themiſtogenes, I obſerved that he was aſtoniſhed as well as Phaon, but it was in a different manner, yet being both of them prepoſſeſſed with an opinion of Sapho's knowledge, and conceiving they ought to ſpeak in an Elevated ſtile, they begun their diſcourſe in a grave, ſerious, and very ſolemn Tone. And though I told Phaon there needed no ſuch ſetting off himſelf in Print, yet he did not believe me; ſo that thinking he ought to commend her as a perſon extraordinary, and in the higheſt Phraſes, he began his Encomium with a very eloquent Exordium. But Sapho ſtopping his Oration, and turning towards me, I profeſs Democedes, ſaid ſhe, I have great reaſon to complain againſt you: Againſt me, Madam, (replied I with aſtoniſhment) Yes (replied ſhe) againſt you; for ſince Phaon does not know me, it were injuſtice to complain againſt him, and therefore I do poſitively accuſe you for all theſe applauds which he beſtows upon me; for had you acquainted him that I do not affect any Commendations, I believe him to be a more accompliſhed man than to turn his Complacency into ſuch flatteries as cannot chuſe but diſpleaſe me. I aſſure you, Madam, replied I, I adviſed him not to offend the modeſty of your humour: Then 'tis apparent he does not know me, replied Sapho. But Phaon (continued ſhe, and turned towards him) ſince I do not love to be beholding unto Fame, I ſhall take it as a very ſingular favour if you would judge of me only by your own knowledge: Let time and experience give you the knowledge of me: For it would be very unjuſt in you to judge of me upon the reports of others. Madam (replied Phaon, and ſmiled) I do admire your modeſty, and that's all I dare ſay; for to acknowledge that you merit more commendations than Fame doth give you, is to tell you that you merit more than ever any did. Can fame give you better report (added Themiſtogenes, thinking to hit the nail upon the head) than that a Lady can make better verſes than ever Homer did? and that ſhe is wiſer than all the ſeven Sages of Greece? However, Sir, (ſaid Sapho) I cannot endure that any ſhould tell me of any ſuch things; and the greateſt injury my friends can do me, is to think that I love to be commended: For ſince I know that I am not wiſe, I cannot endure to be told that I am: and though I were ſo, yet ſurely I ſhould hate flattery: I cannot deny but that I have made ſome fooliſh verſes; but Poetry being only an effect of a natural inclination, as muſick is, I ought to be no more commended for making verſes, than for ſinging.

After this, Sapho turning the diſcourſe upon ſome other ſubject very ingeniouſly, ſhe was extream careful to talk of nothing that might ſmell of too much wiſdom: But on the contrary, ſhe paſſed away all the afternoon in a pleaſant Raillary with her friends, twitting them with a thouſand petty paſſages concerning their Cabals, which yet were ſo intelligible, that Phaon and Themiſtogenes did take as much delight in them, as thoſe did who were acquainted with the paſſages.

Afterwards Alces and Nicanor coming in, Sapho began to chide the firſt of them for a cuſtom which he had, and which he always uſed when occaſion preſented it ſelf. For, Madam, be pleaſed to know, that Alces had ſuch a fancy of a fair woman, that he could not endure thoſe who were not ſo, and he would always be ſure to change place whenſoever chance had ſet him near any ill favoured perſon: So it hapned, when he was in Sapho's Chamber, that a Woman came in, who indeed was very ugly; he according to his humour went out, and went ſo abruptly, that the woman plainly ſaw, that he went out purpoſely to ſhun her. Sapho being deſirous to turn diſcourſe another way, began after a gallant manner to condemn his niceneſs, and in his perſon to blame moſt young Gallants of the time whoſe cuſtom was to do the like: Truly, Madam, (ſaid Alces unto her) I had not gone out at that time from your Chamber, but becauſe I deſired to go unto the fair Athys, and I do proteſt not upon any other reaſon: I pray Alces, replied Athys, make not your viſit unto me your excuſe, for you came not to me that day: Then I went unto Amithone's, added he; no, replied that fair one, for both Erinne, Cydnon, and my ſelf, did ſee you out of the window of my Chamber walking about two hours with a friend of yours, who is one of the ديglieſt men that ever any eye beheld, and who queſtionleſs is more ugly than the Lady who you ſhunned. I profeſs it is very ſtrange, replied Sapho, you ſhould have ſuch irregular thoughts: and I would gladly know why you ſhould more tolerate an ugly man than an ugly woman: and why you ſhould ſhun an ugly woman as much you would the plague: This is an injury unto our Sex, and as if women were made for no other uſe than colours are, to pleaſe the eye. This, Alces, is moſt unjuſt; for if you love that only which is fair, and hate that which is foul, why have you not fair friends, as well as fair Miſtreſſes? and why are you not as careful to ſhun ugly men as ugly women? Women as well as Men that are ill-favoured, may have a thouſand charms of wit, and a thouſand beauties of Soul, and therefore why more hated? Yet I ſee moſt young Gallants are guilty of this injuſtice: Yes, there are ſome men who are extreamly ugly themſelves, yet cannot endure a woman ſo: They deſire the faireſt eyes ſhould look favourably upon them, and yet they will look upon none but fair women with the uglieſt eyes under the Sun. I know one who looks upon himſelf in a Glaſs, as if he were the handſomeſt of all men living: and though he can look upon his own deformities with delight, yet he cannot with any patience endure the deformities of others: You expreſs your thoughts, Madam, ſo excellently, replied Phaon, that I believe Alces with all his wit will have much ado to anſwer you. I aſſure you, replied Alces, that I had rather acknowledge a fault in me, than go about to juſtifie my ſelf, ſince I cannot do it, unleſs I ſhould ſpeak many things againſt Ladies in general. You expreſs your ſelf with ſo much malignity, replied Amithone, that you deſerve (as a puniſhment for ſhunning ſuch women as are not fair) all fair ones ſhould avoid meeting with you.

Provided one fair one will not fly me (replied he, looking upon Athys) I ſhould not much grieve if all the reſt did. Though I were fair (replied Erinne) yet I ſhould be none of thoſe who would give any comfort unto you: And ſince I am not (added Athys, and bluſhed) I have nothing to do but to comfort my ſelf that I am not in the number of thoſe who can comfort Alces: For he is ſo nice, that he cannot endure thoſe (who like me) are neither fair nor ugly. This is ſo unjuſt (replied Alces) as I wonder that the fair Sapho who uſeth to be juſt unto merit, can endure it. The reaſon is, replied ſhe, becauſe it belongs not unto me to commend the beauty of Athys in your preſence: For ſince you have ſuch tender and delicate eyes as cannot look upon any uglineſs in women, I am perſwaded they are alſo judicious enough to know true beauty, and that you can commend her better than any other. However (continued ſhe) I would gladly know whether Phaon and Themiſtogenes be as nice as Alces is: As for Nicanor and Democedes, I know they have ſome friends who are none of the faireſt. For my part, Madam, (replied Phaon) though I am a great Adorer of beauty, yet I ſhould think it a great wrong unto Ladies, if I ſhould look upon it as the only advantage of their Sex: And I can aſſure you, I am ſo far from the opinion of Alces, that I am perſwaded it is not a thing impoſſible to be in love with a woman who hath no beauty at all, provided ſhe be not extreamly ugly: For there are women who have ſuch rare beauties of mind, and ſuch engaging graces in their humours, that they may infinitely pleaſe, and be very amiable. For my part (ſaid Themiſtogenes) I ſhould much better love a woman who is knowing in all high and excellent things, though ſhe were not handſom, than I ſhould an ignorant fair one. For ought I ſee (replied Sapho, and laughed) I can never be loved either by Alces, or by Themiſtogenes: For I am not fair as the firſt would have his Miſtreſs, nor am I knowing, as Themiſtogenes deſires his to be: and therefore it is my beſt courſe to make Nicanor, Phaon, and Democedes my friends: But if in ſeeking to make them your friends (replied Cydnon, and ſmiled) you ſhould find a Lover of any of them, what would you ſay then? Doubtleſs I ſhould ſay, replied ſhe, that I have found more than ever I did, or more than I do deſire.

As Nicanor, Phaon, and I were ready to reply, Cynegira entred into [illegible] Chamber, whoſe preſence made our diſcourſe to change, and Nicanor, Phaon, Themiſtogenes, and I went preſently out. Yet, Madam, ſince there was a very pleaſant Plain before Sapho's Lodging, we walked there: And after one turn, Phaon began to ſpeak in a low voice unto me, becauſe he would not have Nicanor know his opinion of Sapho. Ah dear friend, (ſaid he unto me) what an enemy had I been unto my ſelf, had I not ſeen the moſt admired Sapho? Well (ſaid I unto him) have you found her over-wiſe? does ſhe much reſemble Damophile? was there any neceſſity of talking concerning high matters as you imagined you ſhould? For my part, ſaid he, I am ſo charmed with the ſight of her, that I cannot think any one in the world comparably ſo amiable: For ſhe is ſo ſweet, ſo ſociable, and ſo gallant, as I find her all ſuperlative; and when I conſider how this excellent Woman who is verſed in the moſt ſublime knowledge, did divert her ſelf ſo pleaſingly in trivial things, I begin to fear I ſhall fall in love with her, if I ſhould continue ſeeing her: and yet I think it is impoſſible for me to forbear. I thought you would change your opinion of her (ſaid I unto him) as ſoon as you ſaw her: But I would gladly know, ſaid he, whether ſhe be always ſo amiable as ſhe was this day? and whether ſhe have no tincture of that pride, which is moſt inſeparable from ſuch as have any extraordinary parts? Tell me, friend, does ſhe always ſpeak with ſo little affectation or ſharpneſs as ſhe did now?

All I can ſay unto you is, replied I, that ſhe is ſometimes as much above what you ſaw her now, as you found her now above what you expected: Oh Democedes, replied he, it is not poſſible the fair Sa- pho cannot, no, it is moſt impoſſible ſhe ſhould appear more amiable than ſhe did this day.

After this, Nicanor began to talk with Phaon, and Themiſtogenes began to addreſs his ſpeech unto me very faintly; I muſt confeſs unto you (ſaid he unto me) I have been much aſtoniſhed this afternoon: Why, ſaid I, are you not pleaſed with the ſight of Sapho? So little, replied he, that were I not perſwaded ſhe concealed her knowledge becauſe there was many Women in the Company, I ſhould lay aſide the high opinion which I had conceived of her: For truly I heard her not ſpeak any thing this day which any other Lady did not know as well as ſhe, and might ſpeak as well. Yet you muſt confeſs (replied I coldly) that though ſhe did ſpeak like a Lady, yet it was like a Lady who ſpoke very well.

I muſt needs confeſs, ſaid he, that ſhe uſed no barbarous words; but to tell you truly, I expected much more from her than I found: Perhaps you expected (ſaid I unto him) that ſhe ſhould have read a Philoſophy Lecture, reſolved ſome difficult queſtions, and explained ſome obſcure places in Heſiode and Homer? I expected at leaſt, ſaid he, that nothing would have come out of her mouth but high matters, which ſhould have made her knowledge appear: And for my part, I tell you ingenuouſly, that I am perſwaded ſhe will ſometimes ſhew her knowledge, for it is not poſſible ſhe ſhould get ſuch a reputation over all Greece, if ſhe talked of nothing but trifles, ſuch as I heard her ſpeak of this day.

You may imagine, Madam, how I wondred at the difference of opinion between Phaon and Themiſtogenes. In the mean time, Themiſtogenes ſpoke ſo loud, that Phaon confuſedly heard what he ſaid, ſo that being now one of the moſt jealous admirers of Sapho, he came unto us, and asked me of what Themiſtogenes talked? He told me (replied I and ſmiled) that he could not ſee how Sapho ſhould deſerve all thoſe applauds which are attributed unto her; but that he expected from her a thouſand excellencies, which ſhe never ſo much as mentioned. I perceive (replied Phaon faintly) that the fair Sapho cannot get the eſteem both of Themiſtogenes and me, for I do infinitely eſteem her. After her diſcourſe upon all theſe trifles, wherewith he upbraids her; but I ſhould ſcarcely have eſteemed her, had not ſhe only talked of ſuch high matters as he imagined ſhe would; ſo that it follows of abſolute neceſſity, ſhe cannot pleaſe us both: I confeſs it (replied Themiſtogenes faintly) but the difficulty is to know whether it were not more advantageous for Sapho, to ſatisfie me than to ſatisfie you. If you pleaſe to let Nicanor and Democedes be our Judges, replied Phaon, I ſhall conſent unto it.

Since I am altogether on your ſide (replied Nicanor unto Phaon) and directly againſt Themiſtogenes, I am not a competent Judge: it is no wonder, ſaid Phaon, that Themiſtogenes and I ſhould differ in opinions, for it is not above two years ſince we were both of one mind in any thing: So as it is not ſtrange that as ſoon as I began to admire Sapho he ſhould not admire her; but prefer Damophile becauſe I prefer Sapho before all the women I ever ſaw: And indeed I have abundance of reaſon ſo to do, for to write as ſhe writes, and to diſcourſe as ſhe doth, are two qualities ſo admirable, that ſhe deſerves the eſteem of the world. But yet I pray tell me (replied Themiſtogenes in ſuch a pelt as made us laugh) what hath ſhe ſaid which hath excellency in it? She ſpoke Elegantly, and Gallantly, replied Phaon, and ſhe ſpoke with modeſty, and in ſuch a diſcreet manner, as ſhe hath merited my admiration; but not mine, replied he, for I never uſe to admire any thing but what is extraordinary: I once knew a man at Athens, replied Phaon, who was of the ſame humour with Themiſtogenes, for he knew not how to put a difference between things which men admire, and things which make men aſtoniſhed;

I cannot tell you whether I am of his humour you mean, or no (replied Themiſtogenes very fiercely) but I am ſure I cannot ſee any difference between Sapho and other women of Mytelene, by any diſcourſe I heard her utter, and in the humour I am in, if ſhe do not elevate her Muſe to a higher ſtrain than I heard her this day, I ſhall believe ſome hath made her verſes and publiſhed them in her name.

Phaon hearing Themiſtogenes ſay ſo, began firſt to laugh, and afterwards to be angry in good earneſt, ſo as replying very ſharply upon one another, they fell to quarrel: Nicanor and I ſhould have had much ado to part them, if Alces and two more had not accidentally come in.

However, ſince this quarrel could not be taken up upon the ſudden, it was the next day before they were reconciled; ſo as it was divulged all over the Town. But Phaon's advantage was, that I related all the paſſage unto my Siſter, and ſhe unto Sapho, inſomuch as the very firſt day that he ſaw Sapho, ſhe underſtood that ſhe was obliged to him.

This reconciliation had one circumſtance in it which was very remarkable; for Phaon would not be friends with Themiſtogenes, until he had acknowledged himſelf to blame in judging ſo raſhly upon Sapho's merit, ſo as this excellent Lady hearing of all the paſſages did think her ſelf very much beholden unto Phaon, and the next time ſhe ſaw him ſhe received him very obligingly, and ſhe no ſooner ſaw him enter into her Chamber, but ſhe went to meet him moſt civilly, and accoſted him with ſuch ſingular and gallant complements, that it deſerves a rehearſal: For looking upon him with a ſmiling countenance: Sir, (ſaid ſhe unto him, you have ſo commended me for not talking of high matters, that I dare ſcarcely thank you for the favour, leſt contrary to my cuſtom I ſhould uſe any ſuch big phraſes as might purchaſe the eſteem of Themiſtogenes, and loſe yours.

Your language, Madam, (replied he) is ſo full of wit and gallantry that I cannot repent of my diſguſt againſt Themiſtogenes, for he who does not admire you, deſerves an immortal quarrel from all rational men: when you are well acquainted with me, Sir, replied Sapho, you will ſee that I am not ſo jealous of my honour: And that as long as they do not aſperſe my virtue and my goodneſs, I care not what they ſay.

Afterwards Sapho cauſing Phaon to ſit down, the company were very pleaſant, for not only all her intimate friends were there, but Philire, Nicanor, and I were there alſo, and after much diſcourſe upon the Errour of Themiſtogenes, who thought every one to be ignorant if they do not talk of high things, Phylire ſaid that though groſs ignorance was a moſt odious fault, yet ſhe thought it better all women were ſo, than to be over-wiſe, for do but imagine, ſaid ſhe, what a peſtilent perſecution it would be, if we had but two or three Damoſels more in Mytelene: But I beſeech you imagine alſo on the other ſide, replied Phaon, what a felicity it would be if there were but five or ſix Saphoes in the whole world, and if Athens, Delphos, Thebes, and Argos, could boaſt of that honour as well as Mytelene. Oh Phaon (replied Sapho, and bluſhed) I beſeech you do not leſſen my obligations by overcommending me, and remember that I do not affect it, nor would I paſs for wiſe. For the truth is, that though I do know ſome things which all women do not know, yet I am ſure I know leſs than all women ought to know.

Truly, Madam, (replied Cydnon, and laughed) you do engage them unto a great task, and to ſpeak ſincerely, you know ſo much, that I cannot tell how you ſhould conceal your knowledge from them, nor how you ſhould infuſe it into them. I am very certain (replied Sapho) that I know ſo very little, that if all women would imploy that time well which they imploy idely, they would know a thouſand times more than I do. Your expreſſions, Madam, are ſo ingenious, ſo modeſt, and ſo noble, replied Phaon, that though what you ſay as relating to your ſelf be not poſitively true, yet I cannot for my life chuſe but commend you: For it is moſt certain that moſt Ladies are much to blame in ſpending many a moſt precious hour, which might be much better imployed than they uſe to do.

For my particular, ſaid Phylire, I cannot tell how Ladies can learn any thing though they would; for oftentimes, I have not ſo much leaſure as to go unto the Temple, and I have a friend who is every day ſo long in dreſſing her ſelf, that the Sun is ſet before ſhe can get out of her Chamber.

I have often thought, replied Amithone, that Sapho could not afford her ſelf ſo much time as to ſleep and do all ſhe did, until I went a journey with her into the Country; But ſince then, I have been convinced of my errour, by ſeeing her order her time ſo well, that ſhe had leaſure to do a thouſand things, which I could not do: for ſhe found as much time to ſleep as kept her complexion freſh, and her eyes in Luſtre: ſhe had time enough to dreſs her ſelf as gallantly as any did: ſhe had alſo her times of Reading, Writing, Studying, Walking, and ſtill time enough to look unto her buſineſs, and to enjoy her friends. And all this without being troubled, or being buſie. I would ſhe would teach me the ſecret (ſaid the fair Athys) for could I learn it, I would ſtrive to know more than I do. But before you oblige her to impart ſo great a ſecret, replied Erinne, I would all women here would well examine whether it be expedient that women generally ſhould know more than they do. I think that Queſtion will eaſily be reſolved, replied Sapho, for I muſt confeſs that though I am a declared enemy unto all women who are always in their Altitudes of knowledge and wiſdome, yet I cannot chuſe but extreamly condemn the other extream, and be aſhamed to ſee ſo many women of quality ſo groſsly ignorant, as in my opinion, they diſhonour their Sex. Nor know I any thing more injurious unto our Sex, than that any ſhould ſay a woman is not obliged to learn any thing: for if ſo, then would I alſo have her forbidden to ſpeak, and not taught to write: for if ſhe may write and ſpeak, it is but reaſon ſhe ſhould uſe all helps to better her underſtanding, to inform her judgment, and to learn how to ſpeak and write well. And ſeriouſly it is the oddeſt thing in the world to obſerve how women commonly are educated: They muſt not be any Goſſippers nor Gallants, and yet they are taught with abundance of care every quality that belongs to Gallantry, but never any thing that will fortifie their virtue, or improve their wits: Dancing, Singing, and Playing, are parts that muſt not by any means be neglected, but are never inſtructed in any thing which may make them ſpeak well, or carry themſelves in any buſineſs with diſcretion: And conſidering how ſome Ladies lead their lives, one would think that they were forbidden all reaſon or wit, for they do nothing in the world but ſleep, grow fat, and make themſelves fair, and never do or ſay any thing but fooliſhly; and I am ſure there's none in the company but knows ſome unto whom what I ſay is applicative: For my part, I do know one who uſeth continually to ſleep above twelve hours; who ſpends three or four in dreſſing her ſelf, or to ſay better in undreſſing her ſelf, for ſhe ſpends half the time in undoing what ſhe did before; afterwards ſhe imploys two or three more in her repaſt and collations, and all the reſt of the day is ſpent amongſt men unto whom ſhe knows not how to talk: Judge I beſeech you, whether the life of this Lady is not well ſpent: I muſt confeſs, replied Alces, many Ladies do live as you do ſay.

For my part, replied Cydnon, I am not at all concerned in what ſhe ſays, for ſince I ſpend my whole time in her company, I cannot be charged with any miſpending it: Oh Cydnon, replied Amithone, I heartily thank you for finding out ſo good a reaſon to make my ignorance excuſable; ſince I have as much right unto it as you (added the fair Athys) I may make the ſame uſe of it.

Were I as knowing as you are, (replyed Erinne) I ſhould not ſtand in need of any excuſe: For my part, (ſaid Phylire) I have no excuſe for my ſelf: For I have ſo ſeldome the happineſs of ſeeing Sapho, that I cannot make it my excuſe to have imployed any of my time in her company. And I muſt ingeniouſly confeſs, that ſometimes I trifle away a whole day, and yet cannot ſay that I had any conſiderable buſineſs: For my part (ſaid Sapho,) to ſpeak in general, the reaſon why women have ſo little time, is becauſe they ſpend it idely, and make a great buſineſs of every trifle: one miſplaced Curle is an hours rectification, and takes up more time, than a thing both of profit and delight would do, yet I would not have it thought (added ſhe) that I am at all againſt any womens ornaments or dancing, ſinging or playing, or ſuch accompliſhments: No, on the contrary, I allow them all delights and recreations: But to tell you truly, I would have them take as much care in dreſſing their minds as well as their bodies. And between being knowing and ignorant, I would have them take the middle between theſe two extreams, which will keep them from being troubleſome, by their ignorant ſtupidity or impertinent audacity. I aſſure you, replyed Amithone, this way is very hard to be found out. If any living can find it, and teach it, replyed Phaon, it muſt be Sapho. For my particular (replyed Philire) I ſhould be infinitely obliged unto her, if ſhe would be pleaſed to tell me how far a woman ought to be knowing: Doubtleſs it is very difficult (replyed Sapho) to give a general rule for what you ask: For there are ſuch variety and difference of ſpirits that no Law can be ſo univerſal, and not unjuſt.

Yet I conceive this for an infallible Maxime, that though I would have women to know more than generally they do, yet I would not have them talk as if they were knowing at all, I would have them give others leave and cauſe to ſay, that they know more than they will vaunt of, that they have good wits, that they can ſpeak well, and write elegantly, but I would not have it ſaid of them, that they are learned: Not but that thoſe who are not called learned may know as much, and perhaps more than thoſe unto whom they give that Title: yet I would have them conceal their knowledge and wits: Then I perceive (ſaid Philire) that there are ſome things which either they muſt not know, or elſe they muſt not ſhew them though they do know them. It is moſt certainly true, (replyed Sapho) that there are ſome Sciences which women ought never to learn, and that there are others which they may, yet they ought never to confeſs they know them, though they may let people gueſs as much. But, I beſeech you, unto what purpoſe is it for them to know ſuch things as they muſt never be known to know? (replyes Philire.) It will help them to underſtand what thoſe who are more learned than themſelves do ſay (replyed Sapho) and to ſpeak alſo to the purpoſe, without ſpeaking bookiſhly, but only as if natural ingenuity inſtructed them. Alſo there are a hundred delectable Sciences, which are not neceſſary to be kept ſecret, for they may very well ſpeak forreign Languages, they may confeſs that they have read Homer, Heſiod, and the excellent works of the illuſtrious Ariſthius, without any ſhewing too much Scholarſhip: Alſo they may give their opinions in ſo modeſt a manner without any unbecommingneſs to their Sex, as they may thereby make their wit, their knowledge, and their judgement to appear: They may and ought to know all the helps unto writing well, for in my opinion, it is a moſt groſs error, to ſay they would have women ſpeak well and write ill, and the priviledge of ignorance which they pretend unto is ſo ſhameful unto all their Sex in general, that if they underſtood it they would bluſh. The truth is, ſaid Nicanor, there is ſo little coherence in the Letters of Ladies, and ſuch odd Orthographie, as if they writ them purpoſely not to be underſtood, yet thoſe very ſame Ladies (ſaid Sapho) and laughed, who commit ſuch groſs faults in their writings, and have ſpent all their ſtock of wit in the firſt line, they will mock a whole day together at a poor ſtranger, who hath only miſtaken one word for another, yet it is much more ſtrange to ſee a witty woman commit a hundred faults in writing her own natural Language, than to ſee a Scythian ſpeak all Greek. Alas (ſaid Philire, and laughed) how deeply am I concerned in your diſcourſe? Yet you ſpeak ſo very well, replied I, as I cannot think it poſſible but you muſt write well alſo. I do believe, replied Sapho, that Philire writes as well as ſhe ſpeaks: but by your leave, there are ſome women who ſpeak well and write ill, and all meerly by their own negligence: I would gladly know how that comes to paſs (ſaid the fair Athis) the reaſon is, (replied Sapho) becauſe moſt women do not care for reading, or elſe they do not read applicatively, but run on without any reflection upon what they read: So that though they have read the very ſame words which they write a thouſand times over, yet they viſit them wrong, and miſlocating the Letters they patch up confuſed nonſence by a cuſtom. All this is moſt true, replied Erinne, for yeſterday I made a viſit unto one of my friends who is newly returned out of the Country, and I carried all the Letters which ſhe had writ unto me, that ſhe might read them unto me.

'Tis plain therefore, replied Sapho, that I had good reaſon to wiſh women would uſe to read much, and to read with application: And when they are alone to make choice of ſome merry or ſerious book according to their humour, for it is moſt certain that reading doth ſooner and better refine wit, and inform the Judgment, than Converſation alone can; for truly Converſation doth only give us the firſt thoughts of thoſe who ſpeak, which often are tumultuous, and ſo undigeſted, that the ſpeakers do condemn them within a quarter of an hour after: But reaſon gives us the concocted opinion of thoſe who writ the Books we read. So that though they read ſimply for their delight, yet it will imprint ſomething in the mind of the Reader, which will better it, and preſerve them from falling into many groſs errours which ignorance would plunge them into: For my part, ſaid Alces, I know one of thoſe bold ignorants, who will be talking of every thing, though ſhe know nothing, who talking the other day unto a ſtranger which was relating his Travels, ſhe diſcovered her ignorance ſo far, as it appeared ſhe thought the Caſpian Sea greater than the Egean, and that the Euxine Sea was beyond the Caſpian. And that the Egean Sea was the leaſt of all others. I would adviſe all women, replied Sapho, not to talk much of what they know well, and not to talk at all what they know not.

And indeed, I would have them never to be very knowing, nor very ignorant, but only to manage well thoſe advantages which Nature hath given them. I would have them (as I ſaid before) be as careful to beautifie their minds as their perſons. But I beſeech you, ſaid Philire, how can women find leiſure to read and learn any thing? That time which Ladies loſe in doing of nothing, or in doing things nothing to any purpoſe, replied Sapho, would ſerve to let them know enough, to conceal their ignorance. Moreover, do not imagine, I would have any woman ſuch a perpetual Reader, as never to talk: No (but on the contrary) I would have her read only ſo much as will teach her how to ſpeak well. And would adviſe them to converſation, as well as to the other, provided they never tranſgreſs the modeſty of their Sex. But I wiſh with all my heart that women were not ſuch ſluggards as they are, and I wiſh that I my ſelf may apply theſe Counſels unto my ſelf which I give unto others. Madam, replied Phaon, your modeſty goes too far, and you need not ſay that of your ſelf which none does think. The truth is, ſaid Nicanor, the fair Sapho is very unjuſt unto her own merit. She is ſo juſt unto the merit of others (replied Athys) that it were ſtrange ſhe ſhould not be ſo unto her own.

Her advantage is, (replyed Cydnon) that every one renders her that juſtice which ſhe denys her ſelf; and though ſhe conceals her ſelf as much as ſhe can, yet her excellencies are known unto all Greece: You clip the wings of Fame (replyed Phaon, and ſmiled) for I am certain that the name of Sapho is famous throughout the whole World. For Heavens ſake (ſaid the moſt admirable woman, interrupting him and bluſhing) ſpeak not thus in my preſence: For I cannot endure it ſhould be thought I take any delight in ſuch high Applauds, ſince I am moſt confidently perſwaded (and I ſpeak it with all the ſincerity of my heart) that I do not deſerve them: If that be true, Madam, replyed Athys, it is very ſtrange that you ſhould be knowing in ſo many things, and yet be ignorant of your own merit: Seriouſly (replied Sapho, in a lovely chafe) unleſs you do unaccuſtom your ſelves from commending me, I ſhall unaccuſtom my ſelf from ſeeing you any more. Oh, Madam, (cried Phaon, Nicanor, Alces, and I all at once,) For Heaven's ſake do not threaten us with any ſuch ſad affliction. But after this, Sapho continuing her diſcourſe with her accuſtomed modeſty, ſhe told us a hundred pleaſing ſtories, and knew ſo well how to charm the company, that we parted not till night.

At our going from Sapho's houſe, we ſaw Themiſtogenes leading Damophile: And the next day we heard by one of his friends, that he preferred her a thouſand degrees before Sapho: So as wondering at his extravagancy, we both of us promiſed to ſhun him as well as Damophile. In the mean time, I began to perceive, that Phaon in all likelyhood, would fall in love with Sapho, if he were not ſo already. On the other ſide, I underſtood by my Siſter that Sapho did infinitely eſteem him, and that he pleaſed her more than all the men ſhe ever ſaw. Alces who was Tiſander's ſpie, did alſo perceive this growing love of Phaon, and the inclination of Sapho, for he hinted as much unto the fair Athys with whom he was in love: Nicanor, who was one of Sapho's adorers, had ſome ſlight ſuſpition of it. And both Amithone and Erinne did perceive it as the reſt did. As for Sapho, ſhe knew that Phaon was in love with her before he ever told her; for ſhe had ſuch a ſuitable and delicate ſpirit of diſcernment into every thing, that ſhe perfectly knew what thoughts every one had of her, and ſometimes knew them before they knew themſelves: As fervent as the friendſhip was which any bore unto this charming Lady, ſhe would never take it under any notion of Love: And how faint and cold ſoever this paſſion was in the hearts of ſome men who were not capable of any zealous fires, by reaſon of their frozen tempers, ſhe would never take them under the notion of Friendſhip: So that it is moſt certain, ſhe preciſely knew in what degree any one loved her: And it was ſo impoſſible to conceal it from her, that it was abſolute folly to attempt it; for ſhe could ſo well diſtinguiſh between the looks of friendſhip and the looks of Love, that ſhe was never miſtaken.

Moreover, ſhe did not only know of what natures the affection of any was unto her: but alſo ſhe knew what thoughts every one who uſed to viſit her had unto one another: So as this diſcerning knowledge of all hearts enabled her to manage matters ſo cunningly, that ſhe made all Rivals live in peace, and ſhe augmented or leſſened the affection which any bore unto her, almoſt as ſhe pleaſed. And yet this laſt quality had more difficulty in it than the other: for ſhe is ſo very lovely, that it is a very hard matter for any Lover to go leſs: yet ſtill ſhe would ſo temper them, as that they would tell her no more than what ſhe had a mind to hear.

Sapho having ſuch a diſcerning eye, ſhe quickly ſaw that Phaon was in love with her, and the ſight of it did not offend her, but found ſuch a ſweet reliſh of it in her heart, as ſhe plainly ſaw that if ſhe would ever defend her ſelf againſt Phaon, ſhe muſt begin betimes, ſo as ſhe reſolved to overcome her ſelf: But ſhe could not reſolve to hinder Phaon from loving her, and contented her ſelf with never anſwering his affection by the like. However, Cydnon being her grand Confident, they held a Councel together about it, which I intend to relate unto you, that you may the better know the temper of Sapho's Soul.

My Siſter being then with her one Evening, and both leaning upon a Balcone which opened towards the Sea, ſhe ſaw by Moon-light ſome Ships coming to Mytelene. I wiſh theſe be not the Ships of Thraſibulus, which bring back Tyſander unto us (ſaid ſhe, and ſmiled.) For that Prince being of very much merit, I wiſh for his own tranquility he may not return unto a place where he would be more miſerable than when he departed: I cannot ſee, replied Sapho, that any great alterations have hapned here ſince his departure: For I hold him in the ſame degree of eſteem as I did, and my heart has the ſame reſolutions of never loving him: If that were all, replied Cydnon, he would not be ſo miſerable as he is like to be; but I know there is ſomething more in it: I wonder, replied Sapho, why, you ſhould ſay ſo. Since you would needs have it replied Cydnon, I muſt tell you that Phaon is here: Cydnon, you are always ſo full of your Querks (replied Sapho, and bluſhed) that I need not wonder at them. I aſſure you, Madam, replied Cydnon, there is no Querks in what I ſay, for it is ſo apparent Phaon is in love with you, as it is impoſſible to be one hour in his company and not perceive it: And when he is in your preſence, they muſt be blind who do not ſee it, and deaf who cannot underſtand it by his words; for he ſpeaks always with ſuch cordial earneſtneſs, that his thoughts cannot be doubted: However, replied Sapho, they do not ſee me anſwer him with the ſame earneſtneſs. You, Madam, replied Cydnon, do know ſo well how to regulate all your actions, that your thoughts can never be known by your actions: Yet I who know you better than any others, I am moſt confident you do not hate Phaon, and that if Fate have reſolved you muſt love any, it muſt be him: I perceive, Cydnon, (replied ſhe, and ſmiled) that you think you have ſtoln from me the Art of knowing the thoughts of others by bare conjectures: but I believe that you are now miſtaken in your Conjectures and Predictions: 'Tis true, added ſhe, that Phaon was very glad to find that I did reſemble Damophile: and to be ſincere with you, I know he loves me, or at leaſt hath ſome inclination to it: But I muſt profeſs unto you, that I have no intentions to anſwer his love. For ſince exact decency requires one ſhould not only defend themſelves againſt criminal affections, but from the moſt innocent alſo, I muſt obſerve it, and not expoſe my ſelf unto ſcandal, although I am perſwaded that it is not impoſſible but one may love very innocently. I do believe it is not impoſſible, replied Cydnon: And ſince there are many men have honeſt hearts, there can be no great danger in engaging with them. It is ſo dangerous, ſaid Sapho, that ſince I knew the world, I never knew two whom I could think capable of any compliance of ſuch a nature as I imagine.

But to ſpeak unto you as unto my ſecond ſelf, though decency hath ſo eſtabliſhed it a Law, that Women ſhould not love any by reaſon of the bad conſequences which love may cauſe when it is in bad minds and hearts, which have only groſs, brutal, and terreſtrial thoughts: Yet let me poſitively tell you, that it is unjuſt, and without derogation from ſolid Virtue. I believe one may make ſome diſtinction between ſome men, and contract a pure affection with one whom one ſhall make choice of.

And indeed, the gods who never made any thing in vain, did not create in vain a certain inclination in our ſouls to love: But, Cydnon, the grand difficulty is to regulate this affection, to make a good choice of him whom one would love, and to carry it ſo diſcreetly, that ſcandal it ſelf cannot cavil at it: And when all is done, it is moſt certain that nothing is comparably ſo ſweet as to be loved by a perſon whom one doth love. Doubt not but that I do condemn all the irregular extravagancies of Love, but I do not condemn the paſſion it ſelf which cauſed it: And the truth is, thoſe extravagancies proceed rather from the diſtempers of thoſe who are in love, than from love it ſelf: and it muſt be confeſſed, that they who do not know, that I know not what which redoubles all delights, and has the art of giving ſweetneſs unto inquietude, they do not know how far joys can reach. As for thoſe Ladies who take delight in being loved without loving again, they have no other ſatisfaction than what their own vanities affords them: But I do comprehend that there are a thouſand ſweets which are all purity and all innocency in a mutual affection. This agreeable exchange of thoughts, of ſecret thoughts, this communion of ſouls which is made between two perſons who love each other, is a pleaſure unutterable, unconceiveable. And to judge of Love by Friendſhip, I aſſure you, my dear Cydnon, that I am now more joyed in opening my heart unto you, than I ſhould be if we were together at the moſt glorious Feaſt in the world.

Then, Madam, to taſte theſe joys more fully (replied Cydnon) I conjure you to open your moſt ſecret thoughts unto me, and confeſs unto me ſincerely, that if you find in Phaon all that is deſirable to contract ſuch an affection with him as you imagine, that you would have much ado to defend your ſelf: And to carry this confidence as far as it will go, tell me truly the nature of this affection, and in what manner you imagine it. Ah Cydnon (ſaid ſhe unto her) you engage me very far; yet ſince I will not deny you any thing, I will anſwer to your queſtion, and tell you that I am not of their minds who ſpeak of love, as of a thing which cannot be innocent, unleſs they intend to marry: For my part, I muſt confeſs unto you, that the delicacy of my Mind, of my Fancy, and of that Idea which I conceive of this paſſion is ſuch, that I do not think that kind of Matrimonial Love to be pure and noble enough: And if I found in my heart only ly a bare deſire of marrying any one, I ſhould bluſh as for a crime, upbraid my ſelf as with a thing unworthy of my ſelf, and ſhould be more aſhamed than other women uſe to be of a criminal Gallantry.

But I beſeech you, Madam, replied Cydnon, would you have any love you without any hopes? I would have him hope to be loved, replied ſhe, but I would not have him hope any further; and it is the greateſt folly in the world to love any one, unleſs with intention to love for ever: But to love any other way than as I intend, is to expoſe ones ſelf to fall from love unto indifferency, from indifferency to hatred, and from hatred to ſcorn.

But I beſeech you tell me, replied Cydnon, how you intend one ſhould love you, and how you do intend to love? I expect, ſaid ſhe, that one ſhould love me fervently, that he ſhould love none but me, and love me with all imaginable reſpect: I would have his love ſo tender and ſenſible, as to think the leaſt trifle from me a delight, I would have his love to have the ſolidity of friendſhip, and founded upon eſteem, and upon inclination. Moreover, I would have this Lover to be moſt faithful and ſincere: yet would I have him to admit of no confident of his paſſion but my ſelf, but ſo lock up his love in his heart, that I may brag of being the only one who knows it: I would have him alſo tell me all his ſecrets, impart all his ſorrows unto me: I would have the ſight of me to be his chief felicity, and that my abſence may be a moſt ſad affliction to him: That he never mention the leaſt Syllable to me, which may make me ſuſpect his love, and that he fully perſwade me that it is fervent and eternally durable: In ſhort, my dear Cydnon, I would have a Lover, and not a Husband: I would have him ſuch a one as contenting himſelf with the poſſeſſion of my heart, ſhould love me till death: and if I cannot find out ſuch a one, I will never have any. Well, Madam, replied Cydnon, ſince you have told me how you would be loved, ſo I beſeech you tell me how you do intend to love. In telling the one, replied ſhe, I have told you the other: and there ought to be no other difference of thoughts, than ſuch as cuſtom hath eſtabliſhed, which requires that the man muſt be more complaiſant, more obſequious, and more ſubmiſſive: As for matter of tenderneſs and confidence, doubtleſs they ought to be both equal: and if any difference be to be made, it is in this, that the man ought to give teſtimonies of his love, and the woman to let him only gueſs at hers.

If Phaon be ever ſo happy, replied Cydnon, as to give you any teſtimonies of his love, and that you permit him to gueſs at yours, doubtleſs he will be the moſt worthy of all mens envy. If he be worthy of envy, replied Sapho, I ſhould much fear I ſhould not be worthy of pity: For conſidering the conſtitution of my heart, if I ſhould once love, I ſhould love ſo tenderly, and in ſuch good earneſt, that it would be hard for any one to pay me back love with uſury. Yet I am fully perſwaded that to be happy in loving, one muſt at leaſt believe that they are as much loved as they love; for otherwiſe one ſhould be aſhamed of their own weakneſs, and vexed at the neutrality of the other. Therefore, Cydnon, though I do believe one may innocently love, and though I think Phaon to be amiable, and that he hath an inclination to love me, yet I am reſolved to do what I can, not to love him.

But, Madam, whilſt Sapho was talking thus with my Siſter, Phaon was talking with me of things very particular; and we two being always inſeparable, we walked that Evening upon a Tarraſs, the end of which was towards the Sea, by which one goes to Sicily: So as after we had walked a while, he leaned upon the Rails by himſelf, and fell into ſuch a profound muſing, that I knew he never thought I was there. I had formerly obſerved many paſſages, which induced me to believe that he was in love with Sapho, and therefore I knew he thought more of her than me. And to twit him with it, I believe (ſaid I unto him) that ſince you look ſo earneſtly towards Sicily, you are thinking of that fair fool whom you loved there: Fie, cruel friend (ſaid he unto me) mock not at my miſery, it is enough you have been the cauſe of it, without inſulting upon a wretched man who hath changed his mind. Why (ſaid I unto him, do you not think it better to love a fair fool, than a fair wiſe one? No, no, Democedes, ſaid he unto me, I think it ſo ſtrange that I ſhould ever love a witleſs woman, that I am perſwaded I was out of my own wits, or never had any until I came from Sicily: But dear friend, added he, before I diſcover the ſecrets of my Soul unto you, tell me truly how you ſtand affected unto the fair Sapho; for if you be my Rival, you are not fit to be my Confident. Doubtleſs I am a very great admirer of Sapho, replied I, but I never durſt be her Lover: Then friend, I am bolder than you, replied he, for I do love that divine Lady in ſo high a manner, as I think I ſhall loſe my wits. When I firſt carried you thither (replied I, and ſmiled) you did not believe you could ever fall in love with any learned woman: Ah! Democedes, ſaid he unto me, I did not think ſhe hand learned the Art of charming hearts; but alas I was miſtaken, and I find you had good reaſon to ſay that every one muſt be miſerable before happy in love: For ſuch is the ſtate I am in, that I find more delight in only meeting the eyes of Sapho, than I did in being loved by my fair fool: I found no difficulty in obtaining her eſteem, and I wonder now that I did not ſcorn her. She looked upon me indeed very favourably, and looked upon me with eyes very fair; but they ſignified ſo little, and underſtood my mind ſo very ill, that I wonder how I came to think her fair.

The truth is, Democedes, I am now very far from loving a fair Fool, ſince I love the fair Sapho; but alas, the Grand difficulty is, to tell her as much, and to tell her that I would be loved: Since, Friend, you have all accompliſhments requiſite to merit her eſteem, replied I, how know you but you may win her affection? I have been conſulting with her eyes above theſe eight days, replied he, and endeavoured to divine my deſtiny, and whether I am ſo much in her favour as to diſcover my love unto her, but to tell you truly, I know not what to think; ſometimes methinks her eyes do give me ſome kind of far fetcht hopes; and ſometimes again, they bid me deſpair; but however, all her looks augments my love, my heart trembles at every glance of her eye, which inſpires me with ſuch kind of I know not what delights, as I cannot expreſs them; when I am with her, I can do nothing elſe but look upon her: Wonder not therefore at my muſing, my dear Democedes, for my Soul is ſo wholly taken up with this divine Lady, that though I ſpeak, yet I cannot think of any thing but her. I can think of nothing, but what heavenly delight it would be to be beloved by ſuch an Angel as ſhe; and what an honour it would be to infuſe ſome weakneſs into ſo great a wit, as that of the moſt admirable Sapho. I am thinking of all that I can ſay unto her, and when I am alone by my ſelf, yet I have long conference with her: The truth is, I do find the fair Sapho to be very Civil, Sweet, and obliging to me; but for all that, ſhe truſts me with no ſecret, and I could never oblige her to ſhew me any of her Verſes. This moſt admirable Lady is ſo modeſt, replied I, that her denial need be no wonder unto you, for you have not yet been ſo long acquainted, as to come unto the honour of ſuch a ſingular priviledge.

But however, you have this advantage (ſaid I unto him) that unto this hour ſhe never ſuſpected you of ever loving any, though ſhe knows you have a very paſſionate Soul.

After this, Madam, we retired, taking no notice whilſt we talked, that the Moon was in an Eclipſe, but in our retiring we met Themiſtogenes with five or ſix men learned in Aſtrology, whom he was carrying unto Damophile, purpoſely to argue with them in her preſence upon this Eclipſe: And we underſtood afterwards that they ſpent almoſt all the night at her Houſe in talking of the Earth's interpoſition between the Sun and the Moon, and many other things of that nature; ſo that all the noble company who uſed to meet at Sapho's did much divert themſelves at this adventure; for ſince Cynegere, with whom Sapho dwelt, did very well know her wiſdom and diſcretion, ſhe permitted every one to go into her Chamber, though Cynegere was not preſent, ſo that Amithone, Erinne, Athys, Cydnon, Nicanor, Phaon, Alces, and I, being all with Sapho, we made the converſation very pleaſant, by having up all the follies which were in agitation at Damophile's, and though Sapho did not affect any Rallary in her preſence, yet ſhe did not contradict this, but on the contrary, was the firſt which twitted Damophile's, to the end it might the better be known how great the difference was between them; ſo as making a very pleaſant deſcription of a confuſed company, ſhe did extreamly divert all her own Society. However, ſaid Cydnon, we get this advantage from the fooliſh converſation of Damophile, that it ſerves to render ours more diverting, by the excellent deſcription which Sapho made of it: I wiſh ſhe would alſo deſcribe unto us, replied Phaon, all other kind of fantaſtical converſations which are to be found in the world: Indeed, ſaid Athys, it would be very pleaſant if ſhe would be pleaſed to take ſo much pains, as to obſerve all their impertinencies.

You put me upon a hard employment, replied Sapho, it would be much better and ſhorter, if every one in particular would deſcribe that converſation which hath moſt wearied them: For my part, ſaid Erinne, I am very glad of that; for I was yeſterday in a company which I thought would have talked me to death, for I was in the midſt of ten or twelve women, who talked everlaſtingly; but of no other ſubject than trivial Domeſtick buſineſs, the faults of their Servants, the good qualities of their Children; and there was one woman amongſt the reſt, who ſpent an hour in repeating Syllable after Syllable, the firſt pratling of her Son, who was three years of age: Judge, I beſeech you, what a fine time I had of it. I aſſure you, replied Nicanor, that

I ſpent my time no better than you did; for I was much againſt my will engaged amongſt a Troop of Women, who ſpent a whole day in talking of nothing but the goodneſs or the badneſs of their Cloaths, telling or asking what they coſt, ſome out of vanity, ſaid they coſt more than they did: Others to ſhew their skill in buying, ſaid leſs: So I wiſhed my part of the day out of the Kalendar: For my part, replied the fair Athys, I was within theſe five days with a company of Ladies, who though they had wit enough, yet were extreamly troubleſome, for they were Ladies who were Gallants by profeſſion, who had every one their buſineſs, and buſineſs which did ſo wholly take them up, as they thought of nothing but taking one anothers Gallants from them, by all manner of ſtratagems: ſo as though one were not of their intrigues, yet one ſhould be engaged with them, or elſe either be driven to a non plus, or non-plus them.

Indeed as long as I was with them, I heard them, always talking, but never underſtood what they ſaid for there was one on my right hand, who told her who was next her, that ſhe knew ſuch a one was broken off with ſuch a one; and that this man had renewed with that woman, never naming any: And there was another on my left hand who talking to a Lady next her, the moſt fooliſhly that ever was heard; for (ſaid ſhe in a mighty fret) ſhe you know of, need not to brag of taking my Gallant from me, ſince ſhe had never gotten him from me, but becauſe I had caſt him off, and if the toy take me I can call him again, and ſhe ſhall never be the better for him as long as ſhe lives, and the very truth is, I never was in all mylife put ſo much out of all patience, as that day.

For my part (ſaid Cydnon, had I been in your room, I would have laughed at them who wearied me; but I could not do ſo three days ſince at a man and a woman, whoſe whole diſcourſe was of two things, either of Mytelenian Genealogies, or of the eſtates belonging to families; for what delight can be taken in hearing tell a whole day together, that Zenocrates was the Son of Tryphon, Clidemes Son to Lenophantes, Lenophantes was deſcended from Thyrſeus, and ſo they begot one another: Alſo what pleaſure is to be taken in hearing one talk of ſuch a houſe wherein you have no intereſt, nor ever had, no nor is ever like to have as long as you live; how it was built by ſuch a one, bought by another, and exchang'd by a third, and that it is now at this preſent in the poſſeſſion of a man whom you know not? This queſtionleſs is not very pleaſing, replied Alces, but it is not ſo tedious as to meet with a man who has ſome peeviſh buſineſs in hand, and will not talk of any thing elſe: For I once met a Sea Captain, who pretended that Pittacus ought to make him recompence for a Ship which he had loſt, who held me three long and tedious hours in relating thoſe reaſons which he had for his pretence; and who will anſwer and reply, and object and anſwer Pro, and Con, as if the caſe were pleading before a Judge: And the better to underſtand his loſs, he would tell me by piece-meal what he was forced to caſt out of his Ship, and would name every perſon in it one after another, when it was to no purpoſe in the earth.

'Tis true, ſaid Amithone, that this is a very great perſecution; but I muſt tell you, that grave and ſerious converſations, where every word is delivered in Querpo, and where the leaſt ſmile is not permitted, hath ſomething ſo tedious in it, that I am never amongſt ſuch, but my head akes, for one muſt always ſpeak in one tone, never laugh, but be as compoſed as in the Temple: Such company is very tedious, replied Phaon, but there are a ſort quite oppoſite unto thoſe who are infinitely againſt the ſtrain of my fancy; for I was one day at Syracuſe, with five or ſix women, and two or three men, who had a fancy, that to make the company more merry, could be continually laughing, ſo that as long as they went together they laughed at every word which one ſaid unto another, there was no jeſt or pleaſant conceit in it, but made ſuch a mad din as deafed one another, and laughed, only becauſe others laughed without any other reaſon; but what is moſt ſtrange is, that laughter has ſuch a contagion ſometimes in it, that there is no Antidote againſt the diſeaſe; but being one day amongſt theſe eternal laughers, they ſo infected me, that I laughed until tears trickleddown my cheeks, and knew not any reaſon in theworld for it: But to tell you truly, I was ſo aſhrmed at my ſelf, that within a quarter of an hour, my joys were turned into ſorrows. Though it be much folly to laugh without any cauſe, replied Sapho, yet I ſhould not be ſo much weary with being in the company of ſuch merry People, as with thoſe whoſe diſcourſe is nothing but telling ſuch pitiful, and ſad long-winded ſtories, as would tire out patience it ſelf; for I know a woman who knows all the tragical adventures which ever hapned; who will ſpend a whole day in deploring the miſeries of life, and in relating lamentable accidents, in ſuch a ſad and languiſhing tone, as if ſhe had been hired to ſing the doleful dity of the world's miſery. Yet I do know a houſe where their diſcourſe uſeth to be as irkſome as poſſible, replied Erinne, for they never talk of any thing but the trifling paſſages of their neighbourhood, of which Courtiers, unleſs by great accident, I never ſo much as heard of, or have any thing to do with. I have heard them name a hundred perſons in one day whom they know not; and they would talk of a hundred obſcure paſſages, the noiſe of which never went out of the ſtreet where they were done, and which in themſelves were ſo ſilly, and ſo far from any delighting, as that they were very troubleſome.

It is a great affiiction, replied Nicanor, to be in a great company where every one hath a ſecret, eſpecially unto one who hath none, nor any thing to do, but to hear that humming murmur, which they make who are talk ng in low voices: Yet were there whiſpers upon real ſecrets, replied Sapho, my patience would allow it: but oftentimes they are only upon a trivial buſineſs, no better than a Child's Rattle bought at the laſt Fair. I know ſome people, added Alces, who in my opinion are very wearyſome, though ſometimes they are a little pleaſing; for they have ſuch a vain of telling great news, as they never talk of any thing under a great Battel, or the Siege of ſome conſiderable Town, or ſome grand Revolution in the world: and they would have you to know, that the gods did not alter the face of the Univerſe, but only to furniſh them with diſcourſe; for excepting theſe high ſtories, they have nothing to ſay, nor can endure any other talk: So as unleſs you know the very bottom of Policy, and have Hiſtory at your fingers end, there is no talking with them of any thing. The truth is, replied I, it is very tedious to hearken unto ſuch people: but ſuch kind of people as without any care of the general buſineſs of the world, will hear of nothing but privacies, are very troubleſome; for you ſhall ſee them always as buſie as if they had a thouſand great weighty affairs in tranſaction, though they are of no other nature than medling in other mens matters, and running from houſe to houſe with this or that tittle tattle, as publick Spies, who are every where, and deſire not the knowledge of any thing to any other end than to tell it again. All theſe kinds of people, replied Sapho, are very obnoxious unto Civil Societies, and the principal Rule of all companies ought to be, never to utter any thing againſt ſound judgment. I would gladly know, ſaid Nicanor, how you would have our converſation to be regulated: To ſpeak in general, replied ſhe, our diſcourſe ought to be more of things ordinary and gallant, than of any high matters; yet I conceive, that nothing but what is diſcreet muſt intervene: Our talk ought to be free, pleaſing, and pertinent, according to the times, places, and perſons we talk of. To ſpeak always nobly of inferiours, ſimply of high matters, very gallantly of things gallant, and all without any affectation or earneſtneſs. And though converſation ought always to be natural and reaſonable; y[illegible] I muſt needs ſay, that upon ſome occaſions, Sciences may be handſomly brought in, and trivial follies may alſo have their place, provided they be ingenious and gallant. So as to ſpeak rationally, I conceive there is nothing but may be brought into converſation, ſo it hath wit and judgment in it. But the moſt neceſſary quality to render it ſweet and pleaſant, is a kind of Politeneſs of wit which abſolutely excludes all manner of biting jeſts, and ſuch as may offend a chaſt ear.

I would have every one to have the art of turning things ſo ingeniouſly, as that they may without offence ſpeak of gallantry unto the moſt Auſtere Nun in the world, and to tell a trifling tale unto the graveſt and moſt ſerious men: to talk of Sciences and ignorance if they be forced; and to vary ones wit, according to the things talked of, and Perſons to whom they talk: But above all, I would have a certain ſpirit of mirth to be predominant, which without any tincture of the follies in thoſe eternal Laughers, who make a great noiſe upon a little matter, may inſpire into the hearts of all the company, a diſpoſition to divert themſelves at any thing, and to be troubled at nothing: and I allow them to talk of greater matters, provided ſtill they talk well, and without any pumping for their words, and of ſuch things as are fit to be talked of.

The laws, Madam, which you gave unto converſation are ſuch, replied Phaon, as whoſoever ſhall admire your wiſdom, and carry themſelves as you do, will merit the admiration of the whole earth, for never any had ſuch an art of pleaſing, of charming, and of diverting, as your ſelf. I would all you ſay were true (replied ſhe, and bluſhed) and that I could believe you more than I do my ſelf; but to ſhew you that I cannot, and that I know my ſelf often faulty, I ingeniouſly declare that I have ſpoken too much, and that in lieu of telling you all my conceptions concerning Society, I ſhould only have ſaid as much of all the company, as you have ſaid of me. After this, every one oppoſing the modeſty of Sapho, we all commended her ſo highly, that we more than half angred her; but afterwards the diſcourſe was ſo gallant, ſo free, ſo pleaſant, and merry, that it continued till night when we all parted. Phaon, who more fettered in the nets of Love than before, would needs ſtay the laſt with Sapho, and his paſſion was ſo fervent, that he reſolved to give it a little vent, and not to leave her until he had given her ſome glimps of it: So that after we were all gone, he asked pardon for troubling her ſo long, but, Madam, (ſaid he unto her) when I ſaw you only in company, methought I did not ſee you enough. 'Tis true, I am much bettered by your Elegant diſcourſe, and I do admire it more than any; but for all that, I am more joyed when I hear you in preſence of none elſe; and two or three words only, which are interrupted only by my ſelf, do give me fuller ſatisfaction, and would more raviſh me, than all your excellent Language wherewith you have charmed all the company this day: Were you in love with me (replied ſhe, and ſmiled) I ſhould think theſe expreſſions very gallant, but ſince I entertain none but friends, and will never look upon any Lovers, I muſt chide you, for profiting no better by my diſcourſe concerning Converſation. Since this your Language would be very ſuitable unto a Miſtreſs, but not unto a Friend. I beſeech you, Madam, ſaid he, do you think my Language very ſuitable unto a perſon whom I loved? You know I am always ſincere, replied ſhe, and therefore you may believe I ſpeak my thoughts. Then, Madam, (replied he, and looked upon her) my Language is moſt ſuitable unto you, for I do not ſpeak it only unto a friend, but unto one with whom I am moſt deſperately in love: and that in ſuch an humble and reverent manner, that you cannot be offended at me. If decency would allow me (replied Sapho, and bluſhed) not to be offended at a declaration of Love, I believe I ſhould not be offended at you; but, Phaon, it will not, and therefore I muſt either be angry with you, or elſe not believe you: Oh! Madam (cried out Phaon) never ver make any queſtion between theſe two, but be certain, that I had rather be treated ill, than not believed.

Since you never ſaw me angry, replied ſhe very gallantly, you know not what you ſay, but ſince I know what is good for you better than you do your ſelf, I will neither be angry with you nor believe you. Oh! I beſeech you, Madam (ſaid he unto her) believe me and be angry too, if you cannot believe me without being angry: for as I told you before, I had much rather ſee you angry than incredulous. Since belief is a thing not in our own power, replied ſhe, we cannot believe what we would: And therefore when I ſaid that it was in my choice whether I ſhould believe you or be angry with you, I conceive that I ſpoke improperly, and had better ſay, that it being impoſſible for me to believe you, it is alſo impoſſible for me to be angry with you. But I beſeech you, Madam, (ſaid he unto her) why cannot you believe that I love you? Is it becauſe you think your ſelf not fair and charming enough to captivate hearts? Is it becauſe I have not wit enough to know your tranſcendencies? Is it becauſe my ſoul is frozen, and my heart incapable of any tender paſſion? Is it becauſe my eyes never yet met yours, and told them what my heart thinks? Or is it becauſe the moſt admired Sapho does think the unhappy Phaon ſo unworthy to bear her Chains, that ſhe had rather think him inſenſible, than ſuffer him to wear them? But, Madam, ſay what you pleaſe, I can never believe that a perſon who is ſo ſuperlatively knowing in all things, ſhould not know that I adore her. I aſſure you (replied Sapho gallantly) I am ſo far from knowing it, that I am perſwaded you do not know it your ſelf; therefore to do you all the favour I can, I will give you three months time to examine your own thoughts, without mentioning the leaſt Syllable of any ſuch thing unto me; and if after that you think ſtill that you love me, I ſhall adviſe upon it, whether I ſhould believe you and be angry: In the mean time, let us both live, I conjure you, as formerly we uſed. Sapho expreſſing her ſelf with ſuch a gallant air, that Phaon making no queſtion but that ſhe believed he loved her, he thought himſelf very happy, in that he had ſaid ſo much, and was no worſe treated: And Sapho being unwilling he ſhould force her to be angry with him, ſhe diſmiſſed him, and kept ſuch a ſtrict decorum in all her words, that if her eyes had not betrayed the ſecret of her heart, Phaon could not have gleaned any hopes: But ſince queſtionleſs ſhe had a very ſtrong inclination to him, her looks aſſured him, that his paſſion did not diſpleaſe her: So as he went away well ſatisfied, and very extreamly fettered in love.

In the mean time, Sapho was not ſo well ſatisfied, for my Siſter told me, that ſhe was very unquiet. Not but that ſhe had all the advantageous thoughts of Phaon that was poſſible; but it was, becauſe knowing the tenderneſs of her own heart, ſhe was afraid of being engaged to love, and her fears were the more, becauſe ſhe perceived in her Soul ſuch a favourable opinion of this Lover, that ſhe feared her reaſon was too weak for her inclination. And ſhe ſaw ſhe had more reaſon to fear it, becauſe ſhe obſerved that all which Alces ſaid unto her in behalf of the Prince Tyſander, did much more diſpleaſe her than before: and ſhe obſerved that ſhe did leſs divert her ſelf amongſt her friends, than ſhe was wont before Phaon's acquaintance. She could not chuſe, when the fancy of compoſing Verſes was upon her, but think upon Phaon, and he did ſo much run in her memory, in her heart, and imagination; that ſhe would often name him for another: So that Cydnon did often in a jeſting way ask her what progreſs ſhe made in the heart of Phaon? and what progreſs Phaon made in hers? At the firſt, Sapho was wont to anſwer in merriment, as ſhe asked the queſtion, but afterwards her anſwers were more ſerious, and at laſt her anſwers were ſo peeviſh, that Cydnon for a time gave over asking any more. But after a two Months ſilence concerning that Subject, ſhe who would not anſwer then unto any queſtions which were asked concerning Phaon, did now begin the firſt to ſpeak of him. But the truth is, ſhe began not till after the conſequence of an adventure which I ſhall acquaint you with.

Be pleaſed to know then, that a moſt admirable Limner whoſe name was Leon, coming unto Mytelene, all the Friends of Sapho were importunate with her to let her Picture be taken, and they were ſo very earneſt with her that ſhe was forced to ſatisfie them in a very particular manner, for ſhe was reſolved to let every one of her Friends have one, both women and men; ſo that her Lovers, to obtain this honour, did all ſhroud themſelves under the notion of Friends, and they pretended unto this honour in ſuch a gallant way, as ſhe knew not how to avoid it; for Nicanor, Phaon, Alces, and my ſelf, being one day at her houſe: And Amithone, Erinne, Ahtys, and Cydnon being there alſo; we all began to oblige Cynegere to ſolicite Sapho for her Picture, every one acquainting her with the rights they had to pretend unto it; ſo that Nicanor and Phaon, though the Lovers of Sapho, yet pleaded as if they were only her Friends: And Alces, though Tyſander's Solicitor, ſued for this Picture, under a pretence of Tyſander's Friendſhip; ſo as there was only I who ſaid what I thought. It was worth obſervation, to ſee how Nicanor was vexed that he could not obtain Sapho's Picture without Phaon had it as well as himſelf, and to ſee how ill ſatisfied Phaon was that Nicanor ſhould have a Picture, which as he thought he only deſerved. Alces wiſhed that neither of them might have it, and he merrily ſaid, that if Sapho would be ruled by him, ſhe ſhould give it unto none but himſelf; for (ſaid he unto her) ſince my heart was engaged before I had the honour to ſee you, you may very well give me your Picture without fear of any dangerous conſequences; but as for Nicanor and Phaon ſince none can ſee into their hearts, it is to be feared, that in thinking to give your Picture unto your friends only you may give it unto your Lovers. As ſoon as Alces had ſaid ſo, Phaon and Nicanor looked upon one another, as if they had been at a ſtand for an anſwer unto Alces, yet that trouble was ſaved them, for I ſpeaking as for my own Intereſt, ſince every one is for himſelf only (replied I in ſpeaking to Alces) I neither ſpeak for Nicanor nor Phaon, but I dare boldly affirm, that I may very well demand the Picture of the moſt admirable Sapho, only as the Brother of Cydnon.

And I affirm, added Phaon, that Alces is not in a condition worthy of it, though his merits are enough, for ſince he is in love with another, and ſhould be ſo happy as to get the Picture of his Miſtreſs, then the Picture of the moſt tranſcendant Sapho, would be placed below another. Since perhaps he ſhall never obtain that favour from his Miſtreſs (replied Athys, and bluſhed) I cannot think that reaſon ſufficient to hinder Sapho from granting her Picture unto Alces, who I believe can never have a Miſtreſs, whom he will ſet above her. However it be, ſaid Phaon, I think it not expedient that the fair Sapho ſhould give her Picture unto any, but ſuch friends as are not in love as Alces is: If ſo (ſaid Nicanor unto Phaon) who can aſſure the fair Sapho, that you deſerve to have her Picture? For ſince you are but new come into Mytelene, and have been long in Scicily, it is probable you have a Miſtreſs there; but it is otherwiſe with me, for it is well known that I uſe to viſit none aſſiduouſly, but the fair Sapho, and that I was never guilty of any gallantry which might render me unworthy of her Picture.

Since I came unto Mytelene, without any invitation of buſineſs, replied Phaon, it is to be thought I was not in love where you mentioned, ſince I left it upon ſuch eaſie terms, but without any pumping for reaſons to juſtifie my ſelf, I do conſent that the fair Sapho refuſe me her Picture, if ſhe think I was in love with any in Sicily.

For my part, ſaid Amithone, if I were to be credited, none ſhould have the fair Sapho's Picture but my ſelf. And if my advice would be taken, ſaid Erinne, I would have it ſent over all the world. So I had it, replied Athys, it ſhould be done as ſhe pleaſed. And provided my Brother had one, replied Cydnon, I ſhould be contented ſhe ſhould deny it unto Alces, unto Nicanor, and unto Phaon. I conceive my beſt courſe is, replied Sapho, to give it unto none. No, no, ſaid Cynegere, you ſhall not be Miſtreſs of your ſelf: But leſt you ſhould diſoblige any, you ſhall give it unto all your friends without exception; for if you ſhould except any one, perhaps you would do him a greater favour than in giving it. Though what Cynegere ſaid might well have pleaſed all the company, yet Nicanor and Phaon did argue the buſineſs between themſelves; but at laſt, leſt they ſhould loſe the Picture of Sapho, they agreed upon the matter, ſince the one could not have it, unleſs the other had it alſo; ſince Sapho knew what Phaon had ſaid unto her, ſhe thought it expedient not to yield ſo ſoon, but to take ſome particular exceptions againſt him; ſo as taking Nicanor's part, ſhe told Phaon, that perhaps he had twenty Pictures which he would place before hers, and there paſſed a very gallant diſcourſe between them: For though he ſeemed to have no other deſign in proteſting that he loved none in Sicily, but to obtain her Picture; yet he made a thouſand proteſtations of love unto her, which ſhe underſtood very well, though ſhe ſeemed as if ſhe did not. Yet ſhe did very gallantly put him to the puzzle when he was to anſwer; for (ſaid ſhe unto him) you think you have ſaid enough when you have ſworn that you loved none in Sicily, but believe me you have not; for you muſt ſwear alſo that you are in love with none in Mytelene.

Madam (ſaid he unto her, to get himſelf out of this great plunge) ſince I have ſeen none but you, methinks it is not neceſſary to ſay any more than what I have already told you, for you know the courſe of my life ſince I came hither, as well as my ſelf; I know ſo many lovely friends (replied ſhe, and ſmiled) that though you go no farther than my Chamber, yet it is not impoſſible, but you may be in love.

For my particnlar, replied Amithone, I ſhall not hinder Phaon from your Picture; for I do declare that he is not in love with me. I can ſay ſo much of my ſelf, replied Erinne. I can ſay more than that, (ſaid Athis) ſince I dare anſwer for Cydnon, and my ſelf. Though all this ſhould be ſo, (ſaid Alces,) yet all's not enough to oblige Sapho to give her Picture unto Phaon, for perhaps he is in love with her, and ſince ſhe will beſtow her Picture only upon her friends, and not her Lovers, it is requiſite he ſwear, that he is not in love with her, if he would have her Picture.

As for that, replied Sapho, I will diſpence with him, for I am perſwaded his heart has no ſuch thoughts of me, as may hinder me from giving him my Picture. Since it is ſo (ſaid Cynegere, and gave Phaon no time to anſwer) there need no diſputes upon a thing reſolved upon: Therefore let the Artiſt begin his work to morrow: And indeed ſo Leon did, for he began to take the Picture of Sapho the next day.

Thus were the Friends, the Lovers, and the Rivals of Sapho equally favoured, yet Phaon's Soul found abundance of ſweetneſs in thinking that Sapho ſhould know he loved her, and yet permit him her Picture: But theſe ſweet thoughts were moleſted by others which followed a little after: For he could not have any thoughts that Nicanor ſhould be favoured as well as himſelf without an heart-burning: Yet ſince he did not know whether his Rival had diſcovered his paſſion unto Sapho, he ſoothed up his Soul with hopes. He knew alſo that Alces was Tyſander's Confident, and they ſo aſſured him that there was no cauſe of any fears this way, that the Picture which he was to have never troubled him.

On the other ſide, Sapho out of her violent inclination unto Phaon, was not ſorry that Chance had given her ſuch an innocent way of beſtowing her Picture upon him: And ſhe carried her ſelf in ſuch an obliging manner towards him, that it was impoſſible ble ſhe ſhould be ſorry for it.

He ſtill keeps himſelf within his preſcribed bounds, he hinted not the leaſt Syllable of his paſſion to her: But yet he made it appear unto her by ſo many ſeveral other ways, that never any had a more ſubtile art of loving without ſpeaking than he; and he did it ſo curiouſly without any affectation, that wheresoever ſhe was, ſhe could not chuſe but ſee it, and none elſe but ſhe: If at any time ſhe had any accident of joy, he did ſo participate in it, that ſhe judging of his love by his ſatisfaction, ſhe judged aright: If on the contrary, and Chance did ſeparate him from her, he made his ſorrows ſo diſcreetly appear, that the judging of his love by his Grief, ſhe could not chuſe but think it great: The truth is, he ſpoke unto her, and was never heard; and he ſpoke in an Air ſo diſcreet, ſo gallant, and ſo paſſionate, that ſhe underſtood him as well as if he had uſed his Tongue: if he looked upon her, his eyes told her what his heart thought, and I have obſerved a hundred times by a lovely bluſh which dyed the cheeks of Sapho, that ſhe underſtood the Language of his looks: and though ſhe had no deſire to anſwer him, yet her fair eyes did it for her whether ſhe would or no. When her Picture was taking, and we looked on, ſhe would look fixedly upon Phaon: and her thoughts of him being very advantageous, ſhe had ſuch a languiſhing and amorous Air, though without any affectation, that Nicanor not being able to endure his Rival ſhould be ſo favourably looked upon, told her that ſhe looked not enough upon the Painter, to have her Picture well drawn, and that if ſhe continued in that deep Study, it would be taken too melancholick.

Nicanor had no ſooner ſaid ſo, but Sapho bluſht, for ſhe underſtood well enough out of what thoughts he ſpoke it: yet ſhe knew how to give him an anſwer ſo to the purpoſe, that ſhe perſwaded all the company it was impoſſible to have her Picture taken without being ſubject unto thoſe kind of muſings, ſings, which proceed, ſaid ſhe, from the conſtraint of not ſtirring.

As for Phaon, he was ſo vexed at Nicanor, that he contradicted him all the reſt of the day. If Nicanor ſaid that the Painter had happily hit upon the reſemblance of Sapho's eyes; Phaon would ſay he thought not ſo, but that he had much better taken the ſmile of her mouth. If Nicanor ſaid the Picture was too pale, Phaon would ſay it was rather too high-coloured: And if the Painter ſhould have wrought according to the various opinions of theſe two Rivals, they had had but a bad Picture of their Miſtreſs.

But that which was moſt pleaſant in the contradicting humour of Phaon, was, that after the Picture was firſt rudely taken, Nicanor ſaid that it wronged Sapho, becauſe ſhe was a thouſand times fairer than it: Phaon durſt not contradict him, becauſe if he had, he had ſaid the Picture was fairer than her for whom it was made; but his eyes made it evident, that he was vexed becauſe he could not contradict him: and becauſe he would oppoſe him in ſomething, he began to flatter the Painter.

Therefore, ſaid he, it is no wonder if no Picture can be abſolutely reſembling the moſt admirable Sapho, becauſe there are ſo many Angelical features in her face, and ſuch fire in her eyes as is unimitable: and that he was perſwaded Leon had done it as well as any other Artiſt could, though ſhort of the Original. All the company knowing what the reaſon was which moved theſe men to thwart one another, we took much delight in hearing them; for ſince their diſpute was not very bitter, becauſe they reſpected Sapho more than to quarrel in her preſence, we made our ſelves admirable good ſport at them, and Sapho her ſelf was not ſorry to find a new teſtimony of Phaon's love, by his obſtinate contradicting of Nicanor.

At the end of this Converſation, we had another diverſion: For as we asked the Painter when he would be at leaſure to take the Pictures of the other Ladies, who intended to give Sapho their Pictures, as ſhe would give them hers; the Painter anſwered that it could not be the day following, nor the day after that, becauſe he was very buſie in finiſhing a great piece of Damophile's, which had abundance of work about it.

But why (ſaid Sapho to him) is there more work about her Picture than mine? Becauſe, Madam, (ſaid he unto her) ſhe will have drawn beſides her, a great Table full of Books, a Lute, many Mathematical Inſtruments, and a thouſand other things which may repreſent her Learning and Knowledge. I think alſo ſhe intends her dreſs to reſemble the Muſes, ſo as I aſſure you her piece will require much time before it be finiſhed. For Heaven's ſake Leon (ſaid Sapho, and laughed) dreſs me like unto the ragged Shepherdeſs Onone, that my Picture may nothing reſemble Damophile's: and ſhe was ſo earneſt upon it, that to content her he promiſed to draw her in the habit of a Shepherdeſs, whereas before ſhe reſembled a Nymph. After which ſhe did ſo pleaſantly and innocently play upon the Picture of Damophile, that we ended the day very pleaſantly.

But, Madam, to abbreviate my ſtory as much as I can, be pleaſed to know, that Sapho's Picture being finiſhed, it was one of the moſt admirable pieces in the world. The habit of a Shepherdeſs did ſo become the Air of her face, that never any was more amiable: So as all the Copies which ſhe was to give unto her friends being taken: and the Pictures of Amithone, Athys, Erinne, and Cydnon, being alſo taken, all theſe ſeveral Pictures were diſtributed: Sapho gave hers to her friends, and they gave theirs to her. But as for Nicanor, Phaon, Alces, and my ſelf, which were in the Catalogue of her Friends, we only thanked her for her moſt precious preſents, but it was in a very different manner; for Nicanor who durſt not ſpeak of his paſſion, but thanked her, but under the notion of a Friend who durſt not tell her that he was her Lover.

As for Phaon, he thanked her in ſuch paſſionate Language, that though he did not pronounce the word love, yet Sapho did hearken unto his Complement more than unto a Complement of Amity. As for Alces, ſince he was ſtill an officious Solicitor for the Prince Tiſander, he told her in a low voice, that he alone would not thank her for her precious liberality, but would ſtay until a perſon of more merit joyned with him. So as I was the only one who paid the tribute of thanks out of pure amity and common gratitude.

In the mean while, Phaon being the moſt aſſiduous in his merits that day, which he thanked her for his Picture, he ſtayed the laſt with her. So as looking upon the Original of the Picture which yet lay upon the Table, he began to talk of the extravagant Damophile, who would have her Picture drawn with ſo many Emblemes of knowledge about her: And afterwards he talked of what Sapho ſaid, when ſhe deſired the Painter to dreſs her reſemblant unto the Shepherdeſs Onone.

However, Madam, (ſaid he unto her) you may be ſure you ſhall never have her deſtiny as you have her dreſs; for it is moſt impoſſible, if ever you love any, that he whom you love ſhould forſake you. Though the Goddeſſes ſhould every day have a freſh conteſt about their Beauties (replied ſhe, and laughed) yet perhaps when I am in the humour of loving a Shepherd as Onone was, he ſhould never be their Judge: and his conſtancy would not be put unto ſuch a difficult teſt as her Shepherd was: Oh, Madam, cried out he, if that happy Shepherd whom you ſhall chuſe have but the heart of Phaon, he will never hearken unto the promiſes ſes of the faireſt of all the three Goddeſſes, though ſhe ſhould ſhew him as much of beauty as made Paris perfidious: For really, Madam, you are to me the only beauty in the whole world: I find none in it amiable but you; and my heart is ſo wholly yours, that you deny it unto all other Ladies upon earth: And I think alſo, added he, that you keep it from all my friends; for I am ſo ſenſible of you, that I am abſolutely inſenſible of any elſe. I pray Sir (ſaid Sapho, and interrupted him) conſider well what you ſay; for if you go beyond the degree of a Friend, you muſt reſtore my Picture, for I will not be upbraided with beſtowing it upon any Lover. No, no, Madam, ſaid he, I can never reſtore your Picture, I muſt loſe my life before any have it out of my hands: And though you ſhould be angry, baniſh me, and treat me with the worſt of rigour, yet as long as I can do it without any witneſs, I muſt tell you that I do love you, and muſt beſeech you not to hate me; for the very truth is, I cannot live unleſs I love you, and I cannot love you without telling you, and I cannot tell you, unleſs I conjure you to do juſtice unto the Grandure and Fidelity of my Paſſion, by preferring it before the Quality and Merit of all my Rivals. I perceive, Madam, continued he, that you prepare your ſelf to give me an angry anſwer, but I am reſolved to endure it with all imaginable reſpect; yet will not obey you, if you forbid me telling you how I love you: This is a new way, replied Sapho; will you profeſs diſobedience, before the command be given which it is expected you ſhould obey? However it be, Madam, (ſaid he unto her) I am grown to that height that I cannot live as I have done: You muſt either let me love you, or command me to dye. Since I have no right to regulate your love or your hatred, replied ſhe, I have nothing either to forbid or command you; and ſince you are a man of too many excellent parts for any to deſire your death, I will lay no command upon you which ſhall oblige you to ſeek it: But I muſt tell you, that though I am perſwaded, that without any offence of decency I may permit you to love me, yet out of generoſity I ought to acquaint you, that I am the moſt difficult perſon in the world to be pleaſed: and therefore it is better not to engage your ſelf in an affection which perhaps will not be durable, though at preſent it be very violent; for indeed there is in all men ſuch a natural propenſity unto inconſtancy, that though I were a thouſand times fairer than I am, yet it were fond imprudence in me to believe I ſhould find one abſolutely faithful: Yet if ever I do admit of a Lover, he ſhall be ſuch a one as upon whom time and abſence can have no power: Indeed I would have ſuch a one as is not to be found in the world, and therefore I adviſe you to content your ſelf with the quality of my friend; for if I do allow you to love me, perhaps you will find a moſt miſerable task of it, or elſe you will give over loving me. Oh! Madam (ſaid he unto her) do what you can, I ſhall love you as long as any life is in me, and the matters reſts upon nothing, but to know whether you will let me tell you that I do love you, and whether there is any hopes of my being loved.

Since it is not forbidden to be curious, replied Sapho, I ſhould not be ſorry if I knew in what manner you are able to love: and therefore without engaging my ſelf unto any thing, I am contented you tell me what thoughts this paſſion does infuſe into you, for until this hour I never knew any man who had not a thouſand groſs conceits of this paſſion, which I conceive of in a more pure and delicate manner. All I can ſay is, Madam, replied he, that you are ſo abſolute Miſtreſs of my heart, my mind, my will, and all my faculties, that you cannot but inſpire my thoughts into me: Yes, Madam, you need only let me know the way how you would have me love you, and you ſhall find in me a blind obedience unto your will; for the perfection of love, is to will the ſame which the perſon loved doth will.

But, Madam, without any tedious repetition of every circumſtance of this Conference, I will only in ſhort tell you, that Sapho, without granting any thing unto Phaon, did not plunge him into any deſpair: And Phaon, without obtaining any thing from Sapho, parted from her with a mind full of hopes: for though ſhe ſaid nothing to him that was very favourable, yet ſhe ſaid nothing that was diſpleaſing; but her eyes gave him ſuch ſweet Language, that he could not chuſe but think himſelf very happy in the Conviƈture: Yet he would have eſteemed himſelf much more happy, had he heard the diſcourſe which Sapho had the next day with my Siſter, for ſhe opened her very heart unto her. Ah Cydnon, ſaid ſhe, how ill do I wiſh Democedes for acquainting me with Phaon? For he ſtill continues conſtant in loving me, and I am afraid I cannot refuſe his affeƈtion: I find my reaſon doth but weakly defend my heart, and that it is ſo little my own, that if Phaon's be not more mine than it is, I am in a moſt ſad condition.

Moreover, I know not what my deſign is in diſcovering my weakneſs unto you: For ſometimes I think it is to the end you ſhould chide me, and make me repent; and ſometimes on the contrary, to the end you ſhould ſooth me up in my follies. However, I am extreamly vexed at the reſentments of my Soul, not but that I do find much ſweetneſs in my inquietudes; but ſtill my reaſon being yet not altogether prepoſſeſſed, it doth ſhew me the danger unto which I am expoſed, by permitting the affeƈtion of Phaon to find entertainment: For it is almoſt impoſſible he ſhould love me as I deſire to be, and as impoſſible I ſhould love him leſs than I do.

The truth is, Madam, replied Cydnon, that if you would have Phaon to love you, and never to think of marrying, it will be a hard matter for him to obey you. And yet he muſt, replied ſhe; if he would have me love him, he muſt content himſelf with hopes of being loved, without pretending unto any further.

Theſe, Madam, were the thoughts of Sapho, and though ſhe had a great inclination unto Phaon, yet ſhe bridled it a long time, and would neither ſuffer him to tell that he did love her, nor to hope that ſhe would love him, and yet lived very civilly towards him, and to that point, as ſhe did not any longer conceal her writings from him; ſo that he and I being one day with her alone, we importun'd her to ſhew us all her Verſes, and ſo earneſtly, that at laſt ſhe conſented to ſhew us part of them; but ſince her modeſty would not let her read them, ſhe gave them unto us, and went into her Cloſet to anſwer a Letter which ſhe had received from one of her Couſins: But, Madam, I am very ſorry I cannot ſhew you what there we ſaw, not only becauſe it would be exceeding delightful unto you; but becauſe alſo you might ſee what a ſtrange effect the reading of theſe verſes wrought in the heart of Phaon.

In the mean time, ſince I have not theſe excellent Verſes to ſhew you, I muſt endeavour to let you underſtand it ſome other way; imagine therefore, Madam, that after Sapho had given us her Verſes to read, and was gone into her Cloſet, Phaon began to read an Elogy which formerly ſhe had made unto my Siſter during her long abſence; he found them to be ſo apt, ſo moving, ſo tender, and ſo paſſionate, that his heart melted at the reading them, and he ſtopt above a hundred times to admire them. Afterwards, he read a Song which ſhe had compoſed upon my Siſter's return; where he found in few words all the raptures of joy, which the moſt fervent affection could infuſe into an amorous Soul, at the re-ſeeing of a loved perſon, after a long ſeparation: Then Phaon read another little piece of Sapho's Genius which ſhe had writ to expreſs her joys upon her unexpected meeting of a perſon which ſhe loved, her expreſſions were ſo ſignificative, as it was apparant they were her own: She admirably deſcribed the ſweetneſs of Looks, the trembling of Heart, which a ſudden ſurpriſe uſeth to cauſe the diſorder of the Countenance, the agitation of the Spirits, and all the motions of a paſſionate Soul. But, Madam, after Phaon had read theſe Verſes aloud, he read them again in a low voice to himſelf: and when he had done, he looked earneſtly upon them without a word ſpeaking, or ability to read others.

I being deſirous to ſatisfie my curioſity, rouſed him out of thoſe muſings which I thought his admiration only had cauſed, and forced him to read thoſe Verſes which Sapho had made upon a jealous amity which had been betwixt Athys and Amithone: But, Madam, this jealouſie had the right Character of Love, and all the violencies which that tyrannical paſſion could poſſibly inſpire into an amorous heart, were ſo admirably expreſſed, as it was abſolutely impoſſible to mend them.

For my part I did nothing but applaud and admire the Genius of Sapho, all the while Phaon was reading that piece; but as for him, he read it with attention ſo full of penſiveneſs, as I began to wonder: yet to loſe no time in asking him the cauſe, I ſet my ſelf to read ſome verſes which Sapho had made in the Country, during a little journey of eight hours, which ſhe went alone with my Siſter, unto a pleaſant houſe of Sapho's, by theſe verſes ſhe repreſented the felicity of two Perſons who love one another, and thereby proves that they ſtand in need of none but themſelves to live happily, deſcribing afterwards the tenderneſs of their affections; their ſincerity one to another, their delights, their recreations, their diſcourſes upon the ſweetneſs of Amity and Friendſhip, and a thouſand ſuch like. And, Madam, all that the moſt delicate love could invent of ſweetneſs was deſcribed by theſe lines, though it aggravated only the ſweets of Amity; and never in my life, did I ſee any ſo full of wit, ſo gallant, and ſo paſſionate: But as excellent as they were, I could not read them out; for Phaon, who hearkned unto them with extraordinary attention, interrupted me with theſe words, Ah Democedes (ſaid he unto me) Sapho is the rareſt Perſon in the world, but I am the moſt miſerable Lover upon Earth, and you the moſt ſubtile of all men living: As for the firſt of theſe you mention (replied I) I concur with you, but I do not underſtand the ſecond nor the third, for why are you the moſt miſerable Lover in the World? And why am I the moſt ſubtle of all men living? I am the moſt miſerable Lover (replyed he) becauſe Sapho is moſt certainly in love with ſome one; and you the moſt ſubtle, becauſe you aſſure me ſhe is not in Love with any. But I beſeech you (ſaid I unto him) upon what do you ground your opinion that ſhe loves any one? I ground it, replyed he, upon what I have read; For Democedes it is abſolutely impoſſible ſhe ſhould write paſſionately and tenderly, unleſs ſhe had extreamly been paſſionate.

As Phaon ſaid ſo, Sapho returned, expecting a thouſand applauds from Phaon. But Madam, if I had not commended her ſhe had gone without a debt which was due unto her merit: for Phaons mind was ſo ſtung with a cauſeleſs jealouſie which ſprung in his heart, that he could hardly ſpeak. Yet after I had given him time to recollect himſelf, by my commending of Sapho: The ſame jealouſie which cauſed his ſilence, made him break it, to ſee if he could diſcover in the eyes of this excellent Lady, whether he had any ground for his ſuſpitions. What I ſee here Madam is ſo ſurprizing (ſaid he unto her) that you muſt not think it ſtrange I ſhould not be able to expreſs my admiration: Since Sir (anſwered ſhe) you have now been long enough acquainted with me to know that I do not love to be commended in my preſence, you would do me a pleaſure if you would ſpeak no more unto me of what you have ſeen.

Oh Madam (ſaid he haſtily) I muſt needs ſpeak ſomething, and ask you boldly, what you do with all that tenderneſs, wherewith your heart is filled? For I have read ſuch paſſionate expreſſions, that the heart of the Writer muſt needs be well experienced and capable of Love: It is ſo with the merit of my friends (replied ſhe and bluſhed) and my affection to them is ſo tender, that if I had as much wit as amity, I ſhould have written more paſſionately than I did. Phaon eyeing Sapho very attentively, he obſerved her bluſh, yet he could not divine that it was in his advantage, and that Sapho had not changed colour as ſhe anſwered him, but becauſe ſhe ſecretly chid her ſelf for having too tender thoughts of him.

But on the contrary, interpreting her bluſh another way, he thought that Sapho's Soul was paſſionate for ſome of his Rivals, and this belief did raiſe ſuch a diſorder'd damp in his ſpirits, that he was ſilent upon a ſudden: And if company had not come in, doutleſs his ſilence had ſeemed very odd unto the fair Sapho; but ſince Nicanor, Phylire, and ſome other Ladies came in, Sapho made haſte to hide thoſe Verſes which ſhe had ſhewed unto us, ſo as ſhe took no notice of Phaon's ſilence.

In the mean time, perceiving his mind much unquiet, he made a ſign unto me, that we ſhould go away; and indeed, whilſt Sapho was entertaining theſe Ladies, we went out without taking leave, and we went to walk by the Sea ſide. We were no ſooner there, but Phaon began to complain againſt me; for (ſaid he) how can it be poſſible you ſhould be Brother unto Sapho's beſt friend, and not know that ſhe is in love? for moſt certainly ſo ſhe is, or has been, for it is moſt abſolutely impoſſible that any ſhould expreſs themſelves ſo paſſionately, as ſhe hath done, unleſs ſhe had experimentally been poſſeſſed with that paſſion: There is ſuch odd, tender, and paſſionate Phraſes in thoſe Lines which Sapho ſhewed us, that friendſhip alone could not ſuggeſt them unto her, but abſolutely ſhe either is in Love, or hath been, for my part (ſaid I unto him) I have known Sapho from her Cradle; I have known all her acquaintances, I am the Brother of one who knows all the ſecrets of her heart, and I do ſolemnly proteſt unto you, that I am moſt confidently perſwaded, though Sapho was loved by every one that ſaw her, yet ſhe never was in love with any; but withal let me tell you that I think her very capable of that paſſion, and if ever it enter into her heart, ſhe will love with more tenderneſs and fidelity than ever any did: Alas Democedes (ſaid he unto me) me) you do either deceive me, or elſe are deceived your ſelf; for Sapho could never write thoſe Verſes unleſs ſhe were in love with ſome or other. But friend (ſaid I to comfort his mind) if you had ſeen any of thoſe lines which Sapho writ upon a victory which Pittacus obtained, you would ſay ſhe can write as well upon War as upon Love, and by her writings you may as well infer that ſhe is a Souldier, as in Love. Alas Democedes (ſaid he unto me) the caſe is not the ſame, for the very reading of Homer, is enough to teach one how to ſpeak of War, but it is Love only which can teach one how to ſpeak of Love.

For my part, replied I, I know not how you argue, but I am ſure Homer ſpeaks of Love as well as War, and Sapho might learn to ſpeak as he did. Ah Democedes, (ſaid he with a penſive look) gladly would I believe it was you who taught Sapho to write ſo paſſionately as ſhe doth, for if you did not, you would ſay as I do, and ſwear that it is impoſſible any ſhould write well of Love, and not be in Love. If you do but compare thoſe expreſſions of Homer, with thoſe of Sapho, you ſhall find a vaſt difference, honeſt Homer does better ſet out the friendſhip of Patroclus and Achilles than he doth the Love of Achilles and Priſeus; had Sapho only uſed ſuch high expreſſious as Love doth cauſe, and not uſed them paſſionately, I ſhould have believed as you do, that ſhe might have writ of Love, and not have loved any.

But Democedes, ſhe has ſuch delicate, tender, and paſſionate fancies, as are impoſſible to proceed from any heart, but ſuch a one as is in love, the truth is, I know it by my own experience, for when I returned unto Mytilene, I muſt ingeniouſly confeſs, that I did not know what Love was, but in ſuch a groſs manner, as I ſhould never have underſtood the depth of Sapho's Lines: And that fair Fool whom I loved in Sicily, did inſpire me with thoughts only proportionable unto her own wit: Therefore my love of Sapho, hath taught me to know infallibly what is in her heart, and I have now nothing elſe to do, but to learn who that happy One is whom this fair One loves, and inſpires her with ſuch tender, and compaſſionate thoughts. Therefore my dear Democedes cedes (added he) if it was not you who tought her this Art, then help me to diſcover whom it is ſhe Loves to the end I may of two courſes, take the one of them; either to cure my ſelf, or elſe to ruin my Rival. Seriouſly (ſaid I unto him once again) I cannot poſſibly believe that Sapho is in love with any; for it is moſt certain, that ſhe neither loves the Prince Tyſander, nor Nicanor: For theſe two Lovers kept ſuch jealous eyes upon one another, that they would have found it out, had there been any cauſe of ſuſpition given them; and therefore friend, you have no cauſe to trouble your mind with any ſuch fantaſtical and ill grounded jealouſie. I know not Democedes (ſaid he unto me) how its poſſible you ſhould think as you ſay: For my part, though I had ſeen with my own eyes, and heard with my own ears, a thouſand paſſages which might perſwade me, that Sapho either is, or hath been in Love, I could not more confidently believe it than I do: Therefore if it be ſo, that you are not in love with this fair perſon; nor have any manner of hidden intereſt, in ſaying as you do, I conjure you to imploy all your ingenuity, in diſcovering what I deſire to know: Cydnon loves you ſo dearly, and you have ſo much wit of your own (added he, and flattered me) that if you will, you may quickly find out, who that happy one is, which reigns in the heart of Sapho, and inſpires her with ſuch paſſionate thoughts. Oh! Heavens (ſaid he) how worthy ſhould I think my ſelf of envy, if the moſt admirable Sapho had ſuch thoughts of me, as ſhe has of ſome other; the greateſt wonder to me is, that he ſhould have the honour to make her in love with him, and that their correſpondencies ſhould not be diſcovered, and how is it poſſible he ſhould conceal ſo great a felicity?

After this, Phaon uſed a hundred expreſſions, which made both his Love and his Jealouſie equally apparent, and I did promiſe him to be as careful in enquiring of what he deſired to know, as if I had been as fully perwaded of it as he was. In the mean time, I was certain that Sapho loved none, unleſs ſhe loved him, and that her writing ſo paſſionately, proceeded only from a natural tenderneſs of her Soul. Yet for the ſatisfaction of my friend, I asked my Siſter the queſtion,as if I had doubted it: But I asked her in vain,for ſhe did not ſo much as tell me that ſhe began to love Phaon, ſo as telling Phaon that I could not diſcover any thing, he was extreamly diſquieted, and confeſſed ſince, that ſometimes he beleived Sapho loved me, and that her friendſhip unto my Siſter was but her umbrage to ſhroud her affection unto me.

In the mean time, ſince he could not diſcover any thing which might confirm him in his belief, he durſt not make it appear unto me, and yet he could not ſo conſtrain himſelf, but that I perceived his ſoul was in a very Hell: And indeed, this fantaſtical jealouſie did torment him in ſuch a cruel manner, that all the world perceived it as well as I, that he was extreamly troubled. Sapho her ſelf, asked him the reaſon of the alteration in his humour, but he durſt not tell her, nor durſt he ſpeak any more to me by reaſon of his jealous fancies, ſo as he did live a melancholy life.

Moreover, ſince it was not poſſible for him but to hear many of Saphoes verſes repeated every day, this was a daily freſh torment unto him, for he could not hear them without a tremble of heart: Again, he kept an obſervant eye upon all the men which uſed to come often unto Sapho, and alſo he was very vigilant over ſome who never came there: And jealouſie did never torment any perſon more than it did Phaon; though he had no cauſe, but was the only one that was loved of all Sapho's Lovers. He knew not what to do, nor what to think, to clear ſuſpitions: So as he reſolved to go into the Country for a while, and try if that would cure him, both of his Love, and of his Jealouſie, he took up this reſolution without imparting it unto any, inſomuch as I was much ſurprized at his departure: Sapho alſo murmured much, that he would not bid her adieu before he went, and all the reſt of her friends did nothing but ask the reaſon.

In the mean time, ſo it chanced, that I had ſome buſineſs which called me into the Country, and I went two daies after Phaon; I was no ſooner out of Mytelene, but the Prince Thraſibulus landed there, to leave the Prince Tyſander in that place, whom the invincible Cyrus, who then named himſelf Artamenes, had wounded in ſeveral places, when both falling into the Sea, they had a combat together ſo admirably ſtrange, and extraordinary, that the Prince Thraſibulus, who was then called the Famous Pirate, had as great a deſire to ſave the life of his enemy, who had ſo bravely reſiſted him, as the life of a friend, who was infinitely dear unto him: But, Madam, to wave this paſſage, the Prince Tyſander returned to Mytilene, yet worſe of thoſe wounds, which the eyes of Sapho had made in his heart, than of thoſe he received from the illuſtrious Artamenes, who honoured the fair Sapho with a viſit, which ſatisfied her ſo well, that ſhe ſpoke of none but him for a long time.

But at laſt, the Prince Thraſibulus went away, and left Tyſander there. I alſo returned to Mytelene, and Phaon hearing of his Rivals being returned alſo; but his jealouſie was it which cauſed his return: Imagining, that perhaps it was the Prince Tyſander whom Sapho loved, though none ſpoke of it. When he was returned, every one did chide him for his ſudden departure; but he did ſo little hearken unto their Railery upon it, as they gave over talking any more of it. Sapho, ſhe gloomed, and would not ſpeak to him. Alſo ſhe being perſwaded, that his ſolitarineſs was an effect of his Love unto her, ſhe pitied him, and would not twit him with it.

In the mean time, Alces was a cloſe Solicitor for the Prince Tyſander, but all his ſollicitations would not do, for ſhe would not give him any favourable countenance: And indeed, ſhe was not in a condition for it; for ſhe did already love Phaon very tenderly, or at leaſt had a ſtrong inclination to him. Yet ſince the merit and the quality of Tyſander did oblige her to look well upon him, ſhe denied him her heart without any incivility, and without denying him her eſteem; yet ſhe had a great quarrel with Alces, for giving unto Tyſander, that Picture which ſhe had beſtowed upon himſelf, yet he knew ſo well how to excuſe himſelf, that ſhe did pardon him in her heart, though ſhe alwaies ſaid, ſhe would never pardon him.

On the other ſide, Sapho having many envyers, there were ſome Ladies who told Tyſander, that Sapho had given her Picture unto ſo many, only as a ſhroud to cover her giving it unto Phaon, and they ſpake ſo highly of this freſh Lover of Sapho, that jealouſie joyned it ſelf with love to torment him.

And as fewel to the fire, Tyſander found that Phaon was ſo amiable, that he was apt to believe him beloved: So as both of them were a like jealous. Nicanor for his part, he was not exempted ſince he was jealous both of him that was loved, and of him that was not, for he feared leaſt the Quality of Tyſander ſhould win much upon Sapho, and he feared no leſs, leſt the extraordinary merit of Phaon ſhould make him miſerable.

In the mean time, this beloved Lover who made all his Rivals unhappy, was no more happy than they were, for often ſeeing the tender and paſſionate Verſes of Sapho, his jealouſie augmented every minute. Alas (would he often ſay) how great would my felicity be, if in reading all theſe paſſionate expreſſions, I could hope to be loved by a Perſon, who knows ſo well how to love? And who, by the tenderneſs of her heart, does aſſure all thoſe ſhe loves of a thouſand felicities, which others are ignorant of, and which the greateſt Beauties of the World knows not how to give.

For Beauty only hath no further attraction, but what the grace of novelty doth give it. But the tenderneſs of an amorous and paſſionate heart is an unexhauſtible ſource of freſh delights, which ſpring newly every moment, and which augments Love with Time, whereas commonly Time doth diminiſh it. But the worſt is, the tenderneſs of Sapho, being for another, ſhe makes me as miſerable as ſhe makes that other happy. And all her tender and paſſionate Lines which would be ſo many joyes unto me if I were loved, do now moſt horridly afflict me, becauſe I am not loved.

Phaon then being thus reſtleſs, not knowing what to do, nor truſting any more in me, he thought that if he could ſee all that Sapho had written, perhaps he might pick ſomething out which might ſatisfie him, and come to know who it was which inſpired her with ſuch tender and paſſionate thoughts: So as after this, he asked every one he met for the Verſes of Sapho, and was importunate alſo with her, when he was alone with her: Alſo when he was with her, he uſed to look continually upon her Table, whether ſhe had left any Papers upon it: In the end, he reſolved to ſuborn one of Sapho's women, under colour of curioſity only to ſee her excellent Verſes, to ſteal them out of her Miſtreſſes Cloſet, but do what he could, he could not corrupt her: But at laſt an accident chanced without which perhaps he had never ſeen them, and which cauſed a great diſorder and reſtleſſneſs in his mind.

Be pleaſed to know then, Madam, That the Prince Tyſander being recovered, he came to ſee Sapho, and came with abundance of company; ſo as this viſit affording no fit opportunities of making his complaints unto the fair Sapho, the diſcourſe was only upon things indifferent: And ſince Cynegire, with whom ſhe lived, had much repaired, and beautified her Houſe, ſince the departure of that Prince, they talked very much of what ſhe had done, eſpecially of Sapho's Cloſet which had been much adorned with painting ſince Tyſanders departure. This Prince, deſiring then to ſee it, and ſhe not daring to deny him, ſhe opened the Door, and all the Company went in. So that Phaon entring amongſt the reſt, he obſerved that Sapho, ſeeing ſome Papers upon the Table, ſhe bluſht, and haſted to put them into a Box half open, which her haſte perhaps made her forget to ſhut again. And Tyſander having drawn her to the Window (under pretence of a fine proſpect to talk a little in private with her) ſhe had not time to ſhut it cloſe. Phaon's jealouſie was upon the rack to ſee theſe Papers which made her bluſh, and which ſhe was ſo haſty to put up. So that to loſe no time, whilſt Tyſander was talking with Sapho, and whilſt others were looking upon the Pictures in her Cloſet, he went gently to the Box, and took out the Papers. After which not being able to ſtay in that place, he went into the Chamber again, to ſee whether he ought to keep them, or put them where they were.

He no ſooner opened the Paper, but he ſaw they were Verſes, and Verſes written with Sapho's own hand. So as not judging he could have conveniency of reading them in that place without interruption and ſeeing by the firſt words that they deſerved his curioſity, he went out of the houſe, and went to walk alone in a Garden which was by the Sea ſide, and which was alwaies open to all Comers, as ſoon as he was there, he opened the Paper, and there read theſe verſes, which I am now going to ſhew you, for I had them, as he had them, that is, without the name of that Perſon for whom they were made, as you may perceive by the Copy.

My pain is great; extream is my delight:
I muſe all day; I ſleep not in the night:
To ſay I am in Love, I cannot yet,
But yet I'me ſure, this doth reſemble it.

One only object takes up all my mind,
In nothing elſe can I a pleaſure find:
If this be it, to have a wounded heart,
Ther's none can be more ſenſible of ſmart.

My Soul is ſet on fire by certain Rayes,
The Sun leſs pleaſeth in the chilleſt daies:
No eye as yet doth ſee my flame; but ſure
Fire has no heat in't more than I endure.

When I ſee —— then my Soul's at eaſe,
He out of ſight, ther's nothing can me pleaſe:
Perhaps he is my Vanquiſher; but yet,
I will be ignorant of my defeat.

All that he ſaies, ſeems full of charms to me;
And in his ſilence, no felicity:
Haſt thou laid down thy Arms, Oh Heart ſo brave?
I cannot tell, but I believe I have.

After the Queen of Pontus had read theſe lines, ſhe reſtored them unto Democedes, conjuring him to tell her what operation theſe verſes had in the Spirit of Phaon.

I underſtand ſince from himſelf, Madam (replied Democedes, and continued his relation) that theſe verſes did raiſe ſuch a ſtorm in his heart, that he was half an hour before he could begin to read them again, though he had a great deſire unto it: For though he did believe that Sapho either was then in love, or had been in love, yet he did not believe it ſo confidently, but he was ſtrangely ſurprized prized to ſee it under her own hand : But at laſt beginning to read theſe verſes over again, and finding them more amorous the ſecond time than the firſt, he was ſo tranſported with fury, that he thought to have torn them all in pieces and thrown them into the Sea. And as he was juſt ready to do it, a fancy came into his head which prevented him, which was to conſider whoſe name of all thoſe who uſed to frequent Saphoes company, did moſt concur and ſute with the verſe, in that blank which was left for it. For he conceived (notwithſtanding his fury) that if Sapho would have given him any other name than his own, ſhe would have writ it down in her verſe. So he concluded, and rationally, that the name which would fit the verſe, was the name of him for whom they were made : Therefore looking again upon thoſe four verſes where it was written.

When I ſee —— then my Soul's at eaſe ;
He out of ſight, ther's nothing can it pleaſe :
Perhaps he is my Conqueror, but yet
I will be ignorant of my defeat.

He began to conſider what name would make up the verſe ; but he was there at a great puzzle. For that of Tyſander was too long a ſyllable : That of Nicanor the like, and mine was longer than either : Phaon found, that the name Alces was the juſt length for the verſe, but his love of the fair Athys was ſo well known unto all the world, and it was alſo well known that he was Tyſanders confident, that this made no impreſſion upon his mind. Afterwards, he examined the names of all the men of rank which uſed to viſit Sapho, but found none which fitted the verſe, becauſe they were all too long ; alſo he examined the names of all thoſe who did not viſit her, never ſo much as thinking of his own. For ſince he knew that Sapho had made thoſe verſes which cauſed his firſt jealouſie before he knew her, he never dreamed that thoſe which had cauſed him ſo much ſorrow, would have cauſed much joy, had he known the cauſe : And he was far from having any ſuch thoughts, as that he had never examined whether his own name did fit the verſe, when I accidentally came unto him.

him: But Madam, the wonder was, to ſee Phaon, who ſince his fantaſtical jealouſie looked very much aſquint at me, now become very kind again, becauſe my name did not fit the verſe, ſo as he accoſted me with his accuſtomed freedom, and took me for his confident as familiarly as if I had never cauſed any of his jealouſie. And he no ſooner ſaw me, but coming to me, ſince we are both in the wrong (ſaid he unto me and embraced me) I beſeech you my dear Democedes, let us forget what's paſt, and begin our amity anew, for now I plainly ſee I was in the wrong in thinking it was you who had taught Sapho to know all the delicacies of Love, and I can make it appear unto you that you were in the wrong to believe, ſhe was not in love. Is it poſſible (ſaid I unto him) That you ſhould have ſuch clear teſtimonies of it, as cannot be doubted? You ſhall quickly ſee that (ſaid he) by reading theſe verſes which I ſtole from her, you know her ſtile and her hand, and happily may gueſs at the name of him for whom they were made, for my mind is ſo full of perplexities, that I confeſs I cannot gueſs at him; After this, I began to read Sapho's verſes, but in reading them I found at the very firſt, that the name of Phaon filled up the verſe, and I remembred ſo many paſſages which had made me believe that Sapho did not hate him, as I made no doubt but that they were made for him, and I did the more believe it, becauſe I could not find any name except that of Alces which did run right in verſe; and as for Alces I knew it could not be him, ſo as intending to comfort him, for my part (ſaid I) I ſee no ſuch difficulty in finding out a name which will fitly fill up the blank in the verſe, and I am confident the fair Sapho did intend it thus.

When I ſee Phaon then my ſoul's at eaſe;
He out of ſight, ther's nothing can me pleaſe:
Perhaps he is my Vanquiſher, but yet
I will be ignorant of my defeat.

Ah Democedes (cried he out) 'Tis true indeed, my name does fit the verſe, but the verſe fits not me, and I cannot chooſe but wonder how you ſhould ſo ſuddenly think upon my name As for my part, I did not ſo much as think upon it, whether or no my name was Phaon. However this accident adds no comfort unto me, for all theſe excellent, tender, amorous, and paſſionate Copies of the fair Saphoes were all written before I ever knew her, and therefore it is to be thought they were made for ſome other happy one who has the felicity to teach her all the tenderneſs of Love, in making himſelf Loved.

For my part (replied he) I know not whether I be miſtaken; but me-thinks thoſe Characters do not look as if they had been long writ. But I am the moſt miſtaken man in the world if theſe verſes were not made for you, and if you in lieu of being the moſt miſerable, are not yet the moſt happy Lover in the world

How! (ſaid he) do you think Sapho could love me and I not perceive it? And that a man who looks upon her every minute; obſerves all her Actions and all her Words, and does all he can to gueſs her thoughts, ſhould not ſee ſhe loves him? Ah Democedes, this is impoſſible, and it is but too true, that theſe verſes were never made for me. As he ſaid ſo, we heard a great noiſe of many people talking, and turning about, we ſaw coming towards us, the Prince Tyſander, leading Sapho, who had with her all her Friends, Nicanor, Alces, and many others. So as reſtoring back the verſes unto Phaon, he haſtily put them into his Pocket. But Sapho having obſerved that Phaon left them abruptly, ſhe began to chide him, and chid him in ſuch a gallant manner for preferring ſolitude before ſuch good company, that he was obliged to walk along with them, and ſo we both did, though we had no great fancy unto it, for ſhe was very penſive, and I had ſome other buſineſs. But at laſt, we came unto the end of the Garden which was towards the Sea, where we found a Bark, into which we went, and chance placing Phaon very near Tyſander and Sapho, he plainly ſaw the verſes were not made for that Prince, for Sapho did not anſwer him with ſo much as one favourable look, but was ſo cold and hollow towards him, as it was eaſie to ſee there was no great ſympathy of hearts. In the mean time, he was ſo taken up with his own thoughts, that he had no ſhare in the general converſation.

That which I had ſaid unto him coming often into his imagination he often ſweetly flattered up himſelf, but preſently after beginning to think upon the amorous expreſſions which Sapho uſed, and that they were written before he knew her, his jealouſie revived; So as paſſing from hopes to fears, he entertained himſelf, and talked unto none, he fell into a deep ſtudy and leaning over the Barque, he looked attentively upon that bubbling froth which is always at the Prow of thoſe Barques which ſail ſwiftly. Phaon was too dear in the eſteem of Sapho, for her not to obſerve his penſiveneſs, ſo as ſhe both took notice of him, and cauſed others to take notice alſo. But amongſt the reſt, Tyſander who knew Phaon was in love with Sapho, and that Sapho did not hate Phaon, he kept a very obſervant eye upon him, endeavouring to find out, why he was ſo melancholy, and if it were poſſible to find what the cauſe was, becauſe he was in Sapho's disfavour, or elſe whether it was only becauſe he was too much in love with her. So as looking upon him no leſs than upon Sapho, it unhappily fell out that Phaon in taking ſomething out of his Pocket, not knowing what he did, and without interrupting his muſing, he pull'd out Sapho's Verſes alſo which fell at the feet of Tyſander, who ſeeing them fall, ſtoop'd and unperceivedly took them up: But, Madam, after he had read them, he was no leſs penſive than Phaon, for in a thought that he was his Rival, he feared to find that which he would not have ſought, but in hopes not to find it.

In the mean time, Cydnon ſeeing that Phaons muſing troubled Sapho, ſhe began to ſpeak unto him, and ask him the cauſe, which you may well imagine he would not tell her. But Sapho's Verſes running much in his mind, he put his hand in his Pocket to feel whether they were there, though he doubted it not; for it is very cuſtomary for thoſe in Love to do many things which they would not do, were their reaſon free: Phaon then finding them not in his Pocket, was ſtrangely amazed when he ſaw that he had them not: Yet he durſt not expreſs his wonder, nor ſay he had loſt them; for if he had, he had acquainted Sapho with his theevry, and ſhould and ſhould have been extreamly aſhamed. Moreover, not knowing certainly whether he loſt them in the Garden, or in the Barque, or whether they were faln into the Sea, he durſt not make Hue and Cry after his loſs, eſpecially for Sapho's ſake, and her concernment: For though he was very jealous, yet he was very reſpective of her, and her glory was more conſiderable unto him, than his own tranquility: ſo as he contented himſelf with looking all about him, not telling what he looked for: but as he was very earneſt in it, though he did endeavour to do it without any affectation, Tyſander knew very well that what his Rival had loſt did wring him at the heart, and that what he had found would perhaps be ſad ſatisfaction of his doubts. But at laſt, our Maritime diverſion being ended, we waited upon the Ladies home, and conducted alſo the Prince Tyſander unto his Lodging; who as ſoon as he was there, went into his Cloſet, opened the Paper which he found, and read thoſe Verſes which troubled him, as much as they had his Rival.

But, Madam, he was not ſo much puzzled as his Rival was to find out the name which was to fill up the imperfect Verſe; for he never doubted, but that Phaon was the name, and he believed alſo, that Sapho had given theſe Verſes unto his Rival, with her own hand, and that the knot of Affection between them, was already ſo faſt tyed, that nothing could unlooſe it: You may imagine, Madam, how vexatious were theſe thoughts unto him, and he ſaid ſince, that never any thing in his life did more trouble him: Phaon on the other ſide was far from any quietneſs of mind; for maugre his jealouſie, he was extreamly ſenſible of Sapho's Reputation, who was in as great a perplexity as he was: For, Madam, this excellent Lady did ſo repent of leaving thoſe Verſes in danger of being ſeen, that as ſoon as ever ſhe returned home, ſhe went into her Cloſet with intentions to burn them, and never to make any of the like nature again; but ſhe was much ſurprized and afflicted, when ſhe could not find them in the place where ſhe put them: She would not truſt unto her memory, but ſearched in all other places, where there was any poſſibility of their being, but at laſt concluding that queſtionleſs they were ſtoln from her, ſhe was ſo extreamly afflicted, that never in all her life ſhe was the like.

However, in this perplexity of ſpirit, ſhe could not imagine a wiſh more ſweet, than that it might be Phaon who had taken away theſe Verſes, though ſhe was much aſhamed he ſhould ever ſee them, for being ignorant of his jealouſie, ſhe imagined he would apply them unto himſelf, but though ſhe wiſh'd it, yet ſhe could not hope it was Phaon who had them, becauſe ſhe ſaw him ſo ſad, ſhe could not ſuſpect him.

And remembring that he went from her Houſe immediately after Tyſander came into her Cloſet, ſhe could not think he had time enough to commit the theft, ſo that not knowing whom to ſuſpect, ſhe was infinitely troubled.

On the other ſide, Tyſander ſeeing by theſe Verſes that Sapho loved Phaon, and not doubting but that his Rival had received theſe Verſes from the hand of his Miſtreſs, and that the knot of their Affections was undiſſolvably tyed, he reſolved to overcome his Paſſion, but to carry his reſpects of Sapho as far as poſſible: And though Alces was his Confident, yet he did not ſhew him theſe Verſes.

'Tis true, he was three whole days in conſulting upon this Reſolution during which time he did not ſee Sapho, who for her part avoided all company as much as ſhe could for fear of hearing of theſe Verſes.

On the other ſide, Phaon durſt not ſee her; for he perceived, it would be impoſſible for him not to give her many teſtimonies of his trouble, penſiveneſs, and jealouſie. Nicanor, he was ſo puzled to find out the reaſon why theſe two Rivals and his Miſtreſs ſhould be all ſo ſollitary at one time, that he was no leſs unquiet than they were.

But at laſt, Tyſander ſtriving with himſelf, he was Conquerour, and ſent unto Sapho, to deſire a private Conference, about ſome buſineſs of concernment; Sapho not daring to deny him by reaſon of his quality, conſented; but it was with regret, becauſe ſhe feared his buſineſs was about the Verſes: Not but that ſhe thought it impoſſible it ſhould be him who took the Verſes out of her Cloſet, for ſhe had him alwaies in her eye, but her fear was, ſome other had given them unto him.

In the mean time, this hour of audience being come, Tyſander went to Sapho, without any one to wait upon him; but in lieu of accoſting her as uſually, he ſaluted her with a faint, and ſerious civility, though with much reſpect, which did infer unto her, that he had ſome angry buſineſs to impart: None but they being in the Chamber, Tyſander had the freedom of talk, ſo as loſing no time, I come now, Madam, (ſaid he unto her) to render you the greateſt teſtimony of my love that ever any did, by reſtoring unto you thoſe Verſes which Phaon loſt, and which you gave unto him: And truly, any other beſides my ſelf would in revenge of your cruelty, have ſhewed them unto all the World; but my reſpects of you are ſo great, that notwithſtanding your rigour, I am afraid to diſpleaſe you, and would gladly preſerve your eſteem, though I cannot obtain your affection.

In ſaying ſo, Tyſander gave Sapho thoſe Verſes which ſhe made for Phaon his Rival, he gave them open, and let her ſee how he had ſupplied the blank with the name of Phaon. You may well imagine, Madam, that Sapho did not take theſe Verſes without a bluſh, yet after a little recollecting her ſelf, ſhe attempted to do two things at once: The firſt, abſolutely to diſengage Tyſander from her affection: And the ſecond, to perſwade him, that theſe Verſes were made, neither for Phaon in particular, nor for any other in general.

But all her Sophiſtry, her Rethorick, and her Arguments, could not reach half of her deſires, for though ſhe did diſengage Tyſander from loving her, yet ſhe could not make him believe, that theſe Verſes were made for any other than Phaon. She could not perſwade him, but that ſhe gave them unto Phaon with her own hand though ſhe told him true, when ſhe ſaid he had ſtoln them from her. No, no, Madam, (ſaid Tyſander to her) you can never perſwade me to it, for ſhe who can give a heart, may well give Verſes; one may ſometimes times give a heart (replied Sapho) and yet give nothing elſe: And this circumſtance which you ſo much undervalue, is ſo conſiderable to me, that there is no compariſon between my making Verſes for Phaon, and giving them unto him with my own hand: Suppoſe I had a very ſtrong inclination to him, it would be no ſuch wonder if I ſhould tell my ſelf the thoughts of my own heart; and though it be a weakneſs, yet it thwarts not the Laws of modeſty, ſince none ſhould know it but my ſelf: But, Sir, you have done me ſo great a wrong in accuſing me, of giving theſe Verſes unto Phaon, and you think ſo ſtrangely of me, that I wonder you have not divulged them unto all the World; for if I were ſo indiſcreet as to give theſe Verſes unto Phaon, I were alſo unworthy of ſo much diſcretion in you.

However, I give you thanks for reſtoring them, and conjure you to tell me truly how you came by them, for ſince I hold no particular correſpondency with Phaon, I cannot know it from any but your ſelf: Oh, Madam, replied Tyſander, my actions do not merit this incredulity: yet ſince perhaps Phaon will not tell you that he loſt thoſe Verſes which he ſhould ſo carefully have kept, I will tell you that I ſaw them fall out of his Pocket that evening when we took the air upon the Sea, and I took them up, not knowing they included the ſentence of my death. Phaon was ſo ſad that evening (replied ſhe) as me-thinks you may be perſwaded, I did not give theſe Verſes unto him, and that he did not think they were made for him. For to tell you truly, the conqueſt of Sapho's heart, is not ſo eaſie a matter, as that he ſhould have the vanity, to think he hath done it: or to be joyed at it.

However it be, Madam, (ſaid Tyſander) I am moſt confidently perſwaded, that Phaon is as much loved as I am hated, and if I had not more reſpective thoughts of you than ever any ill treated Lover had, I ſhould find means how to ſend back Phaon into Sicily.

But ſince it would be in vain to baniſh him out of this Iſle, becauſe I cannot baniſh him out of your Heart, I will not, Madam, be your Tyrant, after I have been your Slave: But, Madam, in acknowledgment of my reſpects, I beſeech you be ſincere, and ingeniouſly confeſs the true ſtate of your Soul, as I have mine unto you, to the end I may leave you at reſt, and endeavour to recover mine. Sir, (replied Sapho and bluſht) if I were able to give you my affection, as I am my eſteem, doubtleſs I ſhould, in acknowledgment of your generoſity; but to be ſincere with you, Sir, there hath been ever ſuch a powerful obſtruction in your deſign of obtaining my Love, that do what I can, I ſhall never be able to remove it: And after this, Sir, be ſatisfied, and ask me no more, for ſince I cannot love you, it concerns not you whether ever I love Phaon or no. I do not ask the queſtion for any further clearing of my knowledge, Madam; (replied he) for I do not at all doubt it; but I ask it only, that I may once more in my life commend you. I beſeech you, Sir, (replied Sapho) do not perſiſt in any thing ſo unjuſt, and impertinent; but content your ſelf, that I tell you, I cannot love you, and that I do not perceive in Phaon the ſame impoſſibility of loving him, as I do of you: That is enough, Madam, (ſaid he and riſe up,) to make me the moſt miſerable of men, yet ſince I am fully reſolved to reſpect you for ever, I will do what I am able to break down violently that wall which ſeparates me from your affection: I will only wiſh in parting from you, that you may hereafter know, though you have given your heart unto the moſt accompliſhed of all your Lovers, yet you have not given it unto the moſt faithful, and moſt amorous.

After this, Madam, Tyſander went away, but with ſo much ſadneſs in his looks, that Sapho, as inſenſible as ſhe was to him, did feel her heart was a little moved. But ſince there were then ſuch things in agitation, as did move it much more, ſhe thought more of Phaon, than Tyſander, and ſhe had a freſh ſubject for thoſe thoughts, by a viſit which my Siſter made unto her.

For be pleaſed to know, Madam, that I ſeeing Phaon in ſuch a gulph of ſorrows, and having my ſelf a great deſire to know truly whether theſe Verſes which had cauſed ſo much diſorder, were made for Phaon, as I thought they were, I went unto Cydne, with whom I lived; not only as with a moſt dear Siſter, but as with a moſt faithful friend, and as a great ſecret. I told her of my friends jealouſie; of the adventure of the Verſes, and conjured her to tell me whether they were made for Phaon. If they were made for any one, replied ſhe, certainly they were made for him: but Brother, I know nothing of them, nor did Sapho ever ſhew me the Verſes you ſpeak of. However (ſaid I unto her) the poor Phaon, who thinks they were made for ſome other, is ſo extreamly jealous and ſad, that I think he will dye, unleſs you help me to aſſiſt and comfort him. Truly Brother, (replied ſhe) it is not an eaſie matter to be done, for Sapho, who ſeldom keeps any ſecret from me, never mentioned this adventure: And I do not ſee how I can ſpeak unto him unleſs he ſpeak unto me: 'Tis true, (added ſhe) that I have hardly ſeen her two minutes ſince we were upon the Sea: But I will promiſe you to ſee Sapho, and do Phaon any good office I can.

After this I did aggravate the jealouſie of this Lover as much as I could, purpoſely to make them pity his miſery: but the more I ſpoke, the more I ſaw ſhe had a mind to laugh; for ſhe knowing all Sapho's thoughts of Phaon, ſhe was ſo tickled to think that he himſelf ſhould be the beloved Rival, which ſo much afflicted him, as for her heart ſhe could not forbear. Cruel Siſter, (ſaid I unto her) I did not acquaint you with the miſeries of my friend for you to laugh at them, I aſſure you he deſerves more pitty than laughter. If I thought ſo Brother, (replied ſhe) I ſhould not laugh: But ſince I know Phaon has no Rival whom he need to fear, I muſt confeſs I cannot chooſe but laugh at his ill grounded ſorrows: For it is as good ſport as poſſible can be, to obſerve the follies of the wiſeſt Men, when they are once engaged in a buſineſs of this nature: And therefore I pray pardon this natural diſpoſition of mirth, when I meet with ſuch occaſions as this, and believe, that I will do Phaon all the offices of a friend I can. And indeed, Madam, as ſoon as ſhe was gone, ſhe went unto Sapho, and came thither about a quarter of an hour after Tyſander went away: ſo as Sapho's mind being full, and deſirous to unburden it unto her Siſter, ſhe called her into her Cloſet: and giving orders that none ſhould come unto her: ſhe conjured Cydnon to pardon her for with-holding a ſecret from her three days together; for truly my dear Cydnon, (ſaid Sapho unto her, after ſhe had to'd her the adventure) never any thing in all my life did ſo cruelly vex me: and nothing was more intollerable to me, than that Tyſander ſhould ſee any Verſes of ſuch a nature: nor nothing more terrible to me, than to think that Phaon ſhould have read them.

For my part (continued ſhe) I do not think I ſhall be able to ſee him: and I have ſeen none theſe three days, purpoſely to avoid meeting with him; not but that I ſometimes wiſhed it might be he who ſhould find theſe Verſes; but I wiſhed it when I thought he had them not: Yet now it is otherwiſe with me, and I had rather a hundred others had ſeen them than Phaon, for how dare I ever look him in the face after ſuch a peeviſh adventure? The truth is, I have reaſon to fear, that his truſting unto the affection which I bear unto him, will make him talk to me with leſs reſpect, and he will think his Conqueſt ſo eaſie, that it is no glory unto him. If you have any cauſe of fears (replied Cydnon) it is not at any thing you have ſaid: And to teſtifie how abſolutely I am devoted yours, Madam, I will betray a ſecret unto you which a Brother has entruſted me withal. And acquaint you that Phaon is the moſt miſerable, and the moſt jealous of all Men living. He is not then in Love with me (replied Sapho and bluſhed:) he is more in Love with you (replied Cydnon) than ever any was: but he is ſo jealous, and in ſuch a fantaſtical manner, as I know not how you can cure him. This Ænigma is ſo obſcure, anſwered Sapho, that it paſſeth my underſtanding when I have expounded it (replied ſhe) you will better underſtand it, but your aſtoniſhment will not be a jot the leſs: For on that day when you ſhewed Phaon and Democedes your Verſes, Phaon found in them ſuch paſſionate expreſſions, as he concluded moſt certainly you either were in Love, or had been, and that it was impoſſible any living ſhould write ſo tenderly, unleſs they had been in Love; ſo as this odd fancy being in his head, he hath ſince ſuffered moſt incredible afflictions, and hath done nothing elſe but hunt out after this ſuppoſed Rival, who hath inſpired you with ſuch tenderneſs in your Verſes.

But I beſeech you Cidnon, (ſaid Sapho and interrupted her) tell me ſeriouſly whether all this you tell me be not ſome quibble of your own wit? No, no, (replied ſhe) there is nothing truer than what I tell you: For the miſerable Phaon is ſo poſſeſſed with this imagination, that in lieu of applying them unto himſelf, or rejoycing at his good fortune, he is carefully examining what names ſutes beſt with that blank which was left in a Verſe: and for my part, I have ſuch merry Conceptions upon this paſſage, that did I not ſee you very penſive, I ſhould laugh heartily: However I beſeech you ſeriouſly to find out ſome way how to cure poor Phaon of his jealouſie; for my Brother repreſents him in ſuch a miſerable condition, that he deſerves ſome help and ſuccour. I perceive then (replied Sapho) that Democedes hath ſeen theſe cruel Verſes which make me ſo aſhamed: And that though I have told Phaon a hundred times, if ever I admitted of any Lover, he ſhould never have any Confident; yet I ſee that I am like to have as many Confidents of my weakneſs as there are Men in Metilene. Not but that I know very well (continued ſhe very obligingly) Democedes is very diſcreet: but for all that Cydnon confeſs the truth, did not he gueſs at the name better than Phaon? He did not tell me (replyed ſhe) but I aſſured him that either theſe Verſes were intended for none, or elſe that they were intended for Phaon. For he being his particular friend, I thought thereby the more to engage his diſcretion, and to keep him from further enquiry into a buſineſs of which I promiſed to give him an account.

But Cydnon (replied Sapho) what account can you give which will be advantageous unto me? For to tell him that I love Phaon, is horrid unto me: To ſwear that I love him not, will make him believe I love another: and to proteſt that I love none (conſidering the fancy which Phaon hath in his head) will augment his jealouſie and not juſtifie me: However I wiſh I could find out an expedient which would prevent his jealouſie, which would preſerve his affection, which would hide mine from Democedes, and which would only let Phaon gueſs at mine: For my part (replied Cydnon) conſidering the language of my Brother, I think it will be a very hard matter to cure Phaon of his jealouſie, unleſs you will acquaint him with your tenderneſs of him: Fie, fie, Cydnon, (replied Sapho) I had rather he ſhould continue eternally jealous, than that he ſhould ſee all my weakneſs.

Then you care not for preſerving his Heart (anſwered Cydnon) for you know better than I do, that long jealouſie ſmothers love. The foundation of Phaon's jealouſie hath ſo little ſolidity in it (replied Sapho) that I cannot think it will laſt long. Nay, on the contrary, (anſwered my Siſter) ſince it hath no foundation, it is harder to drive it away: As for example, if Phaon were poſitively jealous of Nicanor, then there were no way but to treat Nicanor ill, and ſee him no more, to make his jealouſie ceaſe: but ſince he is jealous only becauſe you have written your Verſes in ſuch tender and paſſionate ſtrains as might perſwade one a little that you are in love, it is impoſſible you ſhould ever cure him; but by giving him ſome cauſe to think you have none but him, and to let him think that the Verſes he hath ſeen belongs to him. As I did gueſs at his affection to me before he told me of it (anſwered ſhe) ſo let him gueſs if he can at the tenderneſs I have to him: For if he do not, he ſhall never know it for me. But yet (ſaid Cydnon) muſt he not know any thing more concerning that Verſe which wants a name? Is it not enough (replied ſhe) that he ſays that the names of all others (who are in any likelihood of loving me) does not ſuit with it, and that his doth? Is not this enough to make him underſtand, that either they were made for none, or they were made for him?

If his fancy were not prepoſſeſſed (replied Cydnon) doubtleſs what you ſay were ſufficient: but as the conſtitution of his mind is, if the conſervation of Phaon be dear unto you, ſomething elſe muſt be done, and you muſt permit my Brother at the leaſt to give him ſome comfort and hopes in his miſery. Provided he could do it without giving any ſuſpitions of my conſent (replied Sapho) Democedes may tell him what he will to perſwade him I am not in Love with any; for I had rather Phaon ſhould think I love him, than to think I will permit any other to love me.

After this, Sapho told Cydnon all that Tyſander ſaid unto her: Thus you ſee (ſaid ſhe unto her) that Phaon's Rival is better informed of my ſorrows for him, than he himſelf is. The truth is Cydnon (continued ſhe) my fate is very ſtrange, for Tyſander knows that I do love Phaon, and he knows it ſo certainly that he hath abandoned me upon it: And Phaon on the contrary is ready to quit me, becauſe he thinks I love another and not him, ſo as being, (as if it were) a Rival, unto himſelf, he doth himſelf more hurt than all his Rivals, and hath brought me unto the moſt ſtrange conjecture that ever a perſon of my humour could be. For Women ought never to ſay that they are in Love, but only that they are loved. Therefore Cydnon we muſt ſubmit the adventure unto fortune. But take heed, Madam, replied ſhe, you do not repent of what you have ſaid. If I do repent of what I have ſaid (replied ſhe) I ſhall not do any more than what I have done a thouſand times ſince I firſt knew Phaon, for I have repented I ever deſired Democedes to bring me acquainted with him, I repented that ever I ſpoke unto him, that ever I loved him, and that ever I compoſed thoſe unhappy Verſes, which cauſed this laſt diſorder, and, to tell you my thoughts plainly, I repent of all I ever ſaid or did ſince I was firſt taught to ſpeak; And if I ſhould keep Phaon by any endeavours which are unworthy of my ſelf, I ſhou'd repent eternally, and to tell you truly, if I ſhould loſe him by my too ſcrupulous ſeverity I ſhould repent it till my death.

This Madam, was the temper of Sapho's mind when my Siſter talked with her, ſo as knowing very well that ſhe would give her conſent unto Phaon's cure of jealouſie; by any ways which might not engage her too far, ſhe would preſs her no further, and as ſoon as ſhe ſaw me ſhe told me that Phaon was too blame, that I ſhould adviſe him to ſee Sapho as ſoon as he could, and that moſt certainly he had no reaſon to fear any Rival. But, Madam, the ſtrangeſt paſſage in all this rancounter was, that Sapho's mind was taken up with ſo many various thoughts, that ſhe never thought of any anger againſt Phaon, for being ſo bold as to take theſe Verſes out of her Chamber.

However Cydnon tranſacted ſo well with me, and I with Phaon, that though he did not poſſitively believe all I told him, yet he reſolved to go unto Sapho, and to go with intentions of telling her the very bottom of his Soul: yet in the interim, a chance happened which changed his mind.

For an univerſal report went about all Mytilene, that Tyſander was reſolved to ſee Sapho no more. Phaon imagining that the Prince would never have quitted her, unleſs he had diſcovered that ſhe was in love with ſome one, his jealouſie renewed, and broke off his firſt deſign. Not but that he had reaſon to believe of Tyſander, as he did, but he did not know that it was himſelf who diſengaged that Prince from the love of Sapho: But at laſt after he had paſſed over two days in this uncertainty, he reſolved again to go unto Sapho, and diſcover unto her the grandure of his Love, and the violence of his jealouſie: and indeed he went unto her the next day ſo early, that he found none with her.

It is an eaſie matter to tell you, Madam, the reſentments of theſe two perſons: For Sapho was aſhamed of her own weakneſs and pittied the weakneſs of Phaon: and this Lover had ſo many ſeveral reſentments, as it is impoſſible to repreſent them, for he told me that his love and his jealouſie redoubled, and yet alſo he had ſome reviver of his hopes. But at laſt, having ſaluted each other with equal agitation of Spirits, Phaon asked Sapho pardon for being ſo long from her. But, Madam, (ſaid he) I know not, whether after I have asked pardon for not ſeeing you, I ſhould alſo ask it for ſeeing you: For I am come with a reſolution to talk of ſo many things, as that I am afraid of talking ſomething which ſhall diſpleaſe you, though I am reſolved to ſay nothing that ſhall be unworthy of that love and reſpect which I have unto you.

Sir, replied ſhe, we have had ſo few occaſions of any quarrels ſince we were acquainted, that I know not what you can ſay otherwiſe. I muſt ask you, Madam, replied he, whether I was not much too blame in being the moſt jealous man alive? I muſt conjure you to talk ſincerely with me; I muſt beſeech you to have compaſſion upon my weakneſs: To examine well the paſſion which cauſed it, to ponder all the reaſons which may excuſe my jealouſie, and if it be poſſible, not to drive me unto deſpair.

All theſe, replied Sapho, do argue, that there is ſuch a great diſorder in your mind, as I ſhall out of pity do that, which in reaſon I ought not to do, if I did hearken unto the exact Rules of Juſtice and Decency. And therefore I will hearken unto your complaints, and let you ſpeak of your jealouſie, though I cannot endure you ſhould ſpeak of your Love. Speak then Phaon, (ſaid ſhe again unto him) and tell me of whom you are jealous? I know not Madam (ſaid he unto her) but I am ſure, that ſometimes I think I have all imaginable cauſe. For, Madam, you have ſuch paſſionate expreſſions in your Writings, as you muſt of neceſſity have been ſenſible of them your ſelf. And you have made ſuch Verſes which I was ſo bold as to ſteal away, as have coſt me a million of ſighs, and perhaps will coſt me my life, if you of your goodneſs will not apply a remedy to cure me: But what remedy (ſaid Sapho) will cure you? You muſt perſwade me (replied he) that you have loved none, and that if ever you love any it ſhall be the unfortunate Phaon. But, Madam, ſince this is an impoſſibility, I will not ask it, but will poſſitively ask you the true ſtate of your ſoul, and will ask you the name of him for whom you made thoſe Verſes which I was ſo preſumptuous as to take out of your Cloſet.

To anſwer in general unto all you ask, (replied ſhe) I muſt tell you, that I did write ſo paſſionately, becauſe naturally, I have a tender ſoul, and I aſſure you afterwards, that if I have made any jealous, yet certainly it ought not to have been you. For I will tell you for my own honour, as much as for your tranquility, that I loved none the ſame day you came unto Metilene; and I aſſure you further, that I have done nothing ſince, which ſhould make you jealous: And to teſtifie the truth of what I ſay, I will give you leave to obſerve all my actions, all my words, and all my very looks, and if after that you find any cauſe of jealouſie, then be ſo, even unto fury; and be perſwaded that in permitting you to be jealous, I have done more for you, than ever I did for any.

Since, Madam, you cannot permit me to be jealous (replied he) unleſs you permit me to be in love, I muſt give you moſt humble thanks for that permiſſion, as for the greateſt favour in the world; yet I ſhould be much more obliged, if you would be pleaſed to tell me whom you are pleaſed I ſhould love, than to give me leave to be jealous? And therefore tell me, Madam, I beſeech you, whether I may hope, that you will ever be ſo tender unto me, as you know moſt admirably well how to expreſs; ſhould I not be too preſumptuous in pretending unto thoſe Verſes which ſo cruelly have made me jealous? But, Madam, before I can believe ſuch a glorious aſſurance, you muſt be very ſincere; you muſt tell me more than what yet you have; you muſt ſhew me your heart, as I have ſhewed you mine; and you muſt not keep back any ſecret of your ſoul, before I can know you. Though you have loved one before I had the honour to be known unto you, yet I have no reaſon to complain: Not but that I wiſh with a moſt paſſionate deſire, that I were the firſt who entred into your heart: But yet if that happineſs be not poſſible, however I ſhall eſteem my ſelf very happy in being the ſucceſſor of that moſt happy Rival.

Speak then, Divine Sapho, and tell me whether I muſt be jealous? Whether I muſt be happy? Or whether I muſt be miſerable? And to tell me in two fatal words, whether I muſt live or dye? Phaon expreſſed himſelf in an Air ſo full of reverent reſpect, he had in his voice ſuch a kind of Rethorical tone, and he looked upon Sapho in ſuch a ſubmiſſive and paſſionate manner, that this Fair One, not being able to treat ſuch a Lover ill whom ſhe had a mind to preſerve, ſhe ſpoke unto him ſo diſcreetly, that without telling him ſhe loved him, ſhe did re-animate his hopes, did diſſipate his jealouſie, augment his paſſion, and fill'd his ſoul full of joy.

Indeed theſe two Lovers, who in beginning their diſcourſe knew hardly what to ſay, and who had a thouſand thoughts in their hearts, which they thought ſhould never be revealed, yet at laſt imparted all, and made ſuch a ſincere exchange of all their moſt ſecret thoughts, that all in the heart of Sapho, paſſed into the ſoul of Phaon, and all that was in the ſoul of Phaon paſſed into the ſoul of Sapho. Alſo they agreed upon the Articles and Conditions of their Love. For Phaon promiſed Sapho, which deſired it, never to deſire any thing of her, but the enjoyment and poſſeſſion of her heart: And ſhe promiſed him alſo, never to receive any into her heart, but him.

After this, they told each other all the particular paſſages of their Lives. And ever ſince Madam, there hath been ſuch an admirable union between theſe two perſons, as never were their equals ſeen: The love of Phaon augmented with his happineſs, and the affection of Sapho became more violent, by the acquaintance ſhe had of the greatneſs of her Lovers Love. Never were two hearts ſeen more united; nor ever did Love join two together, with more purity and zeal.

They communicated unto each other all their thoughts, and they underſtood one another without telling them; they ſaw in each others eyes, the motions of their hearts, and ſaw them all ſo tender and paſſionate unto each other, that the more they looked, the more they loved: Yet the peace between them was not ſo ſollidly eſtabliſhed, but they had ſome amorous wars, and though they loved as much as poſſible, yet they would ſometimes complain that they loved not enough, but there was never any ſuch civil wars as did diſturb the Halcyon Serenity of their Loves.

In the mean time, ever ſince this conjunction of hearts between Phaon and Sapho, Nicanor hath been in a miſerable condition, and Tyſander eſteemed himſelf as happy as prudent, in diſ-engaging himſelf from his paſſion. The truth is, he cured himſelf by another beauty; for Pittacus being reſolved to marry him unto the fair Alcionide, he went to Guides, where ſhe was, and where he fell as much in love with her as with Sapho, but for all his love to the one, he ſtill preſerved much eſteem for the other.

In the mean time, Charaxes the Brother of Sapho, who took it ill ſhe ſhould refuſe the affection of Tyſander, and admit of Phaons, went to travel, and departed without taking his leave, or bidding adieu to any. On the other ſide, though Nicanor did ſtill moſt paſſionately love Sapho, and horridly hated Phaon, yet he offered no violence unto either: For ſuch was the admirable diſcretion of Sapho, in keeping every one within the limits of their due reſpects, and in uniting the moſt divided ſpirits, that though ſhe could not make them perfect friends, yet ſhe kept them from down right quarrelling. All this while Phaon being aſſured, that he was preferred before all his Rivals, he was not jealous of any: And indeed he was highly happy in it; for Sapho cauſed ſo many to be in love with her, that Alces himſelf, as deeply in love as he was with the fair Athys, began to waver and divide his heart: And except Themiſtogenes, who could not love any which did not reſemble Damophile, there was not one man of any ſoul or quality, who had not ſome ſparks of Love unto Sapho.

For my part, being Phaon's choice, and particular friend, I ever defended my ſelf againſt her Arrows, and was never down-right in love with her, but I had ſo much affection unto her, as kept me from loving any other.

In the mean time, this univerſal approbation of Sapho, incenſed all the Ladies; who pretending unto high beauty, had hardly any adorers, whilſt Sapho, whoſe modeſty would not let her think ſhe had any, was invironed with a croud of them. But the wonder was, that this moſt rare woman, without the leaſt digreſſion from that fidelity ſhe owed unto Phaon, did ſtill maintain her ſoveraignty in the ſouls of all her Lovers: For behaving her ſelf ſo diſcreetly, that none of them ever ſaid any thing unto her, which ſhe would not have them, ſhe never had any cauſe to complain againſt them, and by conſequence had no cauſe to baniſh them from her: Not but that Phaon would ſome daies complain a little againſt ſuch a croud about her; but when ſhe gave him to underſtand, that prudence required he ſhould hide himſelf among the croud, becauſe if ſhe ſhould baniſh them, ſhe ſhould baniſh him alſo, or elſe her glory would ſuffer diminution, then Phaon was contented to endure all the Lovers of Sapho, who durſt not appear under any other notion than that of friends.

For my part, I have wondred a hundred times at that power, which Sapho had over her Slaves: For though there was not one of them, who did not know that ſhe loved Phaon, and Phaon only; yet there was not one of them who was out of hopes, though ſhe gave them not the leaſt ground: And though they all hated Phaon, yet they neither durſt, nor could hurt him: Nor did they jar among themſelves, for ſince they cou'd be jealous of none but Phaon only, they grew into a kind of confidence together.

Thus the Loved, the Lovers, the Lover Loved, and the ill-treated Rivals all were together, without the leaſt conteſt that was troubleſome unto our ſociety; and which was moſt admirable, Sapho in the midſt of this croud, did find out waies to give Phaon a thouſand teſtimonies of her affection to him, and unperceived to ſacrifice all his Rivals unto him. Thus, without doing any thing againſt the exact rules of civility, and without any allurements, Sapho had the glory to have an infinite number of Adorers, and without any of that ſeverity of thoſe faithful Lovers, who conſtrain themſelves ſo much, that they almoſt become ſavage: Phaon and ſhe enjoyed all the ſweets of a moſt pure and innocent Love; for they were none of thoſe, who as ſoon as they are certain of their Miſtreſſes, and Servants, do uſe to renounce almoſt all manner of Gallantry, as they if had been married many a year, for Phaon was as courtly, as humble, and aſſiduous, as if he had yet to conquer that noble heart which he already enjoyed: And Sapho was as exact, and as regularly civil and complaiſant, as if her Conqueſt were uncertain. Moreover, Feaſts, Pleaſures, and Joyes, did inſeparably follow them: And though they were moſt aſſured of each others eſteem, yet they did ſtrive with all imaginable cares to preſerve it.

This, Madam, was the life which Phaon and Sapho lived, whilſt they were happy: yet as the Empire of Love is as ſubject unto great revolutions, as others are; ſo this calm and ſilken peace, which was in the heart of Sapho, was not perpetual, though it ſeemed as if it would be eternal. For moſt certain it is, that never Lover had a more perfect heart of expreſſing much love, than Phaon had, he never ſaw any in Metilene, but Sapho: And indeed it may almoſt be ſaid, that he did ſcarcely ſee thoſe who were friends unto his Miſtreſs, though he was continually with her, for his eyes and mind were ſo wholly fixed upon the admired Sapho as ſhe could not doubt, but that ſhe was the only ſoul of his thoughts, whereſoever he was. And ſince there is nothing more obliging, than to make a difference of a perſon in the midſt of a great company, he knew ſo well how to oblige Sapho this way, when any occaſion were offered, as I never in my life ſaw his like. Moreover, when he was with her, he ſeemed ſo happy, ſo contented, and ſo ſenſible of the leaſt of her favours, as ſhe having abſolutely the moſt tender ſoul in the world, did think there was nothing deſirable which was not in her Lover: She was infinitely charmed with the delicacy of his wit: he had ſometimes a certain kind of ſweet and melancholly blithneſs, (if I may ſo call it) which furniſhed him with ſuch diverting conceits, as that they cannot be repeated without derogation.

Moreover, being naturally curious and inquiſitive, they had always ſome amorous wrangle or other which made their diſcourſe more ſweet: For ſometimes Phaon would needs know why ſhe bluſhed, ſometimes why ſhe muſed; and his exceſſive curioſity went ſo far that one day, there hapned a tender amorous diſpute between them, becauſe Phaon asked Sapho, why ſhe was more ſweet unto him that day than any other? afflicting himſelf as much, becauſe ſhe would not tell him, as if ſhe had treated him ill. But, Sir, (ſaid ſhe, having no mind to ſatisfie his obſtinate curioſity) ſometimes you ask me ſuch trivial queſtions, with ſo much good earneſtneſs, that I muſt needs ask you in my turn, what is the cauſe of this general curioſity, which cauſeth us ſo many petty quarrels? I ſhould not think ſtrange at your curioſity in things eſſential, and of concernment, but your humour is ſuch, that you are inquiſitive of every trifle: Yes, Madam, (ſaid he unto her) I am ſo, and ever ſhall be, of every thing that concerns you, and if I could, I would oblige you to give me an account of all your thoughts, and of all your looks, for, Madam, as you have given extream ſtraight limits unto my deſires, and as you have permitted me to aſpire no further, than the enjoyment and poſſeſſion of your heart: how can you think I ſhould be aſſured of it, if I did not know all the paſſages in it? and therefore think not ſtrange, I cannot endure you ſhould deny me what I ask; for by acquainting me ſometimes why you bluſh'd, why you ſtudied, and why you did not look upon me: you put me into poſſeſſion of that heart which you have promiſed me, and you joy me beyond my expreſſions: And indeed I ſet a greater value upon one of thoſe little hidden thoughts, which obligingly diſcover your heart unto me than ſome would of greater favours, who are not capable of all the nice delicacies of Love, therefore, Madam, I beſeech you deny no more, the ſatisfaction of my curioſity, though it ask only trifles of you, and trifles which ſeem unto you unreaſonable.

For indeed, Madam, (added he, and ſmiled) Love is a Child, which delights himſelf in toys, and has innocent phantaſmes, ſo that looking upon my too much curioſity, as an effect of the grandeur of my love, I hope you will comply with my weakneſs, and rather than afflict me by telling me nothing, you will tell me all I ſhall ask.

You may judg, Madam, after this, that the Love of Phaon was very tender, ingenuous, and gallant: and that loving one who knew the beſt in the world how to love, and who had a ſuperlative wit, you may imagin they enjoyed a thouſand delights, which thoſe of a dull and groſs capacity in matters of Love, are ignorant of: Yet ſometimes when Phaon conſidered that Sapho would not marry,

marry, and that ſhe was the moſt vertuous woman in the world, he would be ſomething penſive upon the matter: but ſhe knew ſo well how to diſſipate thoſe muddy miſts of melancholly, the cauſe of which ſhe quickly diſcovered, as he was forced to confeſs that he was the happieſt Lover alive.

In the mean time, as I told you before Nicanor being ſtill in love with Sapho, and Alces wanted but little of it, Jealouſie did ſo ſeize upon the heart of the fair Athys, and of Nicanor, that in the end it much moleſted the felicity of theſe moſt happy Lovers.

And the better to let you underſtand the cauſe of this alteration, I muſt acquaint you with a kind of a Feaſt which Sapho made at a houſe of hers ſome hundred furlongs from Metilene, and which without diſpute was the moſt pleaſant Seat in the Iſle: And indeed, all that was deſirable in a Country-houſe was there to be found; for it was cloſe by the Sea, and yet was full of the moſt rare freſh Springs and Fountains that ever were ſeen. Moreover, it had ſeveral lovely Groves, Meadows, Gardens, and Grotto's: The ſtructure alſo was very ſtately, ſo as every Summer Sapho went with Cynegire unto it, and all their friends came to viſit them.

We being all there in that delightful ſeaſon, which may be termed the youth of the year; and when the firſt greenneſs of the herbs and leaves renders the Country moſt pleaſing, Sapho with Cynegire invited all her dear friends, to paſs away a whole day with them. But though ſhe invited only friends, yet others alſo came: For Nicanor, Alces, Phaon, and I waited upon Amithone, Athys, Erinne, and Cydnon: And Chance ſo ordered it, that the very ſame day Philire with her two friends, and two Adorers of Sapho came thither in the Afternoon, not knowing that we were there, ſo as the company were very frolick that day.

I ſhall not relate unto you, Madam, the particulars of this Feaſt: only tell you, that though Sapho and her Couſin were dreſſed only in white, decked with flowers, yet were they ſo gallant, that a prettier ſight could not be ſeen.

When we came to Sapho's houſe, ſhe met us with two of her Women in a little thick Grove, in the midſt of which is a moſt admirable Spring, running by the foot of a huge Tree, whoſe branches were ſo large and thick, that they did not only over-ſhadow the Fountain, but many Seats of Graſs alſo which were about it. Sapho meeting us in this place in ſuch a dreſs as I mentioned, ſhe received us with ſuch a gallant Air, and in ſo noble a Garb, that in my life I never ſaw her ſo lovely: For ſhe had the fragrancy of the whole Spring in her Face, her Eyes had the luſtre of the riſing Sun, when firſt it appears without a Cloud: and her joys which ſhe expreſſed at the ſight of us, did ſo viſibly glance it ſelf upon us by her lovely looks, as preſaged a very pleaſing paſſing away of that day: There was not one in all the Company upon whom ſhe beſtowed not a very obliging Complement, and who did not think that ſhe was ſweeter unto them than unto others.

But I, who always had an obſervant eye upon her, was not ſo much miſtaken as they were; for in the very midſt of this tumultuous joy which ſhe expreſſed at the ſight of us, I ſaw in her fair Eyes ſomething ſo ſingular towards Phaon, when ſhe made her Complement to him, that thoſe advantagious thoughts which her Heart harboured of him were very apparant unto my Eye. However, all this jolly Company deſiring to ſtay a while in that place, our Coaches went behind the Grove unto Sapho's Houſe, and we ſtayed to enjoy the delight of that pleaſing ſhade, the agreeable murmur of the Fountain, and pleaſant noiſe of the leaves which an eaſie gale of wind did whiſle.

The firſt Converſation was ſomething miſcellaneous, and paſſed from Object to Object: At the firſt, thoſe Ladies which came from Metilene, began to commend the Beauty of Sapho, and admired how ſhe kept her ſelf from being Sun-burnt: Conſidering that as long as ſhe was in in the Country, ſhe was perpetually abroad. Sapho on her ſide, ſhe gave them ſuch ſweet adulatory Language, as cuſtom hath introduced amongſt ſuch Ladies as know the World, and are both young and fair.

After ſhe had asked us all the News of Metilene, we in our turns asked her all the paſſages of her ſolitude; Cidnon chid her for not writing unto her, Erinne for not remembring her, Athys for going away without bidding her Adieu; and all of us together told her that ſhe affected ſolitude ſo much, and her abſence was ſuch an affliction to us, that we could not any longer endure it. To prove that what you ſay is true, (replied Sapho very ſweetly) you muſt acquaint me how you have ſpent your time this eight days ſince I came hither: For if you can make it appear that you do really regret my abſence, I believe I ſhall return with you: but to tell you truly, I am perſwaded that you were all full of Diverſions, notwithſtanding my abſence. For my part, (ſaid Nicanor) I went no whether but unto Pittacus, about buſineſs of much importance, concerning a Friend of mine, and the fair Athys knows very well, that though I am her near Neighbour, yet I never ſaw her: It is very true indeed, (replied ſhe) Nicanor hath been very ſolitary ſince your departure: And for my particular (added ſhe very craftily) I have not been ſo, for I have ſeen much Company, and walked abroad very often, but for all that I was extream weary of your abſence, and wiſhed for you a hundred and a hundred times: I am ſure Phaon, who was with me twice when I walked to take the Air, does know that I expreſſed as much, and that I chid him for being no ſadder than he was at your abſence.

I muſt confeſs (replied Phaon) that yeſterday you chid me, but it was unjuſtly: For thoſe joys which then appeared in my Eyes, were only cauſed becauſe I was to come hither this day. You have very cunningly recovered your ſelf out of that Net which the fair Athys unawares had like to have entangled you in, (replied Alces) but I know not whether you can ſo well get out of that which I ſhall put you into, when I ſhall tell you that the very next morning after Sapho departed, we made five or ſix viſits together, and you were not at all diſcontented. Sapho, replied ſhe, hath ſo well taught me to be civil, that I had rather viſit none, than ſay nothing to them: Yet Cydnon whom I ſaw ſome two or three days after, can tell you, that ſhe ſaw me very melancholy. 'Tis true, (replied Amythone) but I know not whether it was at the abſence of Sapho, for you were very merry the day before, and was at play, and loſt much. Since the fair Sapho knows very well, (replied he) that I have no covetous Soul, I do not fear ſhe will ſuſpect me for being more ſad for what I loſt at play, than for the loſs of her ſight.

However it be (ſaid ſhe, and both bluſht and ſmiled) I perceive that you had no time to be much diſcontented; for you have frequented walks, you have made viſits, you have been at play, and doubtleſs have kept your Court with Pittacus, therefore being your Friend, I muſt rejoyce you have ſpent your time ſo well, but I have little reaſon to thank you for thinking ſo little of me. Oh, Madam, (ſaid he unto her) condemn me not before you hear me: I ſhall hear you another time (replied ſhe) as for this day, let us, after your example, think upon nothing but jocundry.

Sapho ſpoke this with ſo free an Air, that Phaon was troubled at it: And indeed, though at the firſt ſhe thought that Phaon was not much troubled at her abſence, yet ſince ſhe received every day a Letter from him ſince ſhe came into the Country, ſhe conceived that he did it rather out of prudence than any defect of Love, ſo as this was no hinderance to her from being very merry all the reſt of the day.

But after this good Company had reſted themſelves a while, and after I had given Sapho an account of what I had done during her abſence, ſhe carried us through this pleaſant Grove unto a Garden Door which opened into a long walk, which led us unto the Porch of the Houſe where Cynegire received us. I ſhall not make any Relation of the Furniture in this Houſe, nor of the neatneſs of our Repaſt, or of the Aromatick ſmells, which preſumed the Rooms, for I will not inſiſt upon ſuch trivials: But give me leave to tell you, that an hour after we were riſen from the Table, and were removed into a very pleaſant withdrawing Room, next the dining Room, Phylire and her Company arrived: So as this encreaſe of good Company, augmented the joys of Sapho; and ſhe behaved her ſelf ſo nobly unto all in the Houſe, that Phaon being charmed at the ſight of her, and not being Maſter of his Paſſion, he expreſſed his admiration ſo openly, that Sapho made a ſign unto him, to ſhut up his wonder in his Heart, for he applauded her with ſuch aggravation, he approached her with ſuch earneſtneſs, and looked upon her with ſo much love, that indeed there was ſome cauſe to think (conſidering his joys in ſeeing her) that if he had been out of her ſight he would have run mad.

In the mean time, a little after Phylire was come, and had preſented all her Company unto Sapho; This moſt admirable Lady told them all that ſhe would ſhew them a place more pleaſant than that they were in. And indeed, Cynegire and ſhe carried us through a long cloſe walk in a Wood, which appeared ſo wild and ſo far from any habitation, as one would have thought it a Deſart: And at the end of the thickeſt part of this Wood, there was a great Grotto, which Nature had begun, and which Art and Sapho's ingenuity had finiſhed; And which indeed is one of the moſt delightful things in the World. For it was large, it was cool, it was deep, and yet it was light enough; The Rock had rarity of all colours, and that which was added unto it, was ſuch an excellent imitation of Nature, as one would think, Art had no hand in it.

Seats were contrived round about this Grott, and in ſuch a ruſtick manner as if chance only had been the Contriver, yet were they very eaſie and handſome, for by a ſingular artifice one is made believe that the Moſs which grows there, are Cuſhions: The little Purling Rivolet which runs through it, by its coolneſs, renders the place more delectable.

Beſides all this, there were ſeveral openings into a ſecond Grott inviſible to this other, through which Voco-ducts were placed, as one might eaſily hear what one ſaid unto another.

The place being thus pleaſant, Cynegire and Sapho conducted us thither, we were no ſooner ſet, but upon a ſudden den we heard a moſt admirable harmony, which came from the ſecond Grott into that in which we were, and which filled it with ſuch Seraphick Airs, as never was a more charming ſurpriſe. At firſt, we thought it was Sapho who appointed this diverſion, but ſhe was ſo aſtoniſhed alſo that we quickly perceived it was not ſhe.

In the mean time, all the Company looked upon Sapho, and ſhe looked upon all the Company, but to tell you truly, ſhe no ſooner looked upon Phaon, but ſhe knew it to be a piece of his Gallantry. He yet would not openly acknowledge it, but it paſſed for a piece of Enchantment all the day, and furniſhed the Converſation with a very pleaſant Subject. But Cynegire being moſt curious of all the Company, ſhe went out of that Grott with one of the Ladies which came with Phylire, intending to go into the other Grott, and know from the Mouths of the Muſitians, who ſent them, after which, ſhe walked in a ſolitary Alley not far off. In the mean time, this Gallantry of Phaon's, cauſed every one to extol it, and him both, though he ſaid ſtill, that he did not merit any ſuch applauſe, and that his Gallantry came ſhort of ſuch an entertainment. Phaon (ſaid my Siſter unto him) if we ſhould believe you, you were notably trapped; for thoſe who really have gallant Souls, do know they have ſuch, and take it ill any ſhould think they have not, and indeed they have reaſon to inſiſt upon ſuch qualities as makes them prized above others.

One muſt have gallant inclinations, (replied Alces and ſmiled) that can ſpeak as you do: One ought to have Rational inclinations as well as gallant (replied ſhe) for if Men do things no otherwiſe than as I intend, they will never pleaſe very well. For my part, (replied Amithone) I would very gladly know, in what, this kind of Gallantry conſiſts of which Cydnon ſpeaks: For my particular, (ſaid Phaon and interrupted her) I had much rather we ſhould talk of this than any thing elſe, for I muſt confeſs, I meet with ſo many ſcurvy Gallants in this World, who yet do make great progreſs in the hearts of ſome Ladies, that true, and really noble Gallants, make not ſo many conqueſts as they do. And therefore I would have us begin here a Deſcription of bad Gallantry, to the end, that at our return unto Metilene, we may infuſe our Maxims into the minds of all the Town.

Then it is alſo requiſite (replied Phylire) that you give Laws and Rules unto the noble kind of Gallantry: for it will ſignifie nothing if you ſhould only blame the one, and not teach us the other.

For my part, (replied Sapho) I am ſuch a profeſſed Enemy unto all bad Gallants, though I do love a gallant Air in all things, and ſhould be raviſhed with ſuch Converſation, if it were not in this place; but to tell you truly, (added ſhe and ſmiled) I would not have it ſaid in Metilene, that we aſſembled here, to make Laws for Love.

For my part, (replied Phaon) I will talk of nothing elſe this day. And for my particular (ſaid I) I believe I cannot ſpeak of any other ſubject. It is indeed ſo pleaſing, (replied Nicanor) that it would be difficult to change it into a better. It is alſo ſo neceſſary (ſaid Alces) that I know not what we ſhould talk of, if not of this.

We talked of all the News before Dinner, (replied Phaon) we commended the beauty of the place, and we have talked almoſt of every thing, ſo as we ſhall have nothing to do (ſaid Phaon unto Sapho) unleſs you will let us either commend you, or let us talk of Gallantry. Believe me, (replied ſhe) I had rather you ſhould talk of Gallantry than commend me. Then, Madam, replied Phaon, I beſeech you give us leave to talk of it all the day, for as my Soul is now diſpoſed, I think my ſelf almoſt as witty as you are when you are out of your good humour. If you be no more (replied ſhe) you would be leſs gallant than you are. But I beſeech you (ſaid the fair Athys unto Sapho) tell us how you came to be the moſt gallant perſon in the World. I do not intend to accuſe you of any Gallantry (continued ſhe craftily) when I ſay ſo, but to commend you becauſe you neither do, nor ſay any thing but with a gallant Air. Though I have not ſo much vanity as to believe this you ſay is applicative unto me, (replied Sapho) yet I do think, I know your meaning, and that there is a kind of gallantry without any love, which is ſometimes to be uſed in moſt ſerious matters : and which gives an excellent charm unto all that one does, or ſays.

In the mean time, this gallant Air, I mean, does not altogether conſiſt in much wit, much judgment, and much knowledge, but it is a thing ſo particular, and ſo difficult to be acquired when one hath it not, that one knows not how to learn it, or where to ſeek it. For I know a man whom all the Court knows, who is very handſome, hath wit enough, who is very magnificent in his attendance, in his houſe, and in his habit, who is able, and ſpeaks well, who hath done all that ever he can to get a gallant Air, and who is for all that, the leaſt gallant of all men living. But pray you (ſaid Amithone) what is this gallant Aire which is ſo pleaſing? It is I know not what (replied Sapho) which is compounded of a hundred ſeveral things: It is a work of Nature infuſed into the Perſons who have it; moreover, much commerce with the World and Court doth help, the Converſation of Women alſo, doth much contribute : And I dare maintain, that never any had an Air of gallantry, who ſhunned diſcourſe with perſons of my own Sex ; and if I durſt, I would ſay, that before a man can attain unto this gallant Air, he muſt once in his life have ſome ſmall inclination unto Love: But take heed (replied Amithone) that you do not engage your ſelf too far by ſpeaking as you do, for if it be neceſſary to have been in love before they can attain this Air of gallantry, it muſt follow by neceſſary inference, that a Lady, who hath this gallant Air, hath loved ſome or other. No, replied Sapho, for though I do maintain that a man muſt have his heart a little engaged before he can attain this Air, yet I maintain alſo, that for a Lady to acquire it, it is ſufficient if ſhe receive a favourable diſpoſition unto it, from Nature, that ſhe hath ſeen the World, that ſhe be acquainted with men of parts, and that ſhe have a deſign to pleaſe all in general, without loving any in particular. For all that, me-thinks (ſaid the fair Athys) that the word Gallant is too much abuſed : For I like it well that one ſhould ſay this is gallantly thought, or this is gallantly ſaid, and a thouſand ſuch like, whoſe wit bears a part in it; but it is not ſo to ſay, this habit is very gallant, or that man is very gallantly dreſt.

For my part (ſaid Phaon) I make no ſuch difficulty of it, for it is that gallant Air which Sapho hath in her mind, and in all her perſon, that makes the dreſs ſhe wears become her ſo well; and to prove the truth, one ſhall ſee ſome Ladies at a Ball, who are rarely dreſt, and who yet are but ugly in compariſon of that ſimple dreſs which hath its gallantry from the Perſon who wears it.

For my particular, (added Sapho) I think one may put a gallant Air upon all, and that any may keep it as long as they live; but to tell you truly, and to ſpeak in general, this kind of gallantry is the work of another, and muſt either be in love, or have a natural deſire to pleaſe before it can be gotten. Not but that, as I ſaid before, there are ſome perſons of great rank and quality, who cannot have it, for they want that Natural Mould, which puts I know not what kind of ſpirit, which pleaſeth, unto things leaſt capable, and infuſeth into the moſt common talk a ſecret charm which ſatisfieth and diverteth: There is I ſay, I know not what kind of gallant ſpirit infuſed into the perſon which poſſeſſeth it, both in his Wit, in his Speech, his in Action, and in his Habit: This is it which doth accompliſh men, which renders them amiable, and which makes them loved.

Indeed, there is a kind of Byas or faculty in telling of things, which ſets a value upon them, and thoſe who have this faculty, may oftentimes ſpeak of that, which others dare not ſo much as think; but in my opinion, the gallant Air in converſation, conſiſts principally in ſpeaking of things in an eaſie and natural manner: To incline unto more ſweetneſs, and mirth, than unto the ſerious and ſharp, to ſpeak eaſily, and in apt terms without affectation, there muſt be alſo a kind of inſinuating and flattering of ſpirit, to ſubdue the minds of others, and if I could expreſs my meaning well, I would confeſs unto you, that one cannot be compleatly amiable without this gallant Air.

'Tis true, ſaid Alces, that it is difficult to pleaſe without out it; but yet it muſt be confeſſed, that thoſe unto whom it is abſolutely neceſſary, are thoſe who make profeſſion of gallantry.

It is moſt certain (replied Sapho) that a Lover without this air of gallantry, is a moſt pitiful thing. And the worſt is (continued ſhe) there are an infinite number of young men,who are but newly ſtept into the world, which believe all gallantry to conſiſt in the moſt fantaſtical mode, which ſome fond fooliſh Taylor invented, and in being bold and talking much; in going unto all houſes whoſe gates are open, having no buſineſs there but to talk of trifles, without either Gallantry, Paſſion, or Wit.

There are ſome (replied Cydnon) who think themſelves very gallant men, if they can but ſay, they have ſeen all the gallant Women in the Town, and brag, that I was yeſterday with ſuch a one, and the day before with that Lady; I preſented a third with a Serenade, I treated Sapho, and all her Company with a Banquet, I was with another troop of Ladies the day following, and ſo of the reſt.

Theſe ſort which you mention (replied Sapho) are not in number of good Gallants, for certainly they are very ſhallow witted, and full of folly; but I am much more afraid of thoſe eternal languiſhers, who are alwaies telling ſmooth tales, who are deeply in love with the Gray, the Black, the Brown Eyes, with equal fervency: Who think they are hugely diſhonoured, if they have been an hour with a woman, and not ſighed: For my part I cannot endure them, and I am confident, they ſay nothing unto her which they had not ſaid a thouſand times unto others, ſo as I am not able, either to hearken unto them, or to return an anſwer. I muſt confeſs, replied Phaon, theſe univerſal ſighers are a ſort of ſtrange men, but we do know ſome brisk and fiery Lovers, which are no more than they, and all the Company knows one, who is in love with a great Beauty, who ſwears all the Oaths under Heaven, that he loves her more than ever any did or can; that he will dye a hundred deaths to do her ſervice, that he will kill all thoſe who dare diſpleaſe her, and would take it for a great favour if ſhe will bid him go and kill any man for her ſervice.

This man is ſo brutiſh (replied Erinne) that he deſerves not to be ſpoken unto; but I would gladly know, what one ſhould think of certain merry Gallants, who never talk of Love but in railary, and yet are alwaies talking of it, who being neither Buſie-bodies nor Lovers, are continually walking from place to place, to vent their jocund gallantry, without any other deſign.

Theſe Grigs ſeldom ſtay long in a place, nor do they much trouble me when I meet with them, for ſome of them divert me; but thoſe who moſt anger me, are ſuch real Buſie bodies as have ten or twelve ſeveral intrigues and plots, without a dram of Love in any of them, who have a hundred ſeveral buſineſſes, and yet not one.

I aſſure you (replied Phylire) thoſe obſtinate Lovers who are alwaies melancholy, are never pleaſing to me nor themſelves; and I know one who is alwaies ſo ſadly ſober, that I think him jealous, or that he is thinking of killing his Rival, or poyſoning himſelf. Doubtleſs there are ſome ſuch gloomy Lovers, (replied Phaon) who are as diſpleaſing as you think them: But amiable Phylire, there may be ſome faithful Lovers as ſad, who yet are not ſo troubleſom. This is moſt conſtantly true (replied Cydnon) that there are very few men who are deeply in love, and very gallant, and who are leſs pleaſing unto others, than they are unto thoſe they love: And though love ſeems to be but a trifle, yet it is the rareſt thing in the world, to find a Lover who can trifle it handſomly. But yet (ſaid I, and addreſſed my ſpeech unto Sapho) it is not juſt to examine only the Gallants, but it is better to talk of gallantry in general, to the end that the gallantry of Ladies in particular, may alſo be talked of.

I aſſure you (replied Sapho) there are ſome who are groſs in their gallantry, and that it would be both a favour and an honour unto them, not to talk of it. Yet I muſt needs confeſs, that women are to be blamed for the ill gallantry of men; for if they did but know how to make uſe of thoſe priviledges, which belong unto their Sex, they would make men right Gallants, and would never ſuffer them to fail in their due reſpects: Indeed, they would never ſuffer a hundred uncivil familiarities, rities, which moſt new Gallants would bring into the world, for there is a great interval between a conſtrained ceremony and incivility; and if all gallant Ladies did but well underſtand the myſtery of behaving themſelves, their Gallants would be more reſpective, and more compla'ſant, and by conſequence more pleaſing. But the worſt is, thoſe women who have taken a crotchet of gallantry into their heads, do imagine, that unleſs they be indulgent unto their Gallants, they cannot keep them, and all thoſe I ſpeak of do neither care for their own reputation, nor for the advantage of their own gallantry, but only how to take off a Lover from this Lady, to attract this Gallant, to preſerve another, and to engage a thouſand if they could: There are ſome alſo (continued ſhe) which do worſe, and who keep a hundred private correſpondences in lieu of one.

'Tis true, (replied Amithone) I know ſome women whoſe gallantry is a very horrour unto any of any virtue, and behave themſelves ſo impudently, as it may truly be ſaid, that they make that their glory which ſhould be their ſhame; but I am ſure their Gallants themſelves do ſcorn them, and as they behave themſelves, they will never have any who will eſteem them, for men will not hazard their reputations for them. Yet we uſe to ſee many men (replied Erinne) who never care for the reputation of thoſe Ladies they love; ſince they care not for their own (replied Cydnon) I know not how they ſhould care for others. But I beſeech you (ſaid Nicanor) is it poſſible you ſhould find nothing to ſay of Gallants, and Gallantry, but what is ill? I aſſure you (replied Sapho) it is much eaſier to ſpeak ill than good of them, conſidering what a great number of men there are, which will be meddling with things they underſtand not; yet certain it is, that if Ladies in general, did but know how to manage it, it would be poſſible, to bring into the world ſuch a ſprightly, pleaſant, and innocent gallantry, as ſhould never be offenſive, neither unto prudence nor virtue. Indeed, if Ladies would not value their Lovers, but according to their merits, and not according to their flatteries and favours, the conqueſt of their hearts being more difficult, then men would be more complaiſant, more obſequious, more humble, and more reſpective than they are; women would be alſo leſs intereſted leſs cheated, leſs ſimple, and leſs diſhonoured than they are. So as every one being in their right Sphere, Miſtreſſes Miſtreſſes, and Servants Servants, delights would abound in the world, Politeneſs would floriſh, and true gallantry would be ſeen in its right colours, then ſhould we never as now we do, hear men talk of women in general with much ſcorn, nor ſhould we hear them brag publickly of their favours. Then we ſhould not ſee any women caſt off all modeſty and ſhame, though they be the charms of right gallantry; we ſhould never ſee Ladies quarrelling about a Lover,nor out of mercenary thoughts, ſell their hearts as if they were Diamonds: For indeed, if gallantry be at any time allowable it muſt be, when the gallant cannot be upbraided with any thing, but this, that they could not chooſe but love another better than themſelves.

As Sapho ſaid ſo,Cynegire, and the Lady who was walking with her, being returned, the diſcourſe was interrupted, and an humour of walking coming into the general fancy, all the company went out of the Grotto, and went to walk in a ſhady, long, and large Arbour, and the muſick following, the ſpirit of dancing came on them for an hour, which was performed moſt excellently.

In the mean time, though it was not likely that Phaon could find any opportunity of privacy with Sapho, at a time when ſhe had ſo many Complements to perform unto ſo many ſeveral perſons as did her the honour of this viſit, yet he met with an occaſion; for as every one had an occaſion to walk a little after their dancing, ſo he preſented his hand unto Sapho: And by this means, going more ſoftly than the reſt, they did inſenſibly ſeparate themſelves ſome eight or ten paces from all the Company, and talked unto her of his paſſion, and in ſuch vehement raptures, that Sapho, as difficult as it was to pleaſe her in matter of tenderneſs,was well ſatisfied with him that day. Indeed, he told her ſo directly all that ſhe thought he would tell her, and that in ſuch an obliging manner, that ſhe thought him worthy to ſhew him her joyes which ſhe had in his loving her, and yet ſhe chid him for being ſo pleaſant in her abſence: But he anſwered ſo well, that ſhe did not think his jocundry proceeded from his inclinations: And indeed he was ſo extreamly joyed at the ſight of her, as ſhe could not imagine but he would grieve for her abſence: But as ſweet as Phaons company was unto her, ſhe left it, and went unto the reſt of the company; who were ſo well pleaſed with the place, that they could not part from it until the evening after Supper. Sapho kept Cydnon with her, and the reſt promiſed to write unto her; ſo that after we were gone, theſe two Ladies talked a long time together. But on Sapho's ſide more ſadly, becauſe ſhe could not well brook the abſence of Phaon, yet was it ſo ſweet a kind of ſadneſs, as did not deject her, nor hinder her from making a moſt excellent diſcourſe unto my Siſter upon the tenderneſs of Love.

The truth is, my dear Cydnon (ſaid ſhe unto her) Love is a moſt phantaſtical paſſion: For though one doth wiſh nothing more zealouſly than the happineſs of the perſon they love, yet I ſhould at this time be extreamly ſorry if Phaon ſhould not as much grieve at his being out of my ſight, as I do for being out of his: And ſometimes I am ſo vexed when he is abſent from me, that I cannot tell what he does, and what he thinks, that it makes me almoſt as ſad as if I knew certainly that he never thought upon me at all, yet perhaps he entertains ſuch thoughts as would even raviſh me with joy if I could know them, and find in Phaon's heart ſuch as are in my own.

But Madam, whilſt Sapho was talking with my Siſter, all our company were returned unto Mytilene, and returned with ſuch a ſpirit of joy as I am not able to expreſs, except Nicanor, who was not able to frolick it like the reſt, becauſe he was out of hopes of Sapho's love. Perhaps, Madam, you will think I was miſtaken when I excepted only Nicanor, and that I ſhould have excepted Phaon: But Madam, I muſt acquaint you how he had ſuch a phancy as I think never any Lover beſides himſelf had: For Phaon, though he had a moſt tender and paſſionate ſoul, and did love with an inconceivable zeal, yet was his ſoul ſeldome ſenſible of any ſorrow; and abſence, as harſh as it is unto all other Lovers, ſeldom much troubled him, though he was as much joyed to be with her he loved, as one knows how to imagin: Indeed I have ſeen him ſometimes with Sapho in ſuch raptures of delight, as were very near an extaſie, and I have ſeen him abſent from her without any exceſſive ſorrow: Not but that he loved her both preſent and abſent, more than ever any was able to expreſs: but the reaſon was, becauſe his ſoul was more ſenſible of joy than ſorrow; and becauſe as ſoon as he had loſt his greateſt delight, he would ſeek out leſs to comfort himſelf.

Indeed his ſoul was ſo addicted to follow all that could pleaſe him, and to ſhun any thing that would make him melancholly, as he was ſometimes able to be abſent from her he loved moſt, without being very miſerable. Yet this did not hinder, but when he ſaw the perſon he loved again, he wou'd think himſelf as happy as if he had never been afflicted: ſuch joys would ſparkle in his eyes, and ſuch an unexpreſſible ſpirit would ſpread it ſelf over all his Countenance, as ſufficiently teſtified the ſatisfaction he had in ſeeing her whom he adored: ſo as one could not imagin that a man who could enjoy a happineſs with ſuch high delight, could part from it without abundance of ſorrow.

Sapho alſo is excuſable for being ſo long ignorant, that Phaon taſted only the ſweets of Love, without the bitters, for ſhe ſaw him ſo tranſported with joys when he was with her, that ſhe might eaſily imagin him full of ſadneſs when he was from her: For my part, I thought at firſt, that he did it only out of prudence, the better to hide his love unto Sapho, and that his frolick humour all the way as we returned to Metilene, was only to blind the company.

In the mean time, the jolly humour of Phaon encreaſed the ſullen humour of Nicanor, he thought that that mirth of his Rival proceeded from the obliging behaviour of Sapho, and therefore he could not hide his joys. As for Athys, her jealouſie begetting in her fancy a deſire to diſquiet Sapho, ſhe remembred the diſcourſe which Sapho and the company had concerning Sapho's diverſions during his abſence: ſo as negotiating the buſineſs with as much wit as malice, ſhe ſent two days after her return, a ſervant unto Sapho, with a Letter which I needs muſt acquaint you with, for if I be not much miſtaken, it was in theſe Terms.

ATHYS unto SAPHO.

Madam,

Since I cannot forget my promiſe of writing unto you all the news, I am deſirous to acquit my ſelf: But ſince Metilene affords little, I muſt acquaint you with our Journey, which was no leſs diverting in our return, than in our coming to you; for Phaon and Alces were in the blitheſt humours in the world: and except Nicanor who was very melancholly, all the reſt of the company thought the way very ſhort. Truth is, Phaon and Alces were ſo full of their Jollities, that I ſhould fill my Letter full of mirth, and ſwell it into a volume if I ſhould write them all: But ſince I think it not good to divert you too much in the Country, leſt it ſhould keep you too long from ſatisfying the wiſhes of your friends by your preſence, I will not mention them: Alſo I am forced to finiſh my Letter, becauſe I have promiſed to divert my ſelf in walking with Phaon and Alces, and they do ſtay for me: I ſaw ſo much blithneſs in their faces this morning at the Temple, that I have reaſon to believe they will be in a very pleaſant humour; but for my part, I aſſure you, I ſhall take delight in nothing more than in ſeeing you again.

ATHYS.

This, Madam, was the Letter of Athys, which doubtleſs contained in it all imaginable malice, for it hurt Phaon, it diſquieted Sapho, and it was prejudicial both unto Phaon and Alces, by the good office it did Nicanor. However, this Letter perhaps had not met with its intended ſucceſs, if Amithone, Erinne, Phylire, Alces, Nicanor, and Phaon, had not written, and mentioned ſuch things as confirmed what Athys had written; for Amithone, after many paſſages in their Caballa, mentioned that Phaon was more pleaſant than ever he was in his life: Erinne for her particular, to prove the tenderneſs of her affection, did ſend her word how ſhe could brag, that ſhe was the moſt melancholly of all the company who had been with her, except Nicanor: And Philire writ, that if the merry humour of Phaon had not been a comfort unto her in her abſence ſince her return, ſhe ſhould have been out of the world. Alces not ſaying directly that Phaon was either merry or ſad, only filled his Letter with many pleaſant conceits of Phaons: And as for Nicanor, his Letter was ſo melancholy, though yet a very pleaſant ſatyr of all our jocundry, that he confirmed what all the reſt had written. But the wonder of all was, that Phaon's own Letter was againſt himſelf: For though he ſhrouded his Joys under a pretence of Love, yet he found not his expected effect, as I ſhall tell you when you have heard Phaon's Letter, which was thus written.

PHAON unto the moſt charming SAPHO.

Madam,

Doubtleſs you have a moſt ſtrange power over me, and your words, when you pleaſe, have greater force in them than any inchantments: For your obliging expreſſions a little before I parted from you, did infuſe ſuch joys into my ſoul, that all the harſhneſs of abſence from you cannot hinder me from remembring them with extream delight: Judg how I ſhall be raviſht when you return hither.

Moreover, I hope you will take my joys as greater teſtimonies of my Love, than if I had been only a lump of ſorrows; for I conceive it better to receive favours with ſo great a ſenſibility of them as ſhall comfort in abſence, than to endure abſence with ſo much inquietude as makes favours forgotten: Nor can I well tell which is the greater argument of love, to be ſenſible of favours, or to be ſenſible of that misfortune which ſevers us. Yet I deſire with all my ſoul to hear from your own mouth, what I ought to believe, and that I may ſoon proteſt unto you upon my knees that I am the moſt devotedly yours.

PHAON.

This, Madam, was the Letter of Phaon; as for mine, it was the only one which did him neither good nor hurt, becauſe it did not ſo much as mention him: For ſince I thought him too merry for an abſent Lover, and ſince I was reſolved not to prejudice him, I choſe rather not to ſpeak of him at all, than to ſpeak in his diſadvantage. But whilſt theſe Letters were coming from Metilene, to the place where Sapho was, ſhe and Cydnon were talking together with all the freedom which the Country and friendſhip would allow: But they talked of things very far off any thoughts of Phaon; for indeed both of them ſitting by the Fountain which I talked of before, diſcourſed upon the bitterneſs of abſence, and the ſorrows which it cauſed in the Souls of all ſuch as are ſenſible of it. For my part (ſaid Cydnon) I am ſo ſenſible of it, that ſince your departure from Metilene, I have enjoyed no delights with any tranquility; for when I made any viſits, I was wiſhing you there: if I went any walk, I regretted your not being there; if I heard any good news, I was vexed that I could not impart it unto you: and indeed I neither did, nor ſaid, nor thought any thing wherein you had not ſome ſhare, and which did not make me melancholy in thoughts only of your abſence. Indeed (ſaid Sapho then) I am much obliged to you; for in my opinion, the moſt certain teſtimony of the tenderneſs in any affection is ſadneſs in abſence. But, Madam, as ſoon as ſhe had pronounced theſe words, that Servant who brought the Letter from Athys, arrived, and preſented it unto Sapho, who read it half aloud, to the end Cydnon might hear: But when ſhe read that part which intimated the pleaſant humour of Phaon, ſhe bluſhed, and her heart trembled. Yet recollecting her ſelf, ſhe appointed the Servant to ſtay for an anſwer, and did riſe up with intentions to write unto Athys: and ſhe was no ſooner riſen, but another Meſſenger from Phaon arrived, with all the other Letters except that of Nicanors, and as for his he ſent it another way. But, Madam, my Siſter ſince told me that never was the like diſorder, as in the heart of Sapho; for after ſhe had read that Letter from Athys, with ſuch reſentment as I told you, ſhe read that of Amithone's with more agitation of ſoul: that of Erinne's with more wonder: that from Phylire with more vexation; that from Alces, with more penſiveneſs; that from Nicanor with more ſhame, and that from Phaon with more ſorrow, though ſhe kept it the laſt, in hopes of greateſt delight. Imagin, I beſeech you, Madam what effects theſe Letters might work in the mind of a Lady who could not endure the abſence of Phaon without much ſorrow, and who had ſpent a whole day with my Siſter in diſcourſing upon the bitterneſs of abſence, and upon the ſorrows which a Lover endures when he is out of her ſight whom he loves. Cydnon told me that there appeared ſo much wonder in the Face of Sapho upon the reading of theſe Letters, as ſhe thought ſome ſtrange accident had hapned at Metilene; for Sapho had read the Letter of Athys only aloud unto her, but ſhe was not long ignorant of Sapho's wonder; for as ſoon as that fair One had read over all thoſe Letters, ſhe gave them unto my Siſter, and with a deep ſigh, See (ſaid ſhe unto her) how little Phaon reſembles you, and how friendſhip in you does more than love in him can do.

After this, Cydnon began to read theſe Letters, and was not ſo much aſtoniſhed at them as Sapho was; for ſhe obſerved always, that Phaon did divert himſelf at every thing, and was never ſad upon any occaſion. But ſince ſhe knew that I loved Phaon very well, ſhe would endeavour to excuſe him: And in order to that, ſhe told Sapho ſhe had no ſuch reaſon to trouble her ſelf ſo much at any thing which had been written: For truly (ſaid ſhe unto her) whatſoever Athys, Nicanor, and Alces writ ought to be ſuſpected; and you ought to read what Phaon writ, as a thing which he had never written, but becauſe it ſeemed unto him as acceptable unto you; alſo you ought to conſider that Amithone, Erinne, and Phylire writ without any inquietude, ſince it's probable that Phaon at his return, ſeeing how they obſerved him, did only out of his prudence ſeem more pleaſant than really he was: Ah Cydnon (replied Sapho) I thought to be as prudent as Phaon, and yet I was not able to be merry within an hour after his departure: all I was able to do, was not to appear very melancholly, and therefore I pray never offer to excuſe him, for I cannot: I know Phaon is an intimate Friend unto Democedes: but Cydnon methinks, ſhe ſhould more have thought upon me than him: Did I think him culpable (replied ſhe) doubtleſs I ſhould condemn him; why (replied ſhe) can you think it poſſible Phaon ſhould be ſo pleaſant as to make ſo many ſeveral People ſpeak of his jollity, but it muſt needs proceed from his want of Love? Ah Cydnon, it can be no otherwiſe: and I find him ſo little ſenſible of my abſence, that I could find in my Heart to baniſh him out of it: For my dear Cydnon, I am not able to endure, that whilſt I am grieving my ſelf for his abſence, he ſhould divert both himſelf and others with as much freedom of Spirit as if he had never ſeen me: For my part (ſaid Cydnon) I ſee him ſo full of joy when he ſees you, as I cannot believe but he is full of ſorrows when he ſees you not: Reaſon and Love doubtleſs would have it ſo (replied ſhe) yet all theſe ſix ſeveral perſons depoſe againſt him, and indeed he condemns himſelf by his own Letter.

Appearances may ſo deceive (ſaid Cydnon to her) as it would not be rational in you to be much troubled at a thing which you know only upon uncertainties. To know it better, my dear Cydnon, (replied ſhe) I will intreat you to return unto Metilene, I will borrow Cynegires Coach for you, and you may give it out that you are returned upon ſuch important buſineſs which called you thither: I in the intrim will ſtay here fifteen days in expectation to hear from you, whether Phaon continue his jollity as he begun: But my dear Cydnon, I conjure you to let me have every day from you a moſt faithful and true Relation of all his mirth, of his humours, and of his diverſions; for the very truth is, if he love me only when he ſees me, I will ſlight his love, and if I can I will quench my own. Cydnon then employed all her Rhetorick to appeaſe her, but ſhe thought it ſo ſtrange that Phaon ſhould be merry whilſt ſhe was ſad, as all my Siſters eloquence could not alter her mind, ſo as ſhe muſt do as ſhe would have her, and return to Metilene, upon promiſes of ſuch fidelity as ſhe durſt not fail her. In the mean time Sapho anſwered all thoſe Letters ſhe received, taking no notice of any diſcontent againſt Phaon's jollity: but not being able to hold out long, ſhe hinted theſe few lines unto Phaon.

SAPHO unto PHAON.

SIR,

I Make no queſtion, but joy may ſometimes be a ſign of a very tender affection : but I queſtion whether it be ſo as you intend it. When I ſhall come to Metilene, I ſhall ſee, whether yours be worthy of being valued as teſtimonies of that affection which you had rendred unto me.

SAPHO.

Though this Letter was ſomething ſhort and dry, yet Phaon never feared that Sapho was angry with him, but thought that ſhe had ſo many anſwers to write, that ſhe could not have time to write any longer unto him: ſo as never changing his way of living, he behaved himſelf after Cydnon's return as he did before, which was, in ſeeking all occaſions of cheering up himſelf in the abſence of Sapho. In the mean while ſhe ſent every day a Servant unto Metilene in ſecret, to know from Cydnon news of Phaon, ſo as ſhe received every day ſomething which afflicted her ; for Phaon was of ſuch an humour, that he could not deny himſelf any one pleaſure, as if the reaſon why he was ſo continually with Sapho whilſt he was in Metilene, had been only becauſe more delights were to be met withal there than in any other places. But this was no hinderance to him of taking up with meaner pleaſures, when he was out of her ſight whom he loved : So as Sapho having engaged my Siſter by Oath to ſend her word of all that Phaon did, ſhe underſtood that he haunted all the diverſions in Metilene, and that he ſeemed as if he had no diſcontents at his being there : ſo as her mind being extreamly incenſed againſt him, ſhe could nor find a heart to ſee him, before ſhe had let him know that ſhe was diſpleaſed : To that end ſhe ſent unto him the day before her return unto Metilene, an exact memorial of all his delights, which he had during her abſence, hinting unto him every particular days viſit which he made, the pleaſant Walks and all the diverſions which he took ; and in a word, all that he did ; and to this Diurnal ſhe joyned a Letter which was very near theſe words :

SAPHO

SIR,

Since it is not to be believed that the ſight of me will not add ſo much unto your Pleaſures as my abſence, I conceive that my return will perhaps be but a diſturbance unto your delights: You may perceive by this Diurnal which I ſend you, that I have a very exact account of all your diverſions: but the queſtion is, whether it be to puniſh or to recompence you. For to tell you truly, I believe we are not both of one opinion; and I am perſwaded that you are not ſo ſorry for diſpleaſing me, as you joyed in my abſence, and therefore you have no ſhare in the affection, or eſteem of

SAPHO.

Since Phaon was really moſt extreamly in love with Sapho, and knew that ſhe was to return the next day, he did reſent this Letter with much agitation of ſpirit, but hoped to make his peace at the firſt ſight of her. Yet to the end he might ſee her before ſhe came unto Mettlene, he came unto me, and after he had ſhewed me the Letter, he intreated me to go with him, and meet her at a very rugged uneven place, where all thoſe who come in Coaches muſt come out of them, ſo that Phaon and I ſtayed under ſome Willows, in that rugged place; as ſoon as we were alighted from our Horſes, and ſtayed in expectation of their coming, I began to chide Phaon for his humour: For (ſaid I unto him) how is it poſſible you ſhould be much in love with Sapho, and be ſo little ſenſible of ſorrow in her abſence? when you are with her, you are ſo raviſhed with joys, as perſwades me you would die if you were out of her ſight.

The truth is (ſaid he) one cannot have a more violent paſſion, than is in my Soul, and my hopes of ſeeing Sapho this day, does at this very hour ſo joy my heart, that could you but ſee into my ſoul, you would confeſs that I do love Sapho better than any loved; but yet I muſt needs confeſs, that ſetting my jealouſie aſide, there are few things can make me very ſad, I do profeſs (ſaid he) if I feared Sapho would not love, I think I ſhould run into deſperate madneſs, in what place ſoever I were; but when I have reaſon to hope I am loved, when I hear of her being well every day, and when I know ſhe will ſhortly return, I muſt ingeniouſly confeſs, that I cannot be penſive and melancholly without a cauſe: And my ſoul is ſo propence and inclinable to Court all delights, to ſhun all ſorrows, that I uſe all the beſt means I can to ſweeten the harſhneſs of abſence: But for all that, as ſoon as I ſee but Sapho again, you ſhall ſee me eternally with her, and ſee me the moſt amorous of all men living.

Ah Phaon (ſaid I unto him) to love as you do,is enough to make one believe you love your ſelf more than your Miſtreſs: But yet it is moſt certainly true, (replied he) there is none in the world would undertake more difficulties for Sapho's ſervice than I would, I would blindly obey her in any thing, I am more careful, more exact, and more ſubmiſs, than ever any was; I have a heart more tender, than ever any had: I delight in the leaſt of her favours, one ſavourable look ſwells me with joy. I have a million of tumultuous thoughts when I am with her, I eſteem her, I admire her, and I adore her with as much reverence as I do the Gods; and my joys are ſo full when I talk in particular with her, as never any Lover in poſſeſſion of his Miſtreſs, had a fuller reſentment of delight: And after this, I pray judg whether I be not in Love, and whether you have reaſon to accuſe me for want of it.

'Tis true, my ſoul doth naturally ſhun ſorrows, and affects pleaſures, but what does it concern the perſon loved, whether her Lover be ſad or merry, ſo he never fail in any real duties of a faithful Lover.

As he ſaid ſo, we ſaw the Coach of Cynegire appear a far off, ſo as Phaon and I took Horſe, and in a rapture of Paſſion, went as faſt as ever he could to meet Sapho, and he was ſo extreamly earneſt,as that it could not be queſtioned but that he was moſt deſperately in Love: And if the fair Sapho had ſeen him, doubtleſs ſhe would have repented of what ſhe writ; and he accoſted her with ſo much joy, and love in his heart and eyes, that had ſhe not wholly truſted unto Cydnon, ſhe had doubted of her intelligence, and believed that Phaon had ſighed all the time of her abſence. But for all that, ſince ſhe could not doubt of what my Siſter had written, ſhe received Phaon but with a hollow and faint Civility, and had received him worſe if Cynegire had not been preſent: However after theſe firſt Complements were paſſed, the Coach went on until it came to the rugged place which I mentioned, where the Ladies muſt go on foot. I being Phaon's friend, I preſented my hand unto Cynegire, purpoſely that he might have the opportunity of talking with Sapho, for this rugged way was above two hundred Paces, before it was fit to take Coach again: and the Coach not being able to go ſo faſt as we, we reſted under ſome Willow-Trees, where I drew Cynegire apart, under pretence of talking with her concerning a great deſign which Pittacus was negotiating.

Thus Phaon had an opportunity of talking with Sapho, but ſhe intending to chide him; no ſooner ſaw him in that paſſionte poſture, but her heart began to relent, whether ſhe would or no; yet ſtriving to retain her anger, ſhe asked Phaon how he was able to quit his diverſions to meet her: but ſhe asked the queſtion with a bluſh, ſo as Phaon by her looks ſeeing ſhe would be appeaſed he was well ſatisfied: why, Madam, do you ask ſuch a queſtion (ſaid he unto her) and what cauſe have I given you to write to me as you did, ſince I harbored no joys but what you cauſed? for I beſeech you, Madam, (ſaid he unto her) how can you think a man who had hopes of your favour, can ever be ſad? Therefore, Madam, when I was abſent from you without ſorrows, it was upon no other reaſon, but becauſe I knew you had not baniſhed me your heart: And indeed, Madam, this thought was ſo ſweet, and filled my Soul ſo full of joys, that as long as I was happy in your love, I defied Fortune to make me miſerable: Yes, Madam, provided I may enjoy your affection, I can be contented to part with all my Eſtate, be an Exile, a Priſoner, and loaded with all manner of miſeries, and be merry. Therefore I beſeech you, Madam, I beſeech you blame your ſelf for thoſe innocent joys which you have cauſed. As for my part, I am perſwaded that it would argue want of love and reſpect, if my joys of being loved by the Divine Sapho, were not infinitely above any ſorrows that can be for her abſence Moreover, Madam, (ſaid he with a moſt tender and paſſionate Air) to judg how ſenſible I am when I am out of your ſight, I beſeech you conſider my ſenſibility when I ſee you: Look in my eyes, moſt charming Sapho, and ſee them tell you that I think you fairer than ever, and that I am more joyed at the ſight of you than ever any was, and am the moſt in love with you of all men living; but if they do tell you that I love you more than ever any other heart was capable of, then I beſeech you never trouble your ſelf with enduring what I do when I am out of your ſight: but conſider only, that never any Lover did proſtrate himſelf at your feet with a Paſſion more violent and tender than mine is; for I beſeech you what matter is it how I do teſtifie my love when you are not in preſence, ſo you do ſtill find in me the ſame zeal, and the ſame paſſion. For my part, I wiſhed you all manner of diverſions in the Country, and I hoped that the jocund humor of Cydnon would keep you from thinking your Solitude tedious. Oh Phaon (cried Sapho) out) you know not how to love, if you can deſire that your abſence ſhould not trouble me: and for my part, I do declare unto you that I ſhall never be pleaſed at you, if you be not the moſt melancholy man living, when you are abſent from me. Then, Madam, (ſaid he unto her) I muſt forget that you do love me, for if I do not, I cannot poſſibly be miſerable: No, (replied Sapho) but on the contrary, it is the memory of that which I conceive ſhould make you the more miſerable; at leaſt I am ſure that the melancholy which your abſence cauſeth in me, is, becauſe I am abſent from a perſon whom I thought loved me: Oh, Madam, replied Phaon, your opinion and mine ought to be very diſferent in this, for it is not poſſible that you ſhould rejoice for being adored by me ſo much as I ſhould for being loved by you, ſo as it is no wonder if the memory of my paſſion do not comfort you in my abſence, nor is it ſtrange that the memory of your goodneſs to me, do leſſen thoſe ſorrows which your abſence cauſeth; for, Madam, I muſt ſay again, I cannot be melancholy as long as I am ſure you love me. Queſtionleſs there is much wit in your Language (replied Sapho) but not much love; and if your eyes did not help out your words, I ſhould think you do not love me; for to be abſent from her one loves, and not melancholy, is one of the greateſt ſigns of lukewarm indifferency that can be. Oh, Madam, (ſaid he unto her) How can you think I do not love you ? could you ever ſuſpect either any of my actions or my words ? All I ſee of you (anſwered ſhe) does doubtleſs ſpeak your paſſion,but all I ſee not, ſpeaks your indifferency ; for in my abſence you can make many Viſits with delight, you can walk abroad in company, you can be frolick and pleaſant,and not the leaſt wrinkle of melancholy appear in your countenance : and yet that which makes me moſt wonder, you can have delicate and tender thoughts, and expreſs your ſelf ſo paſſionately as if you grieved for being abſent: And yet I cannot conceive how one can poſſeſs a thing with any joy which he can part with without any ſorrow : And ſometimes I think that you are not at all joyed at my preſence,ſince my abſence never makes you melancholy. Oh, Madam, (ſaid he unto her in ſuch a paſſionate manner as made her bluſh) I dare defie you in this, do your worſt, and you cannot chooſe but believe,that when I am in your preſence, I am the moſt deep in love with you of any living : Yes,yes,Divine Sapho,though you have been told that I haunted Balls every day during your abſence, that I entertained all the Beauties in Metilene ; and though you have been told perhaps that I am inconſtant, yet I am moſt confident that when you look into my eyes, you will ſee my heart loves you beyond the expreſſion of any tongue ; and indeed never any Lover had more reaſon to love than I : For firſt, you are without exception the faireſt in the world,I have a more propenſe inclination to love you than ever any had ; I eſteem you beyond all admiration,and I do love you the more, becauſe both my inclination and my reaſon adviſeth me unto it, and alſo becauſe my gratitude exacts it from me : Nay, as for this laſt reaſon of your love (replied Sapho) I would never have it mentioned ; why, Madam, (replied Phaon) would you not have me grateful and acknowledg your goodneſs, and all your favours ? I would have every one grateful(replied ſhe) but I would not have gratitude the only cauſe of of affection,and if one ſhould love me only becauſe I love him, he would do me a moſt ſenſible injury : For indeed I would have one love me for ſo many other reaſons, that though he were naturally ungrateful, yet he might moſt zealouſly love me : And therefore never rank your gratitude amongſt the cauſes of yo [illegible] if you would perſwade me that you love me as I would be, for that is neither civil nor gallant, nor paſſionate. Gratitude indeed may beget amity but never Love: I would willingly you ſhould tell me, that it faſtens the knot which ties you, but as I told you before, I would not have you number it among the cauſes of your paſſion. for then, of conſequence my favours muſt precede your affection; and on the contrary, I hoped your affection had preceded my favours: And that if I aſcribed your Love unto any cauſe, it ſhould have been unto your own inclination, and my own merit; for my humour is ſuch, as I cannot endure one ſhould love me for any other cauſe. I remember (continued ſhe) that once I hated a very lovely woman, becauſe I diſcovered, that all her ſemblances of affection to me, did not proceed from any tenderneſs unto me, but only in hopes that happily I ſhould bring her name into ſome of my verſes, and deſcribe her Character.

Judge therefore, Phaon, whether I ſhould take it well you ſhould love me for any other reaſon, than becauſe you think me amiable, and becauſe you cannot chooſe but love me. When Sapho had ſaid this, and the Coach being over all the rugged way, their diſcourſe was forced to end as well as mine with Cynegire; with whom I held a long diſcourſe concerning the Politicks, purpoſely to give Phaon time enough to expreſs his love unto Sapho, and make his peace with her.

However, this fair One parted not from him without ſome teſtimonies of her anger, for as they were parting, ſhe asked him in what pleaſant Company he would paſs away the evening, as for us (added ſhe and pointed unto Cynegire) we ſhall ſee none this day? I ſhall paſs it away (replied he) only with Democedes, and talk only with him of my joyes for your return; you had done much better, replied ſhe, if you had talked with him before, of your ſorrows for my abſence. But afterwards, taking Coach, Phaon preſented his hand to help her, ſo reſpectively, and his eyes had ſuch amorous looks, as Sapho could not chooſe but repent of her accuſation, and indeed, the very truth is, it is impoſſible that any ſhould be [illegible] that [illegible]amly in love than Phaon, though he could not be very ſenſible of ſuch ſorrows as abſence cauſed; but on the contrary, did comfort himſelf with the pleaſure of one thing for the loſs of another: However, this chiding of Sapho's, made him paſs away that night in ſolitude, and indeed, he was ſo glad that he had made his peace with her as he needed no other delights. Not that ſhe did ſay, ſhe would pardon him, but they uſed to underſtand one another ſo well without ſpeaking, that looks betwixt them were as good as words. And though Sapho had chidden Phaon very much, yet he ſaw by her eyes, that he was ſtill in her heart as he was wont to be. And indeed, going betimes the next morning unto her, he concluded his peace, and they were an hour together with all the joyes which the reconciliation of fallen out Lovers ever cauſed. But at laſt their pleaſures was interrupted by Alces, who now loving Sapho no leſs than the fair Athys, was very diligent in waiting upon her. 'Tis true, his Miſtreſs came preſently after, but you may be ſure, it was Jealouſie more than Love which cauſed her viſit: And though ſhe knew Sapho did not love Alces, yet ſhe could not chooſe but be jealous. Nicanor alſo was none of the laſt in paying his devotions to Sapho: And Amithone, Erinne and Cydnon coming in alſo, the Aſſembly ſwelled into their uſual number. At the firſt, Athys, Amythone and Erinne began to talk of their Journey and their Return, which was no pleaſing ſtory unto Phaon. And they had harped much more upon that ſtring if Phylire had not come in, and brought with her a Stranger of a very handſom preſence whom ſhe preſented unto Sapho, and who was Brother unto that valiant Priſoner called Meriontes, whom the invincible Cyrus had ſaved from the flames in the wood, after he had vanquiſhed him. But Madam, this man ſeemed ſo unlike a ſtranger, that none queſtioned but that he was of ſome of the moſt civilized Towns in Greece, and did not ſuſpect him to be a Scythian, yet his complexion and hair did not ſuit with the mode of Greece, for both were very white, and he very fair; but that rule being not general, every one notwithſtanding thought him a Grecian, for he had not only the Air and Garb of a Greek, but alſo he ſpoke the Language very elegantly; his perſon was very pleaſing, his have ſeen him ſo ſenſible of jealouſie (replied Cydnon) that if you would give him any cauſe of it, I am confident you would have thoſe joyes you wiſh for. It is reſolved upon (replied Sapho) and I will from this day begin to treat Nicanor ſo well that ſince he cannot grieve when he ſees me not, I will perhaps make him grieve when he doth ſee me. And indeed, Madam, the fair Sapho took up this reſolution, and did put it in execution ſo handſomly, that Phaon grew extreamly jealous, and as ſad as ſhe could deſire him to be.

At the firſt, ſhe was much joyed, and all the complaints which he made unto her were ſo ſweet and pleaſing, that ſhe could not ſo ſoon cauſe them to ceaſe.

In the mean time, Nicanor could not tell from whence this his good fortune did proceed, and Alces did ſo wonder to ſee Sapho change for the worſe, that he did abſolutely return'd unto the fair Athys.

However, Phaon, whom the pangs of jealouſie tormented, knew not how this alteration in Sapho ſhould come to paſs, yet I told him, that his humour was the cauſe, but he would not believe me; and he began to hate Nicanor ſo horridly, that he could not endure him. Thus was this poor Lover, both hated by his Rival, and not loved by his Miſtreſs: And his miſery was the more, becauſe having a piercing wit, he perceived, that indeed Sapho did not love him, but ſtill loved Phaon, ſo as then looking upon her favours, as an artifice to augment the love of his Rival, he grew more angry with Sapho than with Phaon, and this miſcellany of reſentments produced ſuch pleaſant effects in the hearts of theſe three perſons, as the like was never known. But at laſt theſe two incenſed Lovers, not being able to hold out any longer, they quarreled and fought, none knowing who got the advantage, becauſe they were parted before their combat ended: But Pittacus being a wiſe Prince, and much grieved at the news of Tyſander's death, he was ſo angred at this quarrel, that he baniſhed them both for a year, to prevent any dangerous conſequences: So as Phaon having dwelt more in Sicily, than in any other place, he reſolved to ſpend the time of his exile there, and Nicanor intended for Phrygia: But Phaon was ſo earneſt with me to negotiate ſo for him, as Cydnon might help him to the ſight of Sapho in private, before he departed, that I did what I could to ſatisfie him. Nor did I find much difficulty to effect it, for as Sapho's violent paſſion cauſed her to repent of making Phaon jealous, and ſhe had as great a deſire to pardon him, as he had to be pardoned; for knowing his humour, ſhe thought that nothing could be more dangerous for her than abſence. But at laſt, having intreated Cydnon to mediate with Sapho, and having obliged her to diſcover unto me, that her friend had never favoured Nicanor, but only to make Phaon jealous, I told this welcom and important ſecret unto my friend, who at firſt would not believe it, but as it is impoſſible to be long unperſwaded of a thing which one wiſheth, he thought that ſuch a thing might be, and he reſolved to clear the doubt by looking in the fair eyes of Sapho.

But at laſt their meeting being to be at Cydnon's houſe, their amity was renewed in the moſt tender manner in the world.

Well Madam (ſaid Phaon unto her at firſt meeting) after you have made me the moſt jealous, and moſt miſerable man alive, do you now think me the moſt amorous of all your Lovers? And though my joyes in being loved by you could not perſwade you, yet will my ſorrows in being forſaken, work with you? Had you been forſaken (replied ſhe) you ſhould never have had opportunities to make your complaints unto me, for I would never have ſeen you: But Phaon, if you have ſuffered any torments thank your ſelf, ſince if you had known how to love, I ſhould never have taught you by any ſo vexatious a courſe as jealouſie.

Truly Madam (ſaid he unto her) your invention was moſt cruel. But I beſeech you tell me, Did you never love Nicanor? And did you ſtill love me? Let me tell you only half of what you ask (anſwered ſhe and bluſht) and gueſs your ſelf at the reſt.

After this, Madam, theſe two incenſed Perſons being inſenſibly pacified, they expreſſed themſelves unto each other, in as paſſionate and tender terms that Love could invent: yet Sapho's joys were not compleat, for the thought of this long and cruel abſence did ſo diſquiet her, that ſhe did not fully enjoy the ſweets of this pacification. (For ſaid ſhe unto Phaon) what can I expect from you and your humour? you I ſay, who are never moved but with what you ſee, and not at all with what you ſee not, for though it were poſſible you ſhould continue faithful during this long abſence, yet it is impoſſible you ſhould ſuffer as much as I do: and ſince you are capable of joys and delights, within two days after you have left me, what will you do when you have been whole Months out of my ſight, have I not reaſon to fear the loſing of you, for in a long abſence, I know nothing but ſorrow which can be a faithful guard over the heart of a Lover. Indeed love is ſo accuſtomed to grow amongſt pleaſures as it may well be ſaid that joy is the firſt neceſſary diſpoſition unto its growth. And ſince queſtionleſs your mind will be all upon delights as ſoon as ever you are out of my ſight; I have reaſon to believe that ſome new Love will take poſſeſſion of your heart, and drive mine out.

Since, Madam, I never loved any comparably ſo much as you, (replied Phaon) becauſe I never found any comparably ſo amiable as to merit my affection, I muſt ingeniouſly confeſs that I never had any great Commerce with Love, until I ſaw you. The truth is, I have a hundred times perceived a paſſion begin to fluſh a little and extinguiſh again in the very preſence of her I thought to to have loved, and indeed I have ſome days been ſo unlike my ſelf from my firſt entrance into company until I went out again, that I knew not my ſelf. I muſt confeſs I had ſome deſires which begun both to live and die, in one and the ſame day, not knowing well why I had them, nor why I had them no longer.

But as for you, Madam, your power has a greater influence upon me, I love you after another manner, and when I do apprehend the bitterneſs of this horrid abſence, I begin to prepare my ſelf for infinite miſeries, for this bitter abſence is unlike all the reſt; indeed when you were in the Country, I always expected your return ſo ſhortly, that it was no wonder, if my hopes of ſoon ſeeing you ſhould diminiſh my ſorrows, and that my belief of your loving me, was ſo joyful unto me, as to keep me from grieving: But alas, Madam, a whole year looks like a little eternity to me, and I ſhall go away in fear, that you are not fully perſwaded of the greatneſs of my Love.

But, Madam, I beſeech you judg me not by what is paſt, ſince certainly I never loved you, ſo much as I now do. Yes, Divine Sapho, I do love you more than ever, and more than ever I ſhall any other, and more than ever I can hope to be loved, I believe it, (ſaid ſhe, and interrupted him) but for all that, in all appearances you do love me leſs, than you thought you did after you had been fifteen days out of my ſight.

After this, returning a very plauſible anſwer, he made a million of proteſtations of fidelity unto the fair Sapho, and in ſuch a paſſionate manner, as ſhe was perſwaded that the heart of Phaon was changed, and that he would reſent this long abſence with abundance of ſorrow; ſo as both of them uſed the moſt delicate and paſſionate expreſſions, that Love could poſſibly infuſe into the hearts and tongues of two perſons deeply in Love, and ready to depart from each other: Thus Sapho and Phaon parted, infinitely ſatisfied and reconciled: Phaon imbarked the next morning; and Sapho went in the Country, carrying my Siſter with her; but ſhe went not thither ſo much to enjoy the ſweets of Solitude, as to hide the ſorrows of her ſoul, and to avoid bidding adieu unto Nicanor, who knew too well, that all the ſavour he received, belonged not unto him. But, Madam, ſince Phaons departure, Sapho was all melancholly: 'Tis true, at her return unto Metilene ſhe contracted a very great league of friendſhip with Clyrantes, who was ſo extreamly in love with Phylire, as none could be more.

In the mean time, the Company at Sapho's was nothing ſo pleaſant as heretofore, becauſe ſhe was grown ſo very melancholly that ſhe ſhunned as much as handſomeneſs would permit her all occaſions of delight, ſo all the good Company broke up: For Alces at laſt married Athys, who ſince her Marriage did not frequent Sapho's.

Erinne, ſhe fell ſick of a languiſhing diſeaſe: my Siſter went into Phrygia with my Mother, who was of that Country, and Amithone went into the Country, ſo as I was the only one left, unto whom Sapho could talk with any confidence: And yet ſhe had one dear friend whom I did not mention at the beginning of my relation,becauſe ſhe was abſent from Metilene during all the time of this long love: but ſince ſhe returned the ſame day my Siſter departed, it may well be ſaid ſhe took her place: And certainly ſhe was worthy of Sapho's friendſhip, though her fortunes were not ſo high as the reſt of her friends.

Indeed this Lady,who was called Agelaſte, by reaſon of her melancholy temper, had moſt rare qualities; her perſon did pleaſe much more than ſome could who were fairer than ſhe: She was not tall, but handſome, her hair was brown,her eyes gray and ſweet,her face a little long, her noſe ſomething high, her mouth pretty, her complexion well, but a little pale; her teeth white, her neck admirable, her hands and arms fair, and her Phyſiognomy ſo wiſe and modeſt, that every one had a good opinion of her at the very firſt ſight.

Agelaſte alſo played upon the Lute moſt admirably: But I always moſt eſteemed her for her wit, her diſcretion, her goodneſs, and her fidelity were ſo great, that one might truſt her with any thing in the world: Moreover, though ſhe was naturally melancholly: Yet ſhe would be very pleaſant in company, eſpecially with her intimate friends, for unleſs with them ſhe ſpoke little: Agelaſte then, being as I have deſcribed her, ſhe was inſeparable from Sapho, ſince all the reſt of her friends had left her: And Phylire alſo did viſit her much oftner than ſhe did before: The truth is, Sapho ſtood in need of ſome comfort at that time, for you muſt know that Cynegire with whom ſhe lived, and to whom ſhe was much obliged, died; and a few days after ſhe heard that her Brother, of whom ſhe always heard bad news, was faln in love with a Slave called Rhodope, whom Æſop alſo had loved, and that the paſſion of Charaxes had been ſo extream, that after he had Enfranchized her, his love of her had quite ruined him.

Alſo Sapho underſtood that Rhodope, whoſe Beauty and Art had rendered her more famous in Ægypt than her her vertue had, ſhe ſent him back to Metilene in a moſt lamentable condition. Moreover, the death of Tyſander had ſo altered the Court of Pittacus, that people did not live in that City as formerly they did; yet Sapho was ſo happy as to find a ſatisfaction in her ſelf without ſeeking it in others.

In the mean time, the greateſt inquietude which ſhe had being Phaon's abſence: ſhe was forced (though ſhe did not affect to have any Confident) to let me talk unto her ſometimes, for I was the Conveyer of all the Letters between Phaon and her; yet it was not poſſible to have many Letters from him, which was no ſmall addition to her inquietudes: But, Madam, ſhe was much more reſtleſs and unquiet a little after, when ſhe receiving a Packet from Phaon, which I brought in all haſte unto her, ſhe found beſides her Lovers Letter a Note directed unto him, written with a womans hand; but ſo ſcurvily writ, that it was evident, ſhe who writ it was not guilty of over much wit. In the mean time, it appeared by it that Phaon had writ many Letters unto her, that he was much in her favour, and that he had given her ſeveral Serenades: And indeed, Madam, I underſtood afterwards, that though Phaon did love Sapho moſt paſſionately, yet he would ſometimes ſolace himſelf with that fair Fool whom he had formerly loved in Sicily. Not that there was any compariſon between thoſe thoughts which he had of Sapho, and this fair Sicilian; for his paſſion was moſt zealous and fervent to the firſt of theſe, and his engagements to the other might rather be called a muſing, than any real affection. However, he did divert himſelf as much as if he had not been abſent from that perſon whom he loved with moſt paſſionate tenderneſs. But to return unto Sapho, you may imagin, Madam, how ſhe was ſurprized to find in Phaon's Packet this Note directed unto her, and a Note ſtuffed with the moſt fond, ſimple Gallantry in the world: indeed I think that never ſuch a piece was ſeen, yet the Character was fair enough, but that ſerved only to render it ridiculous; for the Orthography was ſo bad, the ſenſe ſo ſhallow, the expreſſions ſo poor, and the order of words ſo confuſed, and oppoſite unto all rules of Eloquence and Reaſon, as it is a wonder how any woman of quality could poſſibly write after ſuch a rate. But the oddeſt thing was, that the Letter which Phaon writ unto Sapho was the moſt elegant, the moſt gallant and paſſionate piece that ever was ſeen: ſo as it was not credible, that any man who writ ſo well, could hold any particular correſpondency with a woman who writ ſo ill: Yet it appeared by this Note, that Phaon did often ſee her, and that he had given her ſeveral Serenades as I told you before: And I aſſure you Sapho was ſo ſadly aſtoniſhed at this cruel adventure, that not being able to hide her ſorrows, ſhe communicated them unto Agelaſte, and me.

Did ever any ſee ſuch unparalled weakneſs as this in your friend? (ſaid ſhe unto me) I know that when he ſees me, he loves me as much as he is capable of: I know alſo, that then he thinks himſelf unable to take delight in the company of any other perſon: and yet it appears by this Paper, that he bears ſome kind of affection unto the verieſt fool in the world, and that he mingles her Letters and mine indifferently together, though I think mine have ſome order of ſence in them, and thoſe of his new Miſtreſs none. Since I knew the humour of Phaon better than Sapho did, I did my friend the beſt office I could, and endeavoured to perſwade this admirable Woman, that the heart of this Lover had no ſhare in any of theſe pleaſures which he took during his abſence, and that Phaon lived as he did, rather to look upon theſe trifles, than to divert himſelf in them.

Ah Democedes (ſaid ſhe unto me) a grieved Lover cannot find a heart to look upon ſuch trifles: And if Phaon loved me as he ſhould do, the moſt pleaſing Serenades would never divert him: he would be ſo indiſpoſed to give them unto others as he doth, that he would ſhun the place where others give them: And therefore I am reſolved to love him no longer, but will hate my ſelf, if I cannot hate him. It was in vain for me to proteſt unto Sapho that Phaon's love did not change, and that it was only an effect of his humour, wherein his heart had no ſhare, but ſhe would not believe it: ſo as in the rapture of her ſorrows, ſhe anſwered Phaon in a very ſingular manner, for ſhe ſent him back the Note which he had unawares ſent unto her, and writ only theſe words.

SAPHO unto PHAON.

SIR,

Since you have contracted amity with a Lady, whoſe Letter I have ſent you back, I reſolve to break off ours; for I think it an unworthy thing in me, to let a man have any ſhare any longer in my heart, who hath withdrawn his own from me to give it unto another, ſo much unworthy of himſelf.

SAPHO.

This Letter doubtleſs was enough to enforce ſorrow into the ſoul of Phaon: but to tell you truly, I writ him another which grieved him to the very heart of his ſoul; for I chid him ſo home for his levity, and did ſo terrifie him with his likelihood of loſing Sapho's affection, that as ſoon as he had read her Letter and mine, he became a Convert: when he conſidered that Sapho perhaps would withdraw her heart from him, he eaſily reſolved to quit the leſſer delights to preſerve the greater: ſo as knowing no better way to reconcile himſelf unto Sapho, then by quitting Sicily, and coming to her, he reſolved to come diſguiſed unto Lesbos, and accordingly he came in a Merchants Ship: And landing at a Port in a corner of our Iſle, he concealed himſelf with a Friend, who had a Houſe very near unto that of Sapho's in the Country. He was no ſooner there, but enquiring where ſhe, and I was, but he underſtood that I was gone a journey of fifteen days, and that Sapho was at her own houſe without any other company than her dear Agelaſte: ſo as loſing no time, and knowing her uſual hours of walking unto that Fountain, which formerly I mentioned, he went and hid himſelf in a little thicket of Trees which grew about it, leaving his Horſe ſome fifty paces off with a Lacquey; he had not waited there a quarter of an hour but he ſaw Sapho and her friend appear; and ſaw her ſo ſad, that as inſenſible as he was of ſorrow, his heart was ſoftened: 'Tis true, the thought of being ſo tenderly loved by the moſt excellent Woman in the world, did make him more joyed at it, than Sapho's ſadneſs made them melancholly. However, he would give her time to ſit down before he would ſhew himſelf, to the end he might a little digeſt thoſe ſorrows which this ſight cauſed in him. But as it chanced, theſe two Ladies did ſit down upon a ſeat of Graſs with their Backs towards Phaon, ſo as he could eaſily hear what they ſaid; for the Grove was very thick in that place, and he crept ſo gently, that they could neither hear nor ſee him. They were no ſooner ſet, but Sapho began to ſpeak.

But my dear Agelaſte (ſaid ſhe unto her) there is ſo little appearance in what you tell me, that I know not whether I ſhould believe it, and therefore I deſire to know all the particulars of this adventure. They are very eaſily known (replied ſhe): For yeſterday in the Afternoon I underſtood from the mouth of Phylire, that Clyrantes (whoſe quality is ſo great that he is near Couſin to the Queen of Sauromates) is ſo much in love with her as that he will marry her, if ſhe will follow his fortunes, and go into his Country. So as Phylire, who loves him no leſs than he her, and is freely at her own diſpoſition, ſhe is reſolved upon it, and ready to follow this Illuſtrious Sauromate. But ſince ſhe deſires the buſineſs may be done without any noiſe, ſhe imparted the ſecret unto me, and willed me to deſire that you would be pleaſed to let them be married in your houſe; which done, they would preſently after depart, and go into that Country, where there are ſuch ſevere Laws againſt unfaithful Lovers. I wiſh with all my heart (replied Sapho) that the inconſtant Phaon were there alſo, that he might be puniſhed for his levity. And Agelaſte (continued ſhe ſighing) ſince I know you have no great buſineſs at Mytelene, but all places in the world are alike unto you, why may not we two follow Phylire into the happy Country of Clyrantes? For I muſt confeſs I cannot endure living in Metilene.

But, Madam, (replied Agelaſte) as long as Phaon is in your heart, I would not adviſe you to go into a Country where he cannot be admitted: As long as I am not in Phaon's heart (replied Sapho) I ſhould be glad to be in any place where I may never ſee him: and therefore my dear Agelaſte, if you be able to follow my Fortune, we will both of us follow Phylire's: For truly there is nothing in Metilene which doth not diſpleaſe me: Charaxes is come to perſecute me, all the world wearies me, I ſhall never ſee Phaon there: Or if I do, I ſhall ſee him inconſtant, ſo as I ſhall think him unworthy of my affection. Oh, Madam, (cried he out, and came out of the place where he was hid, and kneeling down before her) Do not uſe the moſt faithful Lover alive ſo unjuſtly: and to teſtifie that I am ſuch a one, I beſeech you let me go with you into that happy Country where all unfaithful Lovers are ſo ſeverely puniſhed: For ſince I ſhall never be abſent from you there, I ſhall not fear the Laws which are made againſt ſuch as divert themſelves in the abſence of their Miſtreſſes: Is it poſſible, Phaon, (ſaid Sapho) that you ſhould be ſo impudent as to ſpeak thus after your laſt crime? Yes, Madam, (ſaid he unto her) the love of my ſoul unto you hath taught me ſo much impudence, that I dare beſeech you to do unto me as I do underſtand Phylire intends unto Clyrantes: For, Madam, it is as certain as that the Heavens are above us, that I am the moſt faithful Lover upon Earth: Carry me unto any place where I can never go from you, and you will find me the moſt conſtant Lover that ever lived: I can never confeſs that my weakneſſes did ever merit the name of inconſtant: For, Madam, I have adored you every minute of time ſince I firſt knew you: I muſt confeſs, that I have a ſoul which is addicted unto pleaſures, and which flies from any ſad thoughts: But for all that, ſince I had any apprehenſions of loving you, I have quitted all that you can imagin may ſteal away my heart, and upon my knees I beg the favour never to let me leave you again: I know that I cannot with ſafety appear in Metilene, and that I am to continue yet a long time baniſhed: But if it be ſo that you do love me, you will alſo baniſh your ſelf for the love of me: For the very truth is, Madam, I will never be abſent from you again; and I am ſo fully reſolved upon it, that though I were ſure Pittacus would arreſt me to morrow, yet would I not ſtir, for I had rather be his priſoner than not your Slave, Madam, and I would endure any torment in the world, rather than hazard the loſing you. Try, Madam, (ſaid he unto her) whether you are able to undertake a bold reſolution: I have left Sicily you ſee, as ſoon as I ſaw there was a neceſſity of juſtifying my ſelf in your opinion: Quit therefore Lesbos, Madam, without regret, to the end you may be as ſure of me; I will not limit you, Madam, unto any place upon earth, ſince there is none wherein I cannot find a happineſs, ſo I may ſee you, and ſo you be unto me as formerly you have been, and as I hope you will be ſtill, notwithſtanding all my imbecilities. But Phaon (ſaid Sapho then) is it poſſible you ſhould think what you ſpeak? and can I ever think that a man who is ſo familiar with ſuch a ſimple perſon as ſhe whoſe Letter I ſent you, can ever affect me who does nothing reſemble her? Tell me Phaon, did you love her? Did you ceaſe loving me? Do you love me yet? or do you now begin to have ſome affection to me? muſt I look upon that love which I ſee in your eyes as a faithful love? as a feigned love? or as a newly revived loved? Look upon it, Madam, (replied he) as a Love immortal which may ſometime hide it ſelf, but can never extinguiſh: And therefore for your own Tranquillity, Madam, and for my happineſs let us make our fortunes inſeparable.

After this, Sapho deſired him to make an ingenuous confeſſion of his laſt weakneſs, and to relate all his adventures in Sicily, which he did with ſo much ſincerity, that Sapho was ſatisfied. Yes, Madam, (ſaid he unto her) I will confeſs, that finding there a perſon whom I loved before I knew you; But, Madam, ſhe did afford me only imperfect joys, and my heart was never wholly engaged: I have alſo received from her ſome ſigns of tender affection; but I was, without any trouble, ever ready to quit them as ſoon as you called me back.

The truth is, Madam, I was a little weak, but not inconſtant: my eyes, 'tis true, did find that you were not the only fair one upon Earth; but my heart never found any whom it could truly love but only the moſt admirable rable Sapho. And to give you ſecurity againſt any future weakneſs, I beſeech you make choice of what deſart Iſle you pleaſe where we may live together: For my part, I profeſs that you are my All: and ſo I may ſee you, I deſire nothing elſe. Though I did nothing but hear you ſpeak, yet would my felicity be great: the charms of your wit, without being ſeconded by thoſe of your Beauty, are enough to render me moſt happy: All other perſons that ever I met withal are ſo ill praſtiſed in the Art of obliging, that their greateſt favours are but trifles in compariſon with the leaſt of yours

After this, Phaon uſed many more moſt tender and paſſionate expreſſions unto the admirable Sapho, who anſwered him a long time as if ſhe would not pardon him: but at laſt her anger cooling whether ſhe would or no, ſhe did not make him deſpair: but taking a medium between theſe two Extreams, ſhe permitted him to hope for a pardon, and promiſed to meet him the next morning in the ſame place.

But, Madam, why ſhould I hold you ſo long from the end of this adventure? Sapho ſpent the whole night with Agelaſte in conſidering what to reſolve upon; and upon ſerious debate ſhe concluded that ſhe could not live happily upon the Earth without the love of Phaon, and that ſhe could not aſſure her ſelf of his affection as long as he was from her: So that after ſhe had well conſidered how to order all her buſineſs concerning her eſtate, ſhe reſolved to put Phaon unto a great trial of his love by obliging him to follow her in her deſign of going with Phylire, and by obliging him to follow her upon certainties never to marry her: And haſte being requiſite in the buſineſs, becauſe Phylire was to be married within eight days, and to depart the morrow after the ſolemnization; Sapho acquainted Phaon the next day with her reſolutions: At the firſt he liked the Propoſition of going with her into the Country of the new Sauromates very well, but he found it a hard Chapter to promiſe he would never importune her unto Marriage: But at laſt, ſince ſhe gave him leave to love her, and promiſed to love him, he promiſed to do what ſhe pleaſed: ſo as after this, Sapho thought her ſelf the happieſt perſon in the world, and Phaon alſo thought himſelf the happieſt Lover upon earth, ſince Agelaſte had neither Father nor Mother living, but had loſt all which could render Lesbos delightful unto her, ſhe followed the fortune of Sapho, who left her own Country with as much joy as Phaon had, to be in her favour. And they both of them ſo ſatisfied each other by this reſolution, that they were moſt glad to be quit of it. I was not at Metilene when this paſſed: My Siſter was in Phrygia, and though we had been with Sapho, I believe ſhe would not have imparted her deſign unto us, leaſt we ſhould oppoſe it.

The greateſt motive unto her forwardneſs in this deſign was, that knowing there was but one City in all this little Dominion of the new Sauromates, Phaon could not be often from her, ſo as being ſatisfied with his love in her preſence, ſhe hoped that place would yield her much content, ſince he could not poſſibly be long abſent from her.

In the mean time, Agelaſte having acquainted Phylire and Clyrantes with the deſign of Sapho and Phaon, they were extreamly glad of it, for that Illuſtrious Sauromate, did know, that all thoſe Perſons would eaſily be admitted into his Country. Alſo conſidering the credit which he had with the Queen, he made no queſtion but all his good Company would be extreamly well entertained. Their great comfort in this journey was, that they had no thoughts to take for their ſubſiſtance. For Clyrantes firſt aſſured them, that his eſtate was ſufficient to maintain them all in full luſter, and beſides this, it was the cuſtom of the Country for the Prince to give ſuch eſtates unto ſuch ſtrangers as are received, as is fitting for their quality and merit, and all this Phylire's Brother did know of a certainty.

In the mean time, ſince Sapho did depart with intentions never to return again, ſhe diſpoſed of her eſtate as if ſhe were going to die, and left Letters which contained her Will, in the hands of an old Kinſwoman ſhe had with orders not to open them until a Month after: After which, the Marriage of Clyrantes and Phylire was ſecretly ſolemnized: And the next morning all this good Company Embarked, with intentions to paſs the Boſphorus of Thrace, and to enter into the Euxine Sea, afterwards to Land about the Mæotidian Lake. But they were no ſooner Embarked, then there did riſe a Tempeſt which changed their courſe, for after it had toſſed them from place to place, and from ſhore to ſhore, it caſt them upon Epirus, at the foot of a great Rock which is beaten upon by the Leucadian Sea, and upon which is built the Temple of Apollo: This Rock hath alſo another thing very obſervable, for it is ſaid that there and from thence, Deucalion, when he was in love in Theſſalia did throw himſelf into the Sea, and cooled his paſſion.

However, after all this good Company had rendred thanks unto the gods there adored, and after their Ship was repaired, they Embarked and ſteered their courſe very proſperouſly, as Meriontes told me. But, Madam, before I tell you any further what he related unto me, I muſt acquaint you with the wonder of all them in Metilene when Sapho's Couſin opened the Letters, in which ſhe had declared how her Eſtate ſhould be diſpoſed of: For when ſhe was gone, ſhe coloured her Journey with the accompliſhment of a Vow to Diana, who had a Temple ſome three days Journey from Lesbos.

But when they ſaw ſhe diſpoſed of her Eſtate as one who would never return again, they knew not what to think.

In the mean time, out of her generoſity, ſhe left almoſt all her Eſtate unto Charaxes, though they were at great difference; as for all thoſe things which were in her Cloſet, ſhe bequeathed them amongſt her friends, not mentioning her deſign, nor the place unto which ſhe was gone: So as every one thought and ſpoke according to their fancies. Since ſome reports went abroad, that ſhe was diſpleaſed with Phaon for falling in love in Sicily, and ſince they knew not that he was returned unto her, ſome believed that ſhe was gone unto him, others ſaid that ſhe caſt her ſelf away, and indeed this laſt belief was the moſt general, though not the moſt probable. For ſince it was known that Sapho was at her houſe in the Country, before ſhe imbarked; the Plebeans, who alwaies love wonders, and often believe them ſooner than probabilities, did ſay, that as ſhe was by the ſide of that pleaſant Fountain which I mentioned, a Nagade appeared unto her, who did bid her go unto Epirus, and that ſhe ſhould throw her ſelf into the Sea, in a place where Deucalion formerly had thrown himſelf, and that ſhe ſhould there be cured of her paſſion, as he was of his, adding afterwards, that Sapho did immediately obey the Nagade, that ſhe went unto Epirus, that ſhe did precipitate her ſelf, and that death in the end cured her paſſion. But the truth was, the more underſtanding ſort of people, did not credit any ſuch far fetcht unlike ſtories; for Sapho was known to be wiſer than ſo: Alſo after I was returned unto Metilene, I made ſuch exact inquiſition, that at laſt, this friend of Phaon's with whom he had concealed himſelf ſome certain daies, did diſcover unto me that Phaon had been with him, that he had ſeen Sapho very often, and that he was gone away with her, but ſince he knew no further, I was ſtill ignorant of my friends deſign: However, I was ſo far ſatisfied, that I knew Sapho was not dead, and that Phaon was happy in her favour, for I might well imagine, that they would never have gone together, unleſs they had been very well reconciled. But the paſſage moſt obſervable was, that though Phylire, her Brother, and Agelaſte were vaniſhed as well as Sapho, yet they were not ſo much as mentioned; for Sapho's adventure did ſo take up their ſpirits and minds, that they talked of none but her.

In the mean time, the poor Nycanor was a gainer by this accident; for when he heard that Sapho had drowned her ſelf, becauſe ſhe thought Phaon perfidious, he cured himſelf of his paſſion, thinking it not fit to love the memory of one whoſe love was ſo extream to another.

As for Damophile, ſhe was the only one who rejoyced at Sapho's ruine, becauſe then ſhe thought her ſelf the only wiſe woman in Metilene.

But Madam, after my Siſter was returned from Phrygia, we diſcovered that Clyrantes had married Phylire before they departed, ſo as remembring we heard from Clirantes an admirable deſcription of his Countrys Laws, we imagined, that it was thither unto which Sapho, Phaon, and Agelaſte were gone, and ſo confidently, as to ſatisfie my ſelf, I undertook this voyage with Leontidus, whom I met.

In the mean time, I may ſay that this journey did proſper neither well nor ill; for I underſtood by the valiant Meriontes, that Sapho and Phaon were received by the Sauromatian Queen, with more honours than ever were done unto any Strangers; that ſhe was lodged in the Queens own Pallace, that Phaon was lodged in Clyrantes his Houſe, that they were both of them the delights of that Court, that Phylire is there in high eſteem, and that Agelaſte hath gotten the hearts of all the Gallants. But that which is moſt conſiderable, Phaon is at this preſent, the moſt faithful Lover in the world, and Sapho the happieſt perſon upon Earth, for ſhe is adored by all the Court, it is ſhe who diſtributes all the favours which the Queen of Sauromates confers upon any; and ſhe ſees Phaon continue conſtant in moſt fervent and everlaſting affections. And yet they had a little quarrel ſince they came thither; for ſince there are Laws and Rules for Love, and ſince there are Judges who ſtudy nothing but what relates unto that paſſion, Phaon commenced a ſute againſt Sapho, becauſe ſhe would not permit him to hope ever to marry her: Sapho, ſhe put in her anſwer, and pleaded her own cauſe, as Phaon did his, and both did it moſt admirably well: But in concluſion, Sapho did make it ſo evidently appear, that the way to love eternally with equal flames was never to marry, that the Judges gave ſentence againſt Phaon, and condemned him not to urge her any more by way of ſuit; declaring, that it was a favour which he ought to expect from her ſelf, and that he ſhould eſteem himſelf the moſt happy Lover in the Earth, for being loved by the moſt excellent perſon in the world, and by a perſon who would not deny him the enjoyment of her ſelf, but only becauſe ſhe would alwaies enjoy his heart; ſo as after this, they lived in the ſweeteſt tranquility that is imaginable: But what is moſt cruel for me, is, that Meriontes told me, Sapho and Phaon were ſo afraid, leſt any ſhould come from Metilene to diſturb their happineſs, as they have obliged the Queen, ſtrictly to forbid the reception of any Strangers into that country for ten years, ſo as my journey is ſtopped. Thus whilſt Sapho is enjoying the good fortune which ſhe deſerves, ſhe is believed to be dead throughout all Greece, and will ever be ſo believed; for I underſtand that the Ship which carried them, did periſh in its return.

Thus whilſt this famous Lesbian is doubtleſs every day compoſing moſt gallant, and paſſionate fancies in verſe, all the illuſtrious wits of Greece, are writing Epitaphs unto her glory.

Democedes having ended, all the company was ſo full of wonder, that none were able to impoſe ſilence upon themſelves, and if the buſineſs of the invincible Cyrus had not urged his return, the applauds of Sapho had taken up all thoſe illuſtrious perſons a longer time. But as the fervent love of Phaon and Sapho did revive his love of Mandana in his heart, he haſted away, to ſee if Anacharſis had ſent any good news from Thomyris; therefore after many a complement unto the Queen of Pontus, and the Princeſs of Armenia, he bad them adieu, but to the great grief of thoſe Printeſſes, Tygranes, and Spitridates followed Cyrus, and had not time enough to ſhew the ſorrows which they had to leave them, yet Spitridates took an opportunity to draw Araminta aſide, and expreſſed ſo much affection unto her, that ſhe could not chooſe but ſhew ſome of her tenderneſs unto him. I perceive, Madam, (ſaid he unto her after many other things) that I never find you, but I preſently loſe you again; and I no ſooner begin my joyes at the ſeeing of you, but I muſt grieve for parting from you. But my comfort is (added he) we ſhall be ſo near, that I ſhall every day let you know my ſufferings, as I ſend you the victories of Cyrus.

Since there is no victory, but may coſt too dear (replied ſhe moſt obligingly) I ſhall never be at reſt: For truly Spitridates, we are both of us born under ſuch unhappy Planets, that doubtleſs our fears ought to be greater than our hopes: However, Madam, (ſaid Spitridates) I ſhall not loſe my hope of being loved by you, if the Gods be pleaſed I ſhould live after the victory of Cyrus, or elſe of being lamented, if they are reſolved that I ſhould periſh in the War, ſo death not forbidding my hope, you Madam, I hope, will give me leave to preſerve it: For I find it ſo ſweet to be aſſured I ſhall receive teſtimonies of your affection living or dead, that no thought can be more pleaſing unto me. And therefore, Madam, that theſe thoughts may never abandon me, do me the honour to tell me, that I have reaſon to entertain them: You may be ſo aſſured of them, Sir, anſwered ſhe, as you would do me an injury to ask me new aſſurances. Hope therefore Spitridates, as much as you can for happineſs (ſaid ſhe and bluſhed) and I will in your abſence both hope and wiſh the ſight of you again.

After this, Cyrus having done all his civilities, Spitridates muſt leave Araminta; and Tigranes muſt content himſelf to tell his fair Oneſile in two words, that his heart was full of ſorrow to part ſo ſoon.

Cyrus in his return to the Camp called Leontidas to him; with whom he thought that he had not talked enough concerning Thraſibulus, yet he talked not to him all of that Prince, for he asked him of his love, and asked him the meaning of that which he ſaid, when he aſſured him, that he had no mind to expoſe himſelf unto the moſt dangerous of all jealouſies: Sir, replied Leontidas, I can quickly give you ſatisfaction in that; for after I had been jealous of my friends, of my enemies, of my equals, of inferiours, of ſuperiours, I found that Alcidamia who had loſt her beauty, did recover it again, and I found her ſo favourable, that I ſaw I could marry her. But Sir, when I ſaw my ſelf in this condition, I perceived alſo, that I ſhould be ſtill jealous after I had married her, for ſeeking about for her reaſon why ſhe ſhould ſo ſuddenly change her thoughts of me, I found out that ſhe lodged very near one of her ancient Lovers. Alſo I was reſolved, that if I did marry her, to carry her into the Country the very next day. So as perceiving in my heart a diſpoſition to be a jealous Husband, as I had ever been a jealous Lover. I conceived that I ſhould have lived a moſt miſerable life, if I had married Alcidamia, therefore out my fears of hating her, and being hated my ſelf, I thought it better not to marry her; for I may ceaſe to be jealous in ceaſing to love, but when I am a Husband and jealous, then jealouſie will not ceaſe with the paſſion which cauſed it; but this thing called Honour which cauſeth ſo much jealouſie as well as love, cauſeth jealouſie to laſt till death, and would never let me live in quiet. For there is no reconciliation of Husbands and Wives, as there is between Lovers and Miſtreſſes, the one hath a thouſand ſweets in it, and the other nothing but quarrels and perſecutions. And therefore Sir, having had trial of all ſorts of jealouſies, and apprehending this kind to be the worſt of all, I am reſolved never to try it, but have broke off with Alcidamia, never to renew again.

If you had been as much in love as you were when you thought Policrates loved your Miſtreſs (replied Cyrus) you would not have been ſo foreſeeing, nor would you have refuſed the enjoyment of her: But certainly ſo many ſeveral ſorts of jealouſies have damped your paſſion, and being now more prudent than amorous, perhaps you know that Alcidamia will alwaies give you cauſes of jealouſie.

However it be Sir (added he) I am fully reſolved never to love any thing but glory; and knowing I could meet with it no where ſo ſoon as with you, I am come to dye in your ſervice, or at leaſt to fight for the liberty of the Princeſs Mandana.

Cyrus having returned a very civil anſwer unto Leontidus, he talked a little with Democedes concerning the moſt admirable Sapho, and ſo afterwards unto every one which followed, eſpecially unto Spitridates and Tygranes, whom he lodged next unto his own Tent: And to teſtifie his confidence in them, he ſhewed them the next morning the manner of his Encampment; and conferred with them of his deſign to aſſault the Enemy as ſoon as the Truce was ended: In order to that he obſerved unto them the ſcituation of the ground, and all the advantages which might be taken, every one giving his opinion and his reaſon for it. But ſince the opinion on of Spitridates did not concur with that of Cyrus, who thought it better to go unto the Enemy another way than that which Cyrus ſhewed him; he intended ſilently to go and obſerve the ſeveral Quarters neareſt hand, and the rather, becauſe the Truce did afford him the liberty.

On the other ſide, whilſt Anacharſis was negotiating in vain with Thomyris and Ariantes, Aripithes was extreamly angry, becauſe the Queen of the Maſſagettes did uſe him ſo ill, ſo as his fancy was full of violent reſolutions. And indeed, the Prince conceiving that if Cyrus were dead, then he might ſooner gain the heart of that Queen, he reſolved that either he or his Rival ſhould periſh. In order to this, he ſtole away in the night from the Camp of Thomyris, and went towards that of Cyrus, diſguiſed in the habit of a Perſian, the better to paſs un-obſerved amongſt the Troops of that Prince: For knowing his generoſity and courage, he was perſwaded, that as he had fought with the King of Aſſyria, and offered the like unto Ariantes, ſo he would not deny him the ſame honour: So as taking his way, he came about Sun-riſing upon a little hill which was between the two Camps, where Spitridates was alſo arrived, the better to obſerve the ſeveral grounds, which he thought moſt fit to ſeize upon to fight the Enemy with advantage, and to the end that afterwards he might the better perſwade Cyrus. In the mean time this Prince having none with him but one Squire, as Aripithes had, they met upon equal terms.

Spitridates ſeeing Aripithes in the habit of a Perſian, did not at firſt take him for an Enemy: But Aripithes being miſtaken by the reſemblance which Spitridates had to Cyrus; he no ſooner ſaw him, but ſuppoſing him to be his Rival, he was ſo tranſported with fury, that his eyes were not able to diſcern the little difference which was between thoſe two Princes. Indeed, he thought that Cyrus had ſomething more high and noble in his Air than Spitridates had, though Spitridates had as brave a preſence as any man in the world. The ſoul of Aripithes then being ſwelled with all the animoſity of a deſpiſed Lover, he drew his Sword, and advancing towards him whom he looked upon as the only Eclipſer of his glory and felicity: Though I never ſaw you ſince you bore the name of Artamenes (ſaid he unto him in the Aſſirian Language, which Spitridates underſtood) yet I can know you to be Cyrus, and will look upon you as one that ſhall be a Victim offered unto the love of Aripithes, who cannot be happy as long as you are living.

Were I indeed Cyrus (replied Spitridates, and went back a pace to draw his Sword) the event of the Combate would not be dubious, but your defeat would be infallible: Yet though I am not ſo valiant as he, yet perhaps I ſhall let you ſee that I ſhall eaſily overcome any enemy of his: Aripithes being all fury, did but confuſedly underſtand what Spitridates ſaid: But in lieu of anſwer, he fell upon that Prince, who received him with ſo much vigour, that Aripithes had not leiſure to undeceive himſelf of his error, that it was Cyrus whom he fought with.

Spitridates looking upon his Antagoniſt as an enemy of Cyrus, he fought with as much force as he had been his own peculiar Enemy, ſo as Aripithes found his valour too weak to vanquiſh ſuch an Enemy: Inſomuch as fury being the abſolute miſtreſs of his mind, he expoſed himſelf in ſuch a deſperate manner as it was eaſie to ſee, he was reſolved either to vanquiſh, or dye, and wiſhed for no more but either victory, or death: Yet he fought ſo valiantly, that he moved Spitridates to eſteem him, though he knew him not; for he ſaw, that if this fierce Enemy had managed all his advantages well, he had found him a hard task to overcome: Not but that the blows of Aripithes did hit, and pierced the arms of his Enemy in many places: But Fortune did enfeeble the arm of Aripithes, purpoſely to preſerve Spitridates, who had only one ſlight hurt in his left arm; whereas on the contrary, Spitridates could not touch Aripithes, but he ſanguin'd his arms, and wounded him in ſo many places, that he ſaw the victory was not like to be his; nor could he hope for any help from his Squire, for he was alſo vanquiſhed by him who belonged unto Spitridates.

Things being thus, Cyrus knowing that Spitridates was gone to view the places which raiſed their Conteſt; and deſiring to ſee them again, he arrived at the place where this Duel was fought: So as knowing Aripithes at firſt, and not doubting but that he was miſtaken in the reſemblance of Spitridates unto him, he went haſtily to them to let this Sauromate Prince ſee his errour, and to make him repent his aſſaulting a Prince who was not his Enemy. And adding words unto his Preſence, Aripithes knew him; and was ſo aſtoniſhed, that he recoiled ſome paces back to conſider upon the ſtrange adventure. After that he plainly ſaw his miſtake; had I ſeen the blood of my Enemy (ſaid he unto Spitridates) I ſhould not repent I had let it out, as I do of yours; nor ſhould I ever have complained of that which I have loſt, or of being vanquiſhed: I am ſo fully perſwaded, valiant Stranger (replied Spitridates modeſtly) that it was the name of Cyrus which vanquiſhed you, that I do not pretend unto the glory of our Combate, ſince it is rather the fortune of that Princeſs Arms which are invincible than my own valour which kept me from being vanquiſhed. No (ſaid Cyrus) ſince you have ſupplied my place, the valour of Aripithes found greater reſiſtance than he could have from me: But valiant Enemy (ſaid he and turned towards him) ſince you have a deſire I ſhould be yours, I am well contented to be ſo, though I am not your Rival. And to ſtay until you are in a condition to find the difference between the valour of Spitridates and mine, let me conduct you into one of my Tents, that you may be dreſſed with as much care as if you were the beſt of my friends: No, replied Aripithes fiercely, for generous Enemies ought not to receive any thing from each other but death: And becauſe I will not leſſen my hatred by receiving of benefits, I will refuſe your offer, and deſire no other favour from you, but to let me return unto the Camp of Thomyris.

Though I might very well treat you as a Spye (replied Cyrus) ſince you are found in a diſguiſed habit during the Treaty: Yet I will not, but will let you have a Coach to carry you where you pleaſe. Aripithes at firſt refuſed this laſt favour, but at laſt perceiving he was not able to ride, he was forced to accept of it: And Cyrus ſent immediately to ſeek a Coach and Chyrurgeons, and left one to help his Squire to hold him up, for he was not able to ſtand by himſelf. Spitridates at parting gave him a very civil Complement, unto which the other anſwered with a kind of ſurly civility. After which, this Prince followed Cyrus, to perſwade him unto his opinion concerning the ground which they had viewed.

In the mean time, ſince he had received a little hurt in his left Arm, Cyrus would ſee him dreſſed, though Spitridates would not have him: and ſince the Arms of that Prince were cut in ſeveral places, Cyrus ſent him thoſe rich Arms which he wore the firſt time when the forty Cavaliers conſpired to kill him, and ſince wore upon ſeveral great occaſions. Since they were very rich and magnificent, the Preſent was worthy both of the giver and Receiver.

In the mean time, the five days of Treaty being expired, and Anacharſis had effected nothing, this ſage Scythian was forced to leave Thomyris unto her bad Deſtinies, and came unto Cyrus. But it is obſervable, that before he departed, he underſtood how that Queen hearing how Aripithes was returned wounded, and that he went from the Camp with a deſign of killing Cyrus, ſhe was ſo incenſed againſt him, that ſhe commanded him to retire; for though ſhe much complained againſt Cyrus, yet ſhe did not wiſh his death; ſo as not being able to hide her angry reſentments: and Aripithes hearing of them, he was ſo grieved, that he died within twenty four hours after. But Thomyris was not long in this mind; for ſo it chanced, that on the laſt day of the Treaty, Cyrus writ unto Mandana, and ſent her Letter by a diſguiſed ſervant, to the end Gelonide might convey it unto that Princeſs: This Letter in lieu of coming to the hands of Gelonide, did fall into the hands of Thomyris; for the Servant being ſtopped by the way by ſome accident or other, he came not to the place where the Queen was until an hour after the Treaty ended: but it did ſo perplex the heart of this Princeſs, that hatred took the place of Love: For Cyrus thinking this would be the laſt Letter which he ſhould write unto Mandana, before the end of the War, which could never end before either his death, or the liberty of his Princeſs, he writ it with unimaginable paſſionateneſs concerning her, and with extream bitterneſs concerning Thomyris.

The truth is, all the moſt tender expreſſions which the moſt zealous love could invent, were included within this Letter, which came to the hands of this Queen whoſe ſpirits were ſo much incenſed at it, that if Cyrus had promiſed her ſome eternal affection, and had by this given her ſome teſtimonies of his inconſtancy, ſhe could not poſſibly have been more incenſed againſt him: So as thinking upon nothing but War and Revenge, and all her Forces being in as good a poſture as ſhe could wiſh, ſhe prepared for a Combate.

Ariantes on his ſide, ſeeing that a Battle muſt be fought to decide this great buſineſs upon which depended the happineſs or miſery of ſo many illuſtrious perſons, began to think upon all manner of ſtratagems which might ruin Cyrus: and finding that it would be a marvellous diſadvantage to him, if Thomyris could get the Fort of Sauromates into her power, becauſe then if the Army of Cyrus were engaged on this ſide the Woods, he had no place of retreat in caſe he were overcome: and therefore he imagined all manner of ways how to bring this great deſign about.

Cyrus on the other ſide being much perplexed that Thomyris by her frivolous Negotiations had retarded his deſigns, he did begin to think how he might by his diligence gain that time which had been loſt. Yet he had the ſatisfaction of being commended by the wiſe Anacharſis, who declared him free from all the ſad conſequences of this War. After which, he went unto the Queen of Pontus, and the Princeſs of Armenia at the Fort of Sauromates.

In the mean while, how deſirous ſoever both ſides were of fighting, yet it was a long time before any aſſaults were given; becauſe each ſide watching for advantage, and unwilling to hazard a definitive Battle raſhly, they would not fall on without preparing for it: But in the interim of all theſe great preparations, Mandana lived in ſuch a general ignorance, as that ſhe knew nothing: For neither the Princeſs of Bythinia, nor Iſtrina, nor Arpaſia did ſee her, ſo as ſhe had no other conſolation but what ſhe had from Doraliſa and Marteſia. Yet ſhe had ſo much ſatisfaction as to imagin, that if things went not on the ſide of Cyrpus, they would tell her: For Thomyris and Ariantes uſed always to let her know the worſt, but concealed the beſt news from her: And ſince it was many days ſince they told her any thing, ſhe concluded by infallible conſequence, that the ſide of Cyrus had the advantage: Thus her hopes that Cyrus would be victorious, and ſhe e're long releaſed, did afford her ſoul much tranquility.

But at laſt, after long watching for advantages on both ſides, both Cyrus and Thomyris reſolved to give Battle: And though Cyrus could have wiſhed a little longer delay, becauſe he knew that a very great force which Ciaxares ſent him was very nigh: Yet ſince he never in his life refuſed fighting when any occaſion was offered, he could not now recoil: ſo as every one in both Armies preparing for a Fight, one might have ſeen the very ſame ſpirit, and the ſame zeal in two huge Armies. On the one ſide Thomyris and Ariantes omitted nothing which might conduce to obtain the victory. On the other ſide, Cyrus and Mazares were as vigilant and circumſpect as poſſible, to vanquiſh and releaſe Mandana. Myrſiles, Intaphernes, Atergatis, and Hidaſpes exaſperated by intereſt or Love, they did contribute their whole aſſiſtance unto Cyrus, and to get the victory: And the laſt of theſe had a new reaſon to deſire it, for he underſtood that Meliantes was in the Tents Royal, and that Lycander did not know him to be his Rival.

Moreover, Artamas, Tygranes, Spitridates, and all the reſt of the brave Ones in this Army, prepared themſelves for victory or death. But though Cyrus at other times when he was ready to give Battle, was wont to be all joy, yet now his ſpirits were not ſo tranquil as he was wont, and he perceived in himſelf ſuch a ſecret melancholy (the cauſe of which he knew not) as ſeemed a bad Omen unto him. Yet he did diſſemble it as much as he could, and tempered his ſad thoughts with reaſon: Indeed,he was as active as if he reſented no ſuch thoughts, yet that day he would wear only a common ſuit of Arms; but as for Spitridates, he wore thoſe which Cyrus gave him, and he wore them with ſo good a grace, and ſo noble a Air, as he was much more reſembling that Illuſtrious Hero; Indeed many Soldiers who knew not that Cyrus had given thoſe rich Arms unto Spitridates, did take him for Cyrus, and were deceived by that marvellous reſemblance which was between them. However, though Cyrus had only common Arms, yet he had ſo high an Air, and ſuch a Princely command, that it was eaſie to ſee, that it was his admirable preſence which was his only ornament, and which attracted the looks of all about him: But at laſt after Orders were given in both Armies, ſome certain Spies which Cyrus had in the Army of Thomyris, returned unto his, who acquainted him that in the morning, there had been a Combate betwixt two Strangers who were with that Queen, the name of the one was Meliantes, and the other Lycander; that the firſt had killed the ſecond, and that the Conqueror was ſtill in favour with Thomyris, and would be in the Battel, relating afterwards, all they knew concerning the Enemies Army.

Hydaſpes being then with Cyrus, heard what the Spies ſaid, for he commanded them to ſpeak aloud before Hydaſpes, ſo as being exceedingly grieved that this amiable Rival was not killed by the Raviſher of Arpaſia, he made a hundred Vows to meet him in the Battel, and to have a particular Combat with him in the general Battel, for he always had obſerved that Meliantes was ſo much in Arpaſias favour that he could not chooſe but be jealous, yet ſince that place was not fit for the expreſſing the reſentments of his Soul, he ſaid not a word unto Cyrus, whoſe mind was ſo taken up with deſires of vanquiſhing, that he took no notice of Hydaſpes.

In the mean while, the fatal moment deſtined for the be-beginning of this bloody Battle being come, the two Armies which were drawn up, almoſt with equal advantage, advanced, and as ſoon as ever they were within Bow ſhot, a cloud of Arrows began to dusk the Air: But when their Quivers were emptied, and that all their other Engins had done their Execution, the Sword undertook to decide this great and terrible days work, which did nothing reſemble the Battles which Cyrus formerly fought: For in other Battels he always fought his Troops in order, but in this he could not poſſibly, and there was ſuch a confuſion in both Armies, that the Soldiers hardly knew their own Colours.

However, the fight was ſharp and bloody, and there was ſuch an animoſity between the Combatants, as there appeared the ſame cruelty in both of them As for Cyrus, his actions were this day ſo prodigious, that were they particularized, they would be incredible, for in the midſt of this great diſorder, where death looked grim on all ſides, he helpt the feeble, rallied thoſe which fled, and going continually from place to place, it may be ſaid, that he run through all the dangers of the Battel, yet his care could not bring him to meet with Ariantes; but he killed the valiant Octomaſades with his own hand, and he made his way through all places where his Sword did glitter: Indeed this great Prince being ſeconded by the valour of Mazares, and ſo many valiant Commanders and brave men, that he had put his Enemies ſo to rout, as the victory had been his without diſpute, Thomyris and Ariantes had been ruin'd, and Mandana releaſed, had it not been for one piece of ill news which he received. For as he was in this glorious condition, intelligence was brought him, that Andramites had ſurprized the Fort of Sauromates, that he had ſent the Queen of Pontus, and the Princeſs of Armenia, unto the Tents Royal; that Anacharſis and the King of Hircania, were in the Fort very ſlenderly guarded; that Andramites told Meriontes that he was free, and that Meriontes told him again, he would not be ſo, but would return unto Cyrus as ſoon as he could take Horſe, for he would not be delivered by any hand, but that which had ſaved his life: Adding that Andramites was with his Troops, between the Fort and the Wood which was burnt.

This news doubtleſs did much trouble Cyrus, but ſince the bringers of it, had told it confuſedly unto all they met, it had ſuch ill conſequences, that it intirely changed the deſtiny of the Battle, for things being told and heard in tumult, they are never rightly underſtood, ſo as paſſing in a ſhort time from mouth to mouth, in the very midſt of the Combat, the tale was ſo changed, that it was told the Vanguard, that the Rereguard was routed, that the Army of Cyrus was ſet about on all ſides, and that Thomyris her ſelf in perſon, was at the Fort of Sauromates, to hinder Cyrus in his Retreat.

This falſe news did ſo blunt the valor of the Souldiers, that from hopes of being Conquerors, they fell to fears of being conquered, and indeed were like to be ſo; for they were ſo full of Panick fears, that the flying Enemy perceiving it, did rally again, and the deſtiny changing, they ſhrunk before thoſe whom they put to rout: Spitridates, who was gone to the left Wing, after this ill news was known, he was ſo compaſſed by thoſe whom fears had moſt put into confuſion, that he did what he could to infuſe courage into them and to bring them to fight, but he could not, yet he reaſſembled a little Body, with which he kept his ground, but it was ſo inconſiderable in compariſon of that vaſt Body which was before him, that as brave as he was, he thought it impoſſible to retreat without diſhonour, but this Prince wearing thoſe rich Arms which Cyrus had formerly ſo gloriouſly worn, he thought himſelf obliged to do ſomething extraordinary, and therefore he encouraged thoſe whom he had rallied to ſecond him in his deſign, and by his example, to move thoſe who fled to return, ſo as in this dangerous occaſion he did things worthy his reſemblance of Cyrus.

In the mean time, Ariantes being in the head of thoſe who were before Spitridates alſo knowing thoſe Arms, and being miſtaken by the reſemblance between Cyrus and that Prince, he verily thought him to be his Rival, ſo as he made towards him, and aſſaulted him with ſuch vigor, that it was apparent, he was perſwaded; if he could overcome this terrible Enemy, he ſhould overcome the whole Army.

On the other ſide, Spitridates ſeeing himſelf ſo hotly ſet upon, did defend himſelf in ſuch an heroick manner, that if the little Body in which he was, had been able to held up againſt that which Ariantes commanded, he had not been overcome, but being extreamly unequal in number, they were intirely broken, do what Spitridates could, who was already wounded in ſeveral places.

However, ſince he was parted from Ariantes, by the tumult in the Combat, he thought that he might retreat; but as he was endeavouring it, he was compaſſed about you with fifteen or twenty Maſſagettans or Gelons, who thinking him to be Cyrus, and thinking to end the War by ending his life, never endeavoured to take him Priſoner, leſt his valour ſhould then become maſter of theirs, but falling all at once upon Spitridates, this great and unfortunate Prince, did ſee himſelf in moſt extream danger: However, though he had none with him but a very few of his own men, yet he encouraged them to do as he did, and indeed they did ſo bravely ſecond him, that if a Javelin which run him through, had not made him fall from his Horſe, he had been able to have vanquiſhed his Vanquiſhers. But as ſoon as this illuſtrious Prince was fallen, ſome of his men coming to him, and deſiring to ſtay with him: No, no, my Companions, (ſaid he unto them) you muſt not ſtay with me, for it is here where I muſt die, but it is not here where you muſt vanquiſh, and get that Princeſs whom I adore, out of the power of the cruel Thomyris: Theſe generous words being heard by the enemy, they were more perſwaded that Spitridates was Cyrus, for they thought that the Princeſs whom he ſpoke of was the Princeſs Mandana, though Spitridates doubtleſs meant Araminta, whom he heard Andramites had ſent unto the Tents Royal, ſo as falling upon him all at once, they killed him out-right, though his men did as much as men could do to hinder them, and they began ſuch a reſolute Combat for his Body, as never was the like, for ſince a report went among the Soldiers which fled, that Cyrus was on that ſide, ſome of them rallied, and fought with more courage to revenge their Prince whom they thought dead, and to defend his Corps, than they had done to obtain the victory. But Briantes ſide being the ſtronger, they carried away this illuſtrious Corps, and ſlew all thoſe who made reſiſtance: All this while, Cyrus ſeeing the general terrour in all his Troops, and not being able to be every where, he ſent about his friends ſeveral ways, to try if they could infuſe heart into them, whilſt he endeavoured to rally thoſe who were about him.

He ſent therefore Mazares on one ſide, and Artamus on another, and likewiſe he diſperſed Intaphernes, Atergatis, Indatherſis, Hydaſpes, and all the brave ones of his Army, ſo as ſending them away one after another, as he thought moſt expedient, there ſtayed not one man of Command with him, and there remained none but his very ſelf to rally all his diſperſed Troops. Indeed he aſſembled together a few ſcattered Soldiers, and drawing them into a little Body, he did not only hold a great one in play, but routed them, and killed abundance with his own hand: Thoſe whom he ſent unto ſeveral places to do the like, did ſo well obey him, that they each of them rallied a little Body of men, with which they ſlew abundance of their Enemies, ſo as they did not loſe ſo many men in the laſt Battel which Cyrus won, as they did at this time. Yet ſince all theſe petty diviſions did fight only particular Combats, and did not joyn, Cyrus could not ſee any hopes of vanquiſhing; but however, he had hopes of not being overcome, if the noiſe of his death had not been divulg'd amongſt the Enemy; who taking freſh hearts, and crying out unto thoſe they fought with, that Cyrus was dead, did ſtrike a great terror in thoſe places where that Prince was not, ſo as night coming on, the Maſſagettans remained upon the field, as Maſters.

Cyrus ſeeing himſelf in this pitiful condition, bethought himſelf how he might not fall into the hands of Thomyris, ſo that he with only twenty did moſt prodigiouſly diſengage themſelves from at the leaſt two hundred who had ſet them about; but in his retreat he met with another Body of men, in the head of whom was the young and valiant Meliantes, who was ſeeking all about for Hydaſpes, and could not meet with him; ſo as to comfort himſelf by the defeat of thoſe he met withal, he fell upon them. Since his number was very unequal, and he a brave man without cruelty, he offered to give them quarter if they would lay down Arms: But Cyrus being unaccuſtomed to receive any ſuch favours from any with Arms in their hands, he anſwered them only with blows, and defended himſelf in ſuch an Heroick manner, that he ſtood the laſt of his own men in the midſt of his Enemies without one wound. But ſince his courage made Meliantes admire him, he charged his men not to kill him, but to take him, which they could hardly have done, if the Sword of Cyrus had not broken.

But at laſt, when he ſaw himſelf ſingle and without arms, he did not make any vain reſiſtance, but ſtill preſerving his judgment ſound in the midſt of all theſe dangers, he bethought himſelf how to render himſelf unto ſome Officer who was not a Maſſagettan, leſt he ſhould be known, and having obſerved by the commands which Meliantes gave, that he had the tone of an Aſſyrian, and that he was no ſubject unto Thomyris, he rendred himſelf unto him.

Meliantes thinking himſelf obliged unto him for his choice, he promiſed that he ſhould be uſed according to the merit of his valour, and to teſtifie (ſaid he unto him) how much your bravery hath purchaſed my eſteem, though it be almoſt night, yet you ſhall not be bound as other Priſoners uſe to be, only I require your word that you will not eſcape.

Cyrus conſidering his condition, accepted his civility, and Meliantes deſiring him to ride next him, and hearing a retreat ſounding in all Quarters, he took the way towards the Camp, but in the way, O Heavens, what did the miſerable Cyrus think? what ſorrows did he not ſuffer? for he ſaw his Army defeated, he ſaw himſelf a Priſoner, and he could not hope to paſs as unknown long. Yet ſince he unto whom he had rendred himſelf did not know him, he had ſome comfort, and carried himſelf ſo well all the way, that he confirmed him in his intention of treating him well.

And indeed, though Cyrus had that day very mean Arms, and did not affect to ſpeak like a man of any extraordinary parts, yet Meliantes after he ſaw him in his Tent, did make no queſtion, but that he was a priſoner ſon of ſome great quality, and remembring how long he himſelf had been a Priſoner when he was taken by the Troops of Cyrus in Aſſiria, he would render the ſame civilities which he received: For ſince Hidaſpes did impriſon him only out of jealous reſentments, he was treated very favourably, ſo that Meliantes being charmed with the Valour, the Spirit, the handſome Preſence, and the Conſtancy of his Priſoner, he carried him into his Tent, and cauſed all his men to be as reſpective to him as to himſelf: Nor was he (out of a generous reſentment) very forward in divulging what he thought of his Priſoners quality until he knew it a little better, intending not to diſcover it unto Thomyris, if it proved to be as great as he did imagine it: Unleſs his quality was ſuch as might oblige that Queen to put Arpaſia into his power; for ſince he had no dependance upon Thomyris, he was reſolved to do his Priſoner no ill office, if the intereſt of his Love did not oblige him unto it: Thus Cyrus not knowing any thing, Meliantes was thinking how he might beſt keep his Priſoner from being known who he was.

In the mean time, Cyrus being ignorant of Meliantes his thoughts, and judging by his Air, and Phyſiognomy, that happily he might be in Love, he thought it expedient to tell him in obſcure terms, that the intereſt of a paſſion which was predominate in his Soul, required that he ſhould be unknown in the Camp of Thomyris, and that afterwards he ſhould conjure him to do him that good Office.

And indeed Cyrus did expreſs himſelf ſo ſweetly, that he obliged Meliantes to promiſe him any thing. And though Meliantes knew very well that his Priſoner would not diſcover all his ſecret; yet ſince he doubted not but that he was in love, he added compaſſion unto his eſteem; and expreſſed himſelf ſo generouſly unto Cyrus, that this great Prince was charmed with his virtue. Yet the ſoul of Cyrus was not ſo tranquil, as to ſet his mind wholly upon any thing which did not relate unto the preſent ſtate and intereſt of his love: But when he remembred all the Victories which he had gotten, and conſidered the pitiful condition wherein he was, he could not chooſe but wonder at the fickleneſs of fortune, and grieve for his own miſery.

For indeed it now depended wholly upon Meliantes, whether he would preſent him unto Thomyris, or put him into the hands of his Rival; nor did he know whether his whole Army was defeated; whether Mazares were dead or taken Priſoner, and whether ſo many Princes as were his friends, might rally his Troops, and joyn them with that puiſſant relief which Ciaxares ſent him, nor did he know how they could joyn, if it was true that Andramites had conſiderable Forces between the Fort and the Wood. But his greateſt perplexity was the thought that they would preſently acquaint Mandana with his defeat: So as fearing leſt the alteration in his fortune ſhould work upon the heart of that Princeſs, he ſuffered unexpreſſible torments; and he thought his condition ſo deplorable, that he believed the anſwer of the Sybil would preſently be fulfilled, and that he ſhould periſh by the cruelty of Thomyris.

But whilſt he was in all theſe melancholy cogitations, all his men were in a ſtrange inquietude. For ſince he appeared no where, they thought him either dead or taken Priſoner; ſo as never was ſuch a doleful murmur heard.

Creſſus, Mazares, Myrſiles, Artamus, Gobrius, Gadates, Intaphernes, Atergatis, Indathyrſis, Hidaſpes, and all thoſe who had any command in the Army, endeavoured to perſwade their Souldiers, that Cyrus was not dead, leſt after they had rallied them, they ſhould run away again: Likewiſe they did not think it expedient, to ſay that they thought him a Priſoner, nor to ſend unto the Camp of Thomyris to enquire for him, leſt if he ſhould be there unknown unto the Enemy. So that all theſe Princes ſaid, that Cyrus ſeeing in what a bad condition the Army was, was gone to the Auxiliaries which Ciaxares ſent, ſo that being in the head of a freſh Army, he might vanquiſh his vanquiſhers: Adding, (ſince Spitridates appeared not) that they were both gone together: For the truth was, they knew not what was become of either.

However Chriſantes and Feraulas, who were grieved beyond meaſure, that nothing was known concerning their illuſtrious Maſter, they diſguiſed themſelves in the habit of Maſſagettans, to the end they might the better paſs through the Enemies Camp, and hear what they ſaid of him.

Thus whilſt Creſſus and Mazares, by the conſent of all the Princes, did take upon them the command of the Rallied Troops, until it was known what was become of Cyrus: Theſe two faithful Servants, went not only unto the Camp of Thomyris, but alſo unto the Tents Royal which were very near, whither they underſtood the Queen was gone preſently after the Battle. Indeed a chance happened, which cauſed this incenſed and amorous Queen to take that Reſolution. For ſince thoſe who killed Spitridates took him for Cyrus, and ſince one of thoſe who commanded the Gelons in that Army, had a moſt fierce and cruel Soul, he had cut off the head of that unfortunate Prince; and being followed by his companions, who carried the Corps upon croſſed Lances, he did preſent it unto Thomyris, whoſe mind being extreamly incenſed againſt Cyrus, by reaſon of the laſt Letter which ſhe ſaw, ſhe received this ſad preſent in a moſt inhumane manner. Yet at the firſt apprehenſion, ſhe thought to turn away her eyes from ſuch a terrible object, but recollecting all her rage, and the animoſity of her heart, ſhe beheld it afterwards, without any ſymptoms of compaſſion, though her mind was much perplexed. And the more when this Captain, who preſented this glorious Victim, told her the words which Spitridates ſpake, when being fallen, he bad his men go away, becauſe that was the place where he was to dye, but not where they were to vanquiſh and deliver the Princeſs whom he adored, by forcing her out of the power of Thomyris. Then did her hatred double. For thinking this to be the head of Cyrus, thoſe laſt words did ſo revive and augment her choller, that ſtifling all thoughts of love, humanity, and compaſſion, ſhe was inflamed with jealouſie, hatred, and fury, ſhe renounced all the tenderneſs of her Sex, and dignity of her Birth, and yet for an umbrage of her inhumanity, ſhe ſeemed to be much troubled: So that without a word of her paſſion, ſhe began again to ſpeak of Cyrus as the murtherer of her Son, and as a Prince, who to ſatisfie the guſt of his ambition, did quench it with Rivers of Blood. She gave the Captain of the Gelons as many thanks as if he had won her a hundred Battels; ſhe made him huge promiſes of large recompences, and commanded him to follow her with that illuſtrious head in his hand. So that after ſhe had ſent to acquaint Ariantes (who was rallying his Troops which were much weaker than thoſe of his Rival) that Cyrus was dead, and that he ſhould ſtay in the Camp, ſhe took Horſe being attended with her Guard, and two hundred Archers, this Captain going behind her, and carrying the head which he had preſented.

But the obſervation was, that thoſe who ſaw this Queen ride in this cruel manner, were all moſt horridly aſhamed at her, and pitied him whom they imagined dead. For all the Maſſagettans did ſo well know, that the War which Cyrus made was juſt, and that Thomyris was in the wrong, that they were much grieved at this triumphant Tragedy.

However ſince it was night, and ſince ſhe had found out a way to perſecute Mandana, though ſhe could not be revenged upon Cyrus in a manner ſo ſenſible, ſhe would ſtay until it was day act a piece of cruelty wherein ſhe hoped for great delight. So that commanding that a great Baſon ſhould be filled with Blood, and ſet in the Plane which was before the Tents, and eſpecially before Mandana's, whither they had brought Araminta and the Princeſs Oneſila, ſhe came thither the next morning with all her Guard, and all thoſe who were in the Tents Royal. Yet ſhe had paſſed away the night in moſt terrible and ſtrange apprehenſions, for ſometimes the image of Cyrus living, made her pity his death, and ſometimes the conſtant love of that Prince unto Mandana made her rejoice he was not living, yet it was a moſt reſtleſs and tumultuous joy, which left ſuch ſmall ſigns of delight in her eyes, that nothing was to be ſeen in them, but ſigns of fury and rage.

Thomyris was that day dreſſed, as when ſhe went into the Wars; and ſhe held a Staff of Command in her hand, which ſhe alwaies uſed with a menacing action, though ſhe had no enemy near to fight withal: Yet to be more ſenſibly revenged upon Cyrus in the perſon of Mandana, this incenſed Queen cauſed the Tent of that moſt excellent Princeſs to be ſet open, with whom was Araminta, Oneſile, Doraliſa, and Marteſia, to the end they might behold the ſaddeſt ſpectacle that their eyes could look upon.

Since it was not known, what Thomyris intended to do with this great Baſon full of Blood, which ſhe had cauſed to be ſet before Mandana's Tent, curioſity had flocked together a huge croud of all manner of people, who all talked of what was intended, with much incertainty.

But at laſt, Thomyris coming out of her Tent, and the Captain of the Gelons following her with the ſuppoſed head of Cyrus, all the people fixed their looks upon this ſad object. And Mandana and Araminta looking on as the reſt did, had thoughts which others had not; for though this head was disfigured, yet it kept a great reſemblance of Cyrus. So that Mandana not queſtioning, but that it was the head of Cyrus whom ſhe loved with a moſt pure and innocent affection; her ſorrows did ſurpriſe her in ſo ſtrange a manner, that after ſhe had made a moſt doleful ſcriek, her voice failed her upon a ſudden: As for Araminta, though ſhe could not ſuſpect that this was the head of Spitridates, becauſe ſhe knew not why Thomyris ſhould be ſo cruel againſt him, yet the death of Cyrus, the grief of Mandana, and the cruelty of Thomyris did much move her.

However, this incenſed Queen, after ſhe had cauſed the head to be ſhewed unto the people, and told them in few words that now Peace was like to enſue ſince ſhe could ſhew them the head of him who had cauſed the War, and murdered her Son, ſhe commanded him who held this illuſtrious head, to plunge it three times in this Baſon full of Blood; to the end, (ſaid ſhe, being tranſported with fury and jealouſie) that he whoſe thirſt of it could never be quenched whilſt he lived, yet he might have enough of it when he was dead.

This terrible command was no ſooner given, but this Gelon Captain, whoſe nature was cruel, did plunge this head three times in the Baſon of Blood, and took it out again in ſuch a condition as cauſed horrour in all thoſe who had any humanity in them.

This ſad ſpectacle dejected the eyes of all the Spectators, and the cruel Thomyris her ſelf, could not chooſe but turn away her head, lifting up her eyes towards Heaven, rather as curſing than imploring the Gods. But as for the ſad Mandana, when ſhe ſaw the blood run down from all parts of this head as ſhe loſt her ſpeech by the firſt ſight, ſo ſhe loſt her ſight and underſtanding at the ſecond; and ſwooned between the arms of Doralisa and Martesia.

In the mean time, Chriſantes and Feraulus coming juſt as this cruel Executioner did plung this Head into the Baſon of Blood, they ſhared with Mandana in her ſorrows, for ſince they did not ſee the Arms of Cyrus they thought it to be the head of their illuſtrious Maſter; Feraulus tranſported with grief and rage, would needs throw himſelf into the Preſs, and take it out of their hands, or elſe be killed: But Chriſantes with-holding him by ſhewing him Mandana, and telling him that he would do Cyrus better ſervice by his life, he had not time to do it; for as ſoon as the Captain had plunged the Head three times in the Baſon, the cruel Thomyris perceiving the horrour which this action cauſed in the faces of all her people, ſhe commanded it to be carried unto the Body from whence it was ſevered, and both carried into a Tent until further orders. After which cauſing Mandana's Tent to be ſhut, ſhe returned to her own, with ſuch rage and tumultuous thoughts, that ſhe hated her ſelf no leſs than ſhe did Mandana.

ARTAMENES, OR THE
GRAND CYRUS.

PART X. Book III.

The Laſt Part and Book.

THomyris was no ſooner returned into her Tent, but this ſad object which ſtruck horrour into all the beholders,and had made ſome impreſſion in her own heart, did ſo ſting her Conſcience and Spirits, that ſhe knew not what ſhe did, or what ſhe ſhould do. Indeed, now and then ſhe thought that this action of Cruelty was but a poor piece of revenge; and her mind paſſing from object to object, ſhe fancied the illuſtrious Artamenes, as he was the firſt time ſhe gave him Audience, as Embaſſador from Cyaxares: And conſidering alſo the pitiful condition ſhe did now ſee him in; ſhe grew pale, and trembled for horrour, and ſome ſparks of compaſſion entring into her heart whether ſhe would or no, they revived in it ſome thoughts of tenderneſs and love, which did more cruelly torment her than all her fury, her rage, and her jealouſie: How! Thomyris (ſaid ſhe) is Cyrus dead whom thou didſt paſſionately love? And canſt thou ſee his Head ſevered from his Body without exceſſive ſorrow? Couldſt thou find a heart to command it to be plunged in a Baſon full of Blood? Fie, fie, thou doſt not only merit his hatred, but art worthy of the Epethite of Cruel Thomyris, which he gave thee in his laſt Letter, and with his exſpiring breath. Yes, yes, inhumane Princeſs that thou art, it is pity he ſhould be unfaithful unto that Princeſs whom he loves; thou doſt deſerve he ſhould be as cruel unto thee, as thou art unto him. Though thou doſt keep Mandana in thy power, yet he did let the point of his Sword fall when thou didſt meet him in the Wood of the Sauromates: Though he might eaſily have killed thee, yet thou triumpheſt in his death: Yes merciles Thomyris, though this Prince was infinitely in love with Mandana, yet he would not deprive thee of life: Thou who haſt vaunted to have loved him better than ever any elſe knew how; canſt thou look upon him dead, without any reſentments of ſorrow? And haſt thou nothing elſe to do but invent ſuch Cruelties as will make thee odious unto thy very ſelf, and all the world? After this, Thomyris being ſilent, ſhe had a thouſand ſeveral imaginations upon this adventure: And ſhe did ſo particularly call to memory all that ever Cyrus had done or ſaid in her Court, when he carried the name of Artamenes, that her heart beginning to melt, ſhe grieved for that Prince, whoſe death did at the firſt news of it fill her full of joyes; and ſhe grieved with more apprehenſive ſorrow, than ever her ſoul was before ſenſible of. And though as oft as ſhe remembred his laſt words, ſhe could not grieve for the death of him who pronounced them: Yet love being the moſt prevailing paſſion of her heart, ſhe ſometimes thought that ſhe ſaw Cyrus ſenſible and living, which was an object leſs grieving, than Cyrus was in that condition which ſhe ſaw him. So as tormenting her ſelf all manner of waies that an amorous heart could be tormented, ſhe was as great a ſufferer as any could be. Her moſt ſenſible perplexity was, that knowing how Ariantes loved Mandana, ſhe thought that ſhe had not liberty enough to treat her ill, and to be revenged of her, both for the death of Cyrus, her own cruelty, and for her own misfortunes: So as her ſoul having ſo many torments to endure at once, that for ſome days ſhe was unable to order the general affairs of her Eſtate, but ſent all thoſe who came unto her about any buſineſs, unto the Prince her Brother: And that you may ſee the inequality of her thoughts; for all this act of cruelty ſtruck horror into all beholders, yet ſhe commanded that all due rights ſhould be done unto the Corps of Cyrus, and that they ſhould be performed as not coming from her orders.

But to return unto Mandana, and to ſay ſomthing of her reſentments, when ſhe ſay the bloody head of Spitridates, which ſhe thought to be Cyrus, be pleaſed to know that ſhe continued ſo long in her ſwound, that this ſad Scene was not only ended when ſhe recovered out of it, by the cares of Araminta, Oneſile, Doraliſa, and Marteſia: But the Tent was ſhut, and all the people diſperſed before ſhe recovered her ſight and ſpeech; when ſhe firſt opened her eyes, ſhe turned away her head and ſhut them again, for her imagination being ſtill filled with that terrible object which cauſed her ſwounding, ſhe thought that ſhe ſaw it ſtill.

But after her eyes were a little ſettled, and her reaſon recollected, ſhe knew that ſhe ſaw nothing but people mourning, with faces and eyes all ſwelled with teares, both for her grief, and for the death of him who cauſed it: Indeed, the unfortunate Araminta not knowing what a ſad ſhare ſhe had in this fatal loſs, which thus grieved Mandana, ſhe was moſt ſenſibly troubled, and yet ſhe endeavoured to give all the conſolation ſhe was able, not knowing that ſhe her ſelf ſtood moſt in need of it: And therefore beginning to ſpeak; In the name of the Gods, Madam (ſaid ſhe unto Mandana) make your conſtancy and patience appear, rouze up your ſelf, and conſider, that if you ſhould kill your ſelf with grief, your death and his perhaps would be without revenge; but if on the contrary you endeavour to live, all Aſia will take Arms for your liberty, and for revenge of Cyrus his death.

Alas (ſaid the ſad Mandana) how hard a thing is it to follow your counſel? and therefore Madam (continued ſhe, beginning to flow in teares, which the exceſs of her ſorrow had till then reſtrained) before you give me any more of this advice, I pray conſider whether your ſelf were able to live, if you ſhould ſee Spitridates in that pitiful condition which I have ſeen Cyrus. But oh heavens (continued ſhe , and would not give Araminta time to anſwer) is it poſſible that I ſhould live, and ſee Cyrus dead ? But moſt illuſtrious Prince, though I am yet living, yet I would thou couldſt know, it is againſt my will, and that I look upon death as the only thing deſirable : Indeed, what have I elſe to do but to dye ? For ſince Cyrus is dead, victory is not to be looked for. It were folly to think that any can now either revenge his death, or deliver me, ſince he could not releaſe me: And though they ſhould, what ſhould I do in a world wherein is nothing that can pleaſe me ? I ſhould do nothing but continually lament the death of Cyrus, and ſhould not have ſo much ſatisfaction as to ſhed my teares upon his Tomb : For conſidering how the cruel Thomyris hath uſed his ſacred Corps, certainly ſhe will cauſe it to be torn in pieces by wild beaſts: So as it is better to dye preſently, then to live in ſuch an eternal ſorrow, which would brand me with ingratitude to the greateſt Prince in the world ; for alas, how great is my debt unto Cyrus ? and therefore I were moſt unworthy of that conſtant affection he bore unto me, if I could think upon any thing but death.

After this, Mandana being ſilent, becauſe a floud of tears would not ſuffer her to ſpeak, Doraliſa and Marteſia in their turns did uſe all their perſwaſive arguments of comfort. As for Araminta, it coming into her mind that perhaps Spitridates was alſo killed, her ſoul was ſo troubled that ſhe hardly minded what Mandana ſaid : and the certain death of Cyrus, together with the incertainty of Spitridates his life, did ſo diſquiet her mind, that ſhe could not continue comforting Mandana as ſhe begun : And indeed, conſidering the ſad condition of that Princeſs, it was a hard matter to find any apparent reaſon by which they could perſwade her that ſhe was not in a moſt miſerable condition : and all thoſe about her could do nothing elſe but ſhed bitter tears, and lament the loſs as well as ſhe : All were in tears at once, and they wept as if they would all weep continually.

On the other ſide, Chryſantes thinking the death of his Maſter certain, he reſolved to carry this ſad news unto Mazares, and all the Princes in the Army, leſt if reports of it ſhould be divulged amongſt the Souldiers any other way, they would not be ſo forward to revenge his death: But as for Feraulas, he would ſtay upon the place, to know what they did with the Corps of Cyrus, and to try if he could ſee Marteſia, to lament with her the misfortune of this Prince, and to receive ſome orders from Mandana for he imagined that ſince Cyrus was dead, they would not guard her ſo ſtrictly.

In the mean time, it may well be ſaid, that the ſuppoſed death of this great Conqueror did more illuſtrate his glory when it was known on both ſides, in being lamented both by his Friends and Enemies. Thomyris her ſelf grieved, Ariantes did pity, though not grieve: All the Maſſagettans lamented him, all his friends deſired no life, but to revenge his death: Mazares lamented his death, as if he had not been his Rival: All the Souldiers grieved for him their Father, and ſome of thoſe who fled from the Battle did kill themſelves for very ſhame and ſorrow, that this Prince ſhould ſuffer for their baſeneſs.

Moreover, beſides thoſe who grieved for him out of affection, generoſity, and compaſſion, there were many who were engaged to it by particular intereſts: For Intapbernes and Atergatis did ſee that their Princeſſes could not be ſo ſoon releaſed, Gobrias and Hydaſpes had the ſame concerning Arpaſia: Tigranes had the ſame thought for the admirable Oneſile. Again, the Princeſs of Bythinia, Iſtrina, Oneſile, Arpaſia and Telagene did ſee that their chains would not be ſo ſoon broken: But whilſt all the world were lamenting the loſs of Cyrus, and were ignorant of Spitridates his deſtiny, Cyrus underſtanding by Meliantes that he was thought to be dead, he was both ſad and glad of it: Yet he had many more reaſons to be ſorry; for when he heard of this Tragical Ceremony of Thomyris, he verily believed that Spitridates was dead, and that they were miſtaken by the great reſemblance betwixt him and that unfortunate Prince, ſo that beſides his own miſeries, he was extreamly ſenſible of his loſs, and Araminta's ſorrows.

Moreover, he was not only ſenſible of Mandana's reſentments, in a belief that he was dead, but he feared leſt her reſentments ſhould prejudice him in another manner: For (ſaid he in himſelf) though ſhe did never change her thoughts of me, is it not to be feared that this ſuppoſed death will make her change thoſe thoughts ſhe had of me; for (ſaid he out of ſome jealous apprehenſions) one may be faithful unto a living Lover, when one is not ſo unto a dead one. Few carry their affections further then to the Grave of the perſon loved: ſo as ſince the belief of my death may either cauſe her death, or cauſe her to be inconſtant, it doth more concern me that Mandana do know that I am living, than that Thomyris ſhould be ignorant of it: In the mean time, I know no more how to ſhew my ſelf unto Mandana then I know how to hide my ſelf from Thomyris; for ſhould I ask Meliantes any queſtions concerning that Princeſs, he would perhaps not only ſuſpect who I am, but would imagine it concerns Thomyris and Ariantes to know that I am in his hands: So that Cyrus not knowing what to reſolve upon, either to procure his liberty, or to let Mandana know he was not dead, his ſoul was in a moſt ſad condition. Yet upon ſecond thoughts, he conceived it expedient to ſay nothing unto Meliantes for ſome days, leſt his too much earneſtneſs ſhould render him ſuſpected: and that afterwards he would ask ſo much favour from him, as to ſend to one of his friends to acquaint him that he was a priſoner, and to let this friend of his come diſguiſed into the Camp of Thomyris, and confer with him about ways for his releaſement.

But during this little interval, things went reaſonable well; for Mazares after he had rallied his Troops, he entrenched them very advantageouſly, in expectation of thoſe Forces which Ciaxares ſent: And Ariantes having a moſt earneſt deſire to ſee Mandana, and ſtill fearing the violence of Thomyris, he alſo entrenched his Army, and went unto the Tents Royal; for though it was victorious, yet the victory had coſt him ſo dear, that he was not in a condition to attempt any thing againſt Mazares, conſidering the ground he had choſen for his intrenchment: Yet did he find no great ſatisfaction in his voyage; for he found the mind of Thomyris ſo incenſed and unquiet, that no propoſition could be made which did not vex her, eſpecially any thing which related unto Mandana. On the other ſide, having viſited the Princeſs whom he adored, he found his entertainment ſo bad, that he was forced to retire, and ſtay till her ſorrows were a little over.

The truth is, ſhe gave him ſuch ſharp Language, ſhe charged him ſo oft with the death of Cyrus; ſhe proteſted ſo earneſtly that ſhe would not live, but only to the end the King her Father, and the Prince Mazares might continue the War againſt Thomyris, to deliver her, and be revenged for the death of Cyrus; and ſhe did ſo fully aſſure him, that ſhe hated him as much as if he had killed Cyrus with his own hands, that this Prince did think himſelf in a worſe Condition by the death of Cyrus, then by his life.

In the mean time, the Princeſs of Bythinia, the Princeſs Iſtrina and Arpaſia were always together, not having the liberty to ſee Mandana, with whom Araminta and Oneſile continually were: For ſince they were put there in the abſence of Thomyris, when Andramites ſent them to the Tents Royal, Ariantes durſt not incenſe the Princeſs ſo far as to take them away: Alſo, ſince it was believed that Cyrus was dead, they did not ſo much care if company came to her, and the Princeſs of Bythinia, Iſtrina, and Arpaſia had leave to ſee her in the preſence of him who commanded her Guard: 'Tis true, they had no great comfort in ſeeing her, for they ſaw her ſo full of ſorrows, as they did not think ſhe was able to endure them long.

Again, Arpaſia hearing that Licander her Raviſher was killed by an unknown hand: and underſtanding from Niſide who was with her that ſhe ſaw Meliantes in a diſguiſe, ſhe made no queſtion but it was he unto whom ſhe was obliged for it: but ſhe knew not whether ſhe ſhould be ſad or glad at it; for though ſhe did ſtill much eſteem him, yet ſhe had ſtill much tenderneſs and inclination unto Hydaſpes: But ſince the matter was not hard to ſee Arpaſia, and ſince Meliantes his paſſion was always in his mind, he took this opportunity, and came one morning unto Niſide, unto whom he had addreſs without much difficulty.

Niſide being always his friend, ſhe was glad to ſee him and to hear from his own mouth, that it was he who killed Licander. He told her then how he came diſguiſed unto this Court, leſt Licander ſhould induce Thomyris to arreſt him: And that he was in hopes to rid himſelf of one Rival by particular Duel, and of the other by a generous Combate: After which, he deſired Niſide to help him unto the ſight of Arpaſia: And indeed, ſhe being deſirous to do him any favour, ſhe procured him the opportunity without telling Arpaſia, who was ſo ſurprized at the ſight of Meliantes, that ſhe knew not how ſhe ſhould receive him.

But ſince Niſide had cunningly hinted unto her, that certainly it was he who killed Licander, and moreover, that Meliantes was more amiable than ever he was; her affection to Hidaſpes could not hinder her from receiving a man whom ſhe much eſteemed, very civilly, eſpecially ſince ſhe had very tender thoughts of him, before ſhe knew of his affection unto Argeliſe: And though Arpaſia did colour this civility to him, for that he had ventured his life in ruining her Raviſher; and though her expreſſions might well give him to underſtand that her mind was not changed, and that ſhe could hold him in no other degree than that of friendſhip; yet for all that, ſhe expreſſed her ſelf, and he anſwered her ſo tenderly and paſſionately, that he engaged her whether ſhe ſhould or no to be very obliging towards him: Alſo he obtained leave to viſit her, yet upon condition never to mention any matter of Love: So as he thought himſelf very happy in his misfortune; for ſince he believed Cyrus to be dead, he did not think that Hidaſpes would be in any condition to diſpute with him for Arpaſia, ſo as he returned to his priſoner with much ſatisfaction: And as ſoon as he was with him, he fell into diſcourſe upon the power of Love; he told him what was ſaid of Thomyris, of Ariantes, of Mandana, and of all their paſſions.

But whilſt things paſſed thus in the Camp of Thomyris, in the Tents Royal, and in the Camp of Mazares, the news of Cyrus his death being carried unto the Fort of Sauromates, Meriontes having no mind to be releaſed by Andramites; and ſeeing Cyrus who had ſaved his life was dead, he would not go unto the Camp of that Prince as he intended: and being able to ride on horſ-back, he beſeeched the Commander of the Fort to let him go unto the Camp of Thomyris: But it being late when he came thither, and having intimate acquaintance with Meliantes, he asked an Officer whom he did accidentally meet with, whether he knew Meliantes his Quarters, and underſtanding by him that he was within fifty paces of it, he went to deſire a Nights lodging with him. As ſoon as he ſaw Meliantes, he talked of nothing but the valour of Cyrus, of his high ſoul, of his generoſity, and how he ſaved his life; how he treated him during his impriſonment, and was ſo high in his commendations, that Meliantes thinking to do a favour unto his Priſoner, in letting him ſee a man who ſpake ſo highly of a Prince whoſe part he took, he brought him into the Tent where he was: For though he knew that his Priſoner did not deſire to be known, yet he made no difficulty of bringing in Meriontes, becauſe he could not imagin that he ſhould know him, ſince they were of contrary ſides, ſo as in this thought he carried Meriontes into the Tent where he was. At his firſt entrance, both Cyrus and Meriontes were ſo aſtoniſhed, that they were not Maſters of their firſt thoughts: Meriontes no ſooner ſaw Cyrus, but cried out, Oh Sir, (ſaid he unto him) can I believe my eyes? Is it poſſible that Cyrus, whom two hundred thouſand men believe to be dead, ſhould be alive? At theſe words, Cyrus ſeeing there was no longer any concealing himſelf from Meliantes, he was forced to have recourſe unto thoſe who knew him: You ſee valiant Meriontes, (ſaid he) how inconſtant Fortune is, ſince ſhe hath reduced me unto the moſt miſerable condition of men, if you do not oblige the generous Meliantes not to diſcover me.

Meriontes having leiſure whilſt Cyrus ſpake, to recollect himſelf out of his wonder, repented of his haſtineſs: But knowing Meliantes to be a man of a moſt generous ſpirit, and of quick apprehenſion, he ſaw there was no remedy. However, Meriontes thinking himſelf infinitely obliged unto Cyrus who had ſaved his life in an Heroick way, he turned towards Meliantes, and told him, that if he did not behave himſelf towards his priſoner as he would have done, had he not known him, he would become his mortal Enemy. But there was no need of all this; for Meliantes having no dependance upon Thomyris, was ſo glad to ſee himſelf Maſter of the Deſtiny of the greateſt Prince in the world, he interrupted Meriontes, and aſſured him that Cyrus needed not to fear any thing: Alſo a ſecond thought coming into his mind, he conceived that it would be advantageous unto him to oblige Cyrus, ſince he might thereby oblige Hydaſpes to ceaſe his pretences unto Arpaſia: So as continuing to ſpeak; ſince, Sir, I am no Subject unto Thomyris (ſaid he unto Cyrus) only a Voluntier in her party: and ſince Love only brought me hither, I think it would be no blemiſh unto honour, if I did ſet you out of her power.

For my part (added Meriontes) I ſhall go further than you: For though I were her Subject, and in your place, knowing her injuſtice and cruelty, by her late horrid act, I ſhould think it my duty to free this Illuſtrious Prince out of her hands,and ſhould think my ſelf more an Enemy unto that Queen than he is; if I ſhould give her any occaſion to commit an act ſo baſe.

But generous Meliantes, whether you be ſubject unto Thomyris or no, you are obliged not to diſcover that Cyrus is in your hands. However, ſince I am a priſoner unto your priſoner, I will never forſake him, for ſince my life is his, I will loſe it rather, than let him come into the hands of his Enemies. Sir, (ſaid Meliantes) though there was no generoſity in my nature, yet ſure I ſhould be ſo by the examples which the Illuſtrious Cyrus and you have given, and therefore Meriontes take no thought for your Illuſtrious Conqueror, for ſince now I I know enough of him, I am ſo far from thinking him my priſoner, that I and my deſtiny is more in his hands, than he or his in mine: Oh generous Meliantes, (ſaid Cyrus) if there be any thing within the compaſs of my power, wherein I may ſerve you, tell me, I conjure you, and to teſtifie that I am not unworthy of your generoſity, I declare that I would not deſire to oblige you unto this, but only for the intereſt of Mandana, and let me tell you alſo, (to ſhew that I had conceived a great opinion of you) that I have ſeveral times intended to truſt your generoſity and diſcretion; not knowing well what thoughts you had of me.

After this, Meliantes anſwered Cyrus in ſuch a manner, as did evidence unto him, that he might expect any thing from him; and Meriontes ſhewed himſelf ſo zealous for the ſafety of his deliverer, that this Prince had great reaſon to put much confidence in the affection of two ſuch men as had both wit and courage enough: Meliantes acquainted alſo Meriontes with one thing which much confirmed him in his thoughts; for he told him that Aripithes, upon whoſe ſcore he became engaged on Thomyris ſide, did die ſo much diſpleaſed againſt her, that he commanded ſeveral of his ſervants, to tell all his Officers, that he would not have them fight any longer in her ſervice: So as theſe two virtuous men finding no ſcruple in their deſign of ſerving the greateſt Prince upon Earth, againſt the moſt unjuſt Princeſs in the world, they promiſed ſo much fidelity unto Cyrus, that he had reaſon to eſteem himſelf happy in his miſery, in finding two friends of ſo much virtue: And to oblige them unto a more affectionate devotion to him, he uſed all the Heroick expreſſions that was inventable; yea he had ſo high an opinion of their virtue and quality, as that he would not intereſt them by any ambitious hopes; but thought that in promiſing them his friendſhip, he promiſed them all, and he did that in as noble a manner, as if he had promiſed Kingdoms unto them.

After Cyrus had ſaid all unto Meliantes and Meriontes, which he thought fit to engage them in his ſervice, the firſt of theſe moſt humbly beſought him, he might impart one thing which concerned him to know: And Cyrus conſenting, Sir, (ſaid Meliantes unto him) to teſtifie my ſincerity in my promiſing of ſerving you and delivering you as ſoon as I can without danger, I muſt acquaint you that I am a Rival unto Hydaſpes whom you moſt dearly love, and I conjure you in conſideration of what I ſhall do for you, that you will ſtand Neutral between him and me, if ever fortune put us into a condition to diſpute for the poſſeſſion of Arpaſia : How (ſaid Cyrus) are you a Rival unto Hydaſpes , and have I the misfortune to be a friend unto one who is your Enemy ?

After this, Meliantes told Cyrus in two words, the ſtate of his fortune, not concealing from him that he had ſeen Arpaſia ſince the Battle : After which Cyrus ſaid in deſiring me to be Neutral between Hydaſpes and you, generous Meliantes, you deſire me much leſs than I will promiſe you : For I will faithfully promiſe, that if ever it be my fortune to ſee him again , I will conjure him to ceaſe loving Arpaſia, and will be as earneſt with him, as if I were his Rival, as well as your friend ; but after this I will not promiſe you any more, for my humour is ſuch, that I will never abſolutely command my friends, eſpecially in matters of Love. But I will promiſe you to ſpeak both unto Gobrias and Hydaſpes, as much as I can in your behalf : Then, Sir, (replied Meliantes) I have no more to ſay,but to aſſure you that though you had denied me, yet I would have done all I could to ſerve you.

The worſt is (added he) that it is not an eaſie matter to get you from this place where we now are unto your own Camp, without danger of being taken by ſome who may know you : Therefore it is beſt to go in the night-time unto the Tents Royal ; for were you there, and diſengaged from the Quarters of the Army, it would be much more eaſie to take a compaſs , and meet thoſe Auxiliaries which Ciaxares ſends you, and otherwiſe, I confeſs I can ſee no likelihood of getting you unto your Camp.

Meriontes concurring with the opinion of Meliantes, and Cyrus apprehending much danger if he ſhould be known, he concurred alſo ; but the main difficulty is in going ſafely into the Tents Royal, and getting out : At laſt, Meliantes reſolved to feign himſelf ſick, and under pretence of heat, not to go in the day, but would go in a Coach cloſe up, to avoid the humidity of the night.

Thus it was reſolved, that Cyrus ſhould go in the Coach with him, that Mereontes ſhould guard them with his friends, and that they ſhould not ſet out until it was dark.

But ſince it was requiſite that Meliantes ſhould have a little time to counterfeit himſelf ſick, and ſince Meriontes who would not forſake his Illuſtrious Conquerour, would not ſhew himſelf, they ſpent that day all three together, for it was told at the Entrance into the Tent, that Meliantes was ſick, and therefore would not be ſeen; ſo as having time enough to entertain themſelves with diſcourſe, and having now nothing to talk of but themſelves, Meliantes and Meriontes were a long time in lamenting Cyrus, and admiring all the wonders of his life. But Cyrus knowing that nothing was more obliging, than to ſeem deſirous of knowing the fortunes of friends, he was very earneſt with Meliantes, to particularize the paſſages of his life a little better to him, and afterwards he preſſed Meriontes to tell him his: For truly (ſaid he unto him) after Democedes told me your Country, after I have ſeen you fight, and after this your laſt act of generoſity, I cannot chooſe but be very deſirous to know what moved you to leave ſo good a Country: Sir, (replied Meriontes) my adventures have been ſo poor, and there hath been ſo few extraordinary Events in my life, that indeed there is ſome reaſon to wonder, why I ſhould voluntarily baniſh my ſelf from a Country ſo pleaſant, if it were not an ordinary thing to ſee that Love can make men miſerable, without the power of Fortune: And there paſſeth many ſtrange and extraordinary thoughts in the heart of a Lover, which ſeem nothing in the eyes of the world, ſo as he can be miſerable when nothing appears unto other men why he ſhould be ſo.

Alas, ſaid Meliantes, I know this to be true by Experience: The moſt tranſcendent perſon whom I adore, ſhe eſteems me, and is very friendly unto me; but for all that, I am yet the moſt miſerable Lover in the world, ſince her affection unto my Rival is of another nature, though ſhe does nothing more unto him than unto me.

The miſery which I complain of, (replied Meriontes) ſeems doubtleſs leſs than yours; but I have a ſoul ſo nice, and I do love in ſuch a tender manner, that it is intollerable to me: Since we can do nothing better (in a time when we can do nothing for the Princeſs Mandana) ſaid Cyrus, than to know the life of a man who is willing to ſerve her, I beſeech you acquaint us with it. I muſt tell you again, Sir, (replied Meriontes) my adventures are too poor for the knowledg of ſuch a Prince as you are, though I muſt confeſs your deſtiny ſeems to be ſomething dubious. However, Meriontes, (replied Cyrus) I beſeech you ſatisfie my deſire, but to the end Meliantes may have the knowledg of your adventure, tell him in (I beſeech you) few words, the Cuſtoms of the Country of the new Sauromates.

Meriontes in obedience unto Cyrus, told Meliantes in as conciſe a manner as he could, the Original of the new Sauromates, their Lives, their Cuſtoms, and all that Democedes mentioned in Sapho's Hiſtory, and began his diſcourſe in theſe Terms.

The Hiſtory of Meriontes and Dorinice.

I Shall not need to tell you, Sir, that I am deſcended from a Family which holds a conſiderable Rank in my Country; for ſince Democedes hath related the Hiſtory of Sapho, I am ſure he hath told you of Clyrantes, who is my Brother, and by conſequence who I am. Nor am I obliged to acquaint you with the life of our Court: For ſince you do know it to be gallant, that there are Judges eſtabliſhed to determine all the differences of Lovers, and that the moſt admirable Sapho is very happy there, you will eaſily believe what I ſhall ſay.

But, Sir, ſince the beauty and merit of one whoſe name is Dorinice, is the foundation of this adventure, and the cauſe of my misfortune, it is requiſite I deſcribe her unto you, to the end you may the better know the violence of my paſſion, and the greatneſs of my miſery: Since it was not the quality of Dorinice which made me love her, I ſhall tell you only by the by, that her Family from whence ſhe is deſcended is very Illuſtrious; but let me tell you that ſhe is adorned with a thouſand qualities which attract Love.

Indeed ſhe is of a very handſome ſtature, her Complexion is rare, her Eyes black, and full of ſpirit; her Hair is fair, her Smile Charming, her Teeth white, her Air both gallant, noble, and modeſt, and her neck and hands moſt fair.

Moreover, her Wit is ſuperlative, her humour always equally the ſame, and there is ſuch a juſt mixture of mirth and ſeriouſneſs in this perſon, that ſhe doth infinitely pleaſe and ſuit with all the world, both the Melancholy and the Merry. She ſeemed to be a very good friend, and indeed ſhe was ſo, though to my ſorrow I found her heart but hollow, yet it was a diſguiſed hollowneſs: For when one firſt ſees her, and ſees the freeneſs of her looks, her civility and ſweetneſs, one would ſay, that for the time he had made a far progreſs into her ſoul, and yet one ſhould not be one ſtep further in her favour at the end of three Months, than they are at the end of three days, and the like at the end of three years, all imaginable ſervices and Courtſhip will not work upon her heart.

Then, Sir, I muſt tell you, that we have but one City in our State, and that Dorinice was eighteen years of age before I ever ſpoke unto her: For beſides the bigneſs of our City, which is ſo large, that one may eaſily be long there and not particularly known, ſo it was, that ſeveral trifling paſſions did take up many of my young days, and as chance would have it, I fell into a Caballe oppoſite unto that of Dorinice's Mother, ſo as it may be ſaid, I knew her and I knew her not. But ſince ſeveral changes chanced, which abſolutely diſengaged my heart, I chanced one day to meet this ſair one in an aſſembly at the Queens. Thinking I ſhould much ſpight thoſe Ladies whom I had broke off withal, if I did entertain Dorinice, whom I knew they loved not, I began diſcourſe with her.

Thus I entertained her the firſt time more in ſpight to others, than to pleaſe my ſelf, not but that I found much pleaſure in her company, for ſince ſhe was glad to ſee I had quitted the Ladies whom ſhe loved not, ſhe received me better than when I was in favour with her Enemies, and yet ſhe chid me when I began to tell her, that I thought my ſelf very happy in her company. Before I give any direct anſwer unto your Civility, Sir, replied ſhe, and ſmiled, I beſeech you give me leave to examine a little, whether I ſhould take you as a Spy or as a Deſerter of your friends, or as one who hath changed ſides. Oh moſt lovely Dorinice (ſaid I and interrupted her) I am neither a Spy nor a Deſerter of my friends, but I have changed my ſide with ſo much reaſon, that you cannot in any juſtice blame me; yet leſt you ſhould have an ill opinion of me, I will not ſpeak any ill of your Enemies, but ſince I have ſo much good to ſpeak of you, time will be better imployed in that than in the other: Were you to talk long, replied ſhe, and ſmiled, you would both trouble me and your ſelf, for I have ſo many faults, and ſo few good qualities, that you would find it, Sir, a hard task to talk of ſuch things only as ſhould pleaſe me: But ſince, Sir, it is probable you will tell me more of my good than my bad qualities, I ſhall hope you will not tell me any thing which will diſpleaſe me: At the leaſt I am ſure, Madam (ſaid I unto her) I ſhall ſay nothing but truth, when I tell you that you are the moſt faireſt and lovelieſt perſon in the world.

As Dorinice was ready to reply, they came to take her out to dance, ſo as all that night I could not talk any more with her. But ſince ſhe had infinitely pleaſed me, and ſince I obſerved that I had ſufficiently vexed thoſe Ladies whom I intended to ſpight, I went the next day with one of my friends unto the houſe of Dorinice's Mother, whoſe name was Elicrate; and, Sir, I was ſo much taken both with the Mother and the Daughter, that I repented I had been ſo long unacquainted with them, for the truth was, their ſociety was infinitely more pleaſing than that I had quitted; for thoſe Ladies whom I had left off were perſons who admitted all ſorts of men without exception or choice, which queſtionleſs goes againſt the grain of thoſe who have nice and delicate ſpirits, and not at all advantagious unto ſuch as frequent them: But, Sir, it was otherwiſe in the houſe of Elicrate, for almoſt none frequented it, but men of excellent parts; and Dorinice had ſuch an art of wearying thoſe who were not well accompliſhed, that if any ſuch came once there, they were ſure not to come twice; and yet there was always much company with her, becauſe there was men more of excellent parts in our Court: And, Sir, you muſt know that this Lady, though never capable of love, nor ever will as long as ſhe lives, yet is ſhe the greateſt fondling in friendſhip that is in the world, for ſhe has friends of all ſorts, and the wonder is, ſhe gets them every day, and loſes none, and does ſo well keep all ſuch ſecrets as are intruſted to her, that ſhe never injures any, but as far as ſhe is able, is ready to do any ſervice for thoſe whom ſhe hath promiſed any place in her friendſhip: Yet, as I ſaid in the beginning of my diſcourſe, ſhe hath this particular quality, that ſhe hath ſet bounds about her heart, beyond the limits of which none whoſoever can ever go; for one ſhall be as high in her favour at three months as they can be in three years.

Dorinice being, as I have deſcribed her, very amiable and engaging at the firſt, I thought my ſelf the happieſt man alive in her acquaintance; and I preſently perceived, that my thoughts of her might be phraſed Love, and not at all friendſhip: Yet I thought my ſelf never the more miſerable; for ſince I knew that I had ſome ſhare in her eſteem, and that ſhe promiſed me her friendſhip, I thought that I might pretend unto her love: But to carry it according to the common Maximes of all prudent Lovers; I did not declare my ſelf at the firſt, but ſtayed until her heart was a little engaged, before I openly told and divulged that I was in love with her. However I was very aſſiduous in my Viſits, and courted her with all imaginable ſubmiſſions, for the friendſhip which men held with her did exact from them the ſame ſervices almoſt that Love did, and I was ſo happy in my behaviour, that in a ſhort time ſhe did me the favour to admit me into the Catalogue of her Friends; yet I muſt confeſs, this rank did not altogether pleaſe me; for ſince ſhe was ranked higher in my heart, I could not be contented with that rank which I had in hers. The truth is, I flattered up my ſelf with hopes, that as ſoon as ſhe knew I loved her, ſhe would then diſtinguiſh me from the reſt; and though I know ſhe made open profeſſion never to admit of any Gallantry; yet as one is apt to flatter ones ſelf with what they love, ſo I thought that I might happily be excepted out of that general ral rule: So as not being able to endure this cruel incertainty, I reſolved to diſcover my paſſion unto her, and I reſolved upon it, after I had ſpent a whole day with her in extream melancholy; for I was perſwaded that all her friends would at other times be ſo much about her, that I could not find a fitter opportunity: So as I ſtaying the laſt with her, I began to ſpeak unto her, and deſired her to tell me whether I was as much in her heart that day as I had been in her Chamber? Doubtleſs you are, replied ſhe, as all my friends are: Oh, Madam (ſaid I) there is no juſtice I ſhould be thronged with ſuch a croud of friends in your heart, ſince you are ſingle and alone in mine; and therefore, Madam, I muſt either be excluded out of your heart, or elſe all thoſe men you croud with me in it, muſt: For otherwiſe I muſt confeſs, that I cannot be at any reſt there: Alas, Madam, continued I, and would not give her time to anſwer me, it is extream injuſtice to mix me with them, for I am not of their rank, nor are my thoughts like theirs: Indeed, I am ſo far from entertaining you (as ſome of them do) with my ambition, that I do declare the height of my ambition is to be loved by you; I am ſo far from telling you of any Intrigues and Cabals (like theirs) that I will never be of any, in which you are not: I have ſo little to do with domeſtick buſineſs and cares, that I never think of any but what you have cauſed in me, and ſo far am I from talking of any love which I bear unto others, that I can talk of nothing but my love to you: And therefore Madam, I beſeech you judge whether it be juſt you ſhould rank me amongſt ſuch men as nothing reſemble me? Doubtleſs it is not (replied ſhe and ſmiled) for if you be ſuch as you ſay, I muſt exclude you from my heart, and admit another in your room; for it were not juſt (added ſhe by way of raillary) that I ſhould baniſh a hundred out of it to admit of one, but much better it is to baniſh the one and keep the hundred, and therefore Meriontes, it is in your own choice; if you be my friend, (as I ever thought you) be quiet in my heart, as all the reſt of my friends are, but if you be not, take it not ill if I do exclude you: However, ſince I do not well underſtand you, nor will take ſo much pains as to examine whether what you ſay be true, I will believe you upon your word.

Since it is ſo, Madam, replied I, I beſeech you believe that I am not only your friend, but your Lover alſo; for I profeſs, that I am not able to live in ſuch a preſs of friends. Since it is ſo (ſaid ſhe) you muſt out of my heart, and you would do me a pleaſure, if you would drive me out of yours; for ſince I am there alone, it is very likely, conſidering my humour, I ſhall be very weary of being there. Madam, (ſaid I unto her) you anſwer me with ſo little ſeriouſneſs, that I beſeech you neither look upon me as your Lover nor as your Friend. Seriouſly, replied ſhe, I know not well what to think; but Meriontes if you will believe me, you will content your ſelf with the rank of a Friend, for I muſt ingeniouſly tell you, that otherwiſe you muſt loſe me: Were it a thing which were in my own choice (anſwered I) I would chooſe rather the quality of a friend than of a Lover; for I ſee all that are under that notion are well pleaſed, ſatisfied, and at reſt: But alas, Madam, it is otherwiſe with me, and though you ſhould rank me in the firſt Sphere of your Friends, yet I muſt, whether you, or I, will or no, be your Lover, and be ſo until death: Since, Sir (replied ſhe) you may happily be miſtaken in your affection to me, and think it more than it is, I will not yet exclude you out of my heart, but will ſtay a little until you be better ſatisfied whether you are only of a temper in friendſhip ſomething different from others, ſuch a temper as being neither love nor friendſhip, yet ſo like unto both, that either name, without injuſtice, may be attributed unto either of them.

Oh, Madam (ſaid I) my affection to you is not of that nature, for I am moſt certain that friendſhip hath never any deſires, nor inquietudes, nor jealouſie in it: Oh Meriontes (ſaid ſhe unto me) I plainly ſee that you know not what a tender and gallant friendſhip is, for ſuch friends as I deſire will deſire to be loved; they will be unquiet when they have been long abſent from their friends, and be jealous to ſee any others about them. But, Madam (ſaid I unto her) ſince you cauſe jealouſie, and have ſuch abundance of friends, I wonder they ſhould not quarrel. The more you ſpeak of this tender and gallant friendſhip which I mean, Sir (replied Dorinice) the more you ſeem to be ignorant; for the jealouſie which it inſpires, is not of the ſame nature as that which Love doth cauſe, is, but on the contrary, it is a ſweet pleaſing and ingenious Spirit, which helps diſcourſe, which augments friendſhip, which is never melancholy, lumpiſh, or ſad, and which produceth no other effects but ſuch as make men more courtly, more neat, and more complaiſant, ſuch as rather makes others jealous of them than they of others: So as it may be ſaid, that the friendſhip of which I ſpeak, hath all the ſweets of Love without any of the bitters: Moreover (added ſhe) I mean not ſuch a kind of friendſhip, whereof there is not above two or three examples in a whole age; nor of ſuch men as have but one only friend in the World: The firſt of theſe muſt be able to dye for their friends, and be as full of generoſity as tender friendſhip; and as for the other, who are ſo nice and delicate, that they can find but one only in all the world, that they think worthy of their friendſhip; certainly they are neither pleaſing to themſelves nor others: For ſince they cannot be merry with any but thoſe they love, and ſince there is but one Phœnix in the world which they can find, certainly they find their diverſions very ſeldom. Nor do I require that ſolid friendſhip which is found in the grave Sages of the world, for they are too cold, too dry, and too tyring melancholy; Such men as theſe will content themſelves with loving you in the depth of their heart, with ſerving you upon extraordinary occaſions, and to ſpeak well of you when it highly concerns you, but will never tell you that they do love you: They neglect all petty Complements and duties of friendſhip, and are alwayes ſo ſerious, that they cannot endure any mirth: Yet truly my opinion is, that for the moſt part it is the trivial Civilities and Complements which makes the moſt friendſhip: As for great and high Services they are ſo rare, as it is impoſſible they ſhould both beget and nouriſh friendſhip. For ought I ſee, Madam, (replied I) the friendſhip which you deſire hath ſuch a neer reſemblance with love, that I begin to to think my ſelf more miſerable then I did imagine, and to look upon all your friends as my Rivals. Since I have friends, Sir, (replied ſhe) who are in love with ſome Ladies whom you do know, you are much miſtaken if you think them my Lovers: However, Madam, replied I, I would gladly know how you do rank all your friends; To begin (replied Dorinice) I muſt tell you, that my amorous friends are always of the loweſt rank in my heart, though I am often very much delighted to hear them tell their folly and fond adventures: And if you will name unto me any, I will ingeniouſly tell you in what degree they are in my opinion: Then tell me, Madam, ſaid I, in what Sphere you place a friend of yours, whoſe ſoul is ſo ambitious, that I think it enjoyes not one minute of reſt? As for him (ſaid ſhe) he is neither in the firſt nor laſt, but in the rank of thoſe from whom I hear many ſecrets, but whom I would not truſt with any of my own if I had any. You have another friend, Madam (replied I) who indeed is a man of much merit, but he is ſo rude and feirce, that I cannot tell what ſweetneſs his friendſhip ſhould afford you, nor in what rank you can place him, for you have none who reſembles him. I aſſure you (replied ſhe) that this fierce friend of whom you ſpeak, as irregular in friendſhip as he ſeems unto you, yet he is not one of the loweſt rank in my heart, and ſhould his fierceneſs a little mollifie, he might perhaps be in the firſt: For he does not ſeem as if he were deſirous one ſhould love him, though there be nothing more like to cauſe it, then that.

But Madam (ſaid I unto her) you have another friend whoſe name is Artimas, and who if he be not in the firſt rank, yet he will be ere long: For indeed he has all qualities that are requiſite to pleaſe, and I do obſerve that he doth already very much pleaſe you: 'Tis true (ſaid ſhe) that he whom you mention is according to your deſcription; for he his handſome, and he has a moſt excellent and pleaſing wit: He writes well both in verſe and proſe: He can be both merry and ſerious, and he began his friendſhip in the moſt ingenuous way in the world. He ſeems ſo tender, ſo ſweet, ſo civil, and ſo affable, and has ſuch an obliging way with him, as would perſwade any one he loves them better than ever he did any. Moreover, he ſeems ſo extremly glad to ſee you; he is ſo hugely ſenſible of benefits, and ſo deſirous to be loved, that one cannot chooſe but have a diſpoſition to love him: but let me tell you withal, that whether he is ſo weary of his friendſhip, or glutted with accuſtomacy of favours, or not ſenſible of them; or whether it be inconſtancy in his nature, he is ſo unequal in his amity, and ſo negligent, that though he were ungrateful,or coldly indifferent he could not be worſe than ſomtimes he is: Somtimes he will be a whole day together with you, and not ſpeak a word: He will ſee you as if he ſaw you not, and will be of ſuch a flagiſh faint ſpirit, as he will both amaze and vex any that have any intereſt in him; for nothing doth more ſurprize him then to ſee men who have held a correſpondency, become as cold and indifferent, as if they were not acquainted. Yet ſince I have not been long enough acquainted with him you ſpeak of, to paſs any definitive judgment of him;all I can ſay unto you is, that moſt infallibly he will either be in the firſt or laſt rank in my opinion: Nor can I directly tell you what place he will have in my heart, ſince that depends more upon him then me; for if he thus continue unequal and luke-warm, perhaps he will be in the loweſt rank of my friends: And if he become as he was when I firſt knew him, and not ſo troubleſome as almoſt all the young Gallants of the Court are, who thereby render themſelves incapable of any illuſtrious Conqueſt, either in Love or friendſhip, then he ſhall be in the rank of my deareſt friends.

But I beſeech you Madam (replied I) tell me more poſitively what degree is a Couſien of mine, who uſeth to viſit you oftner then any other except my ſelf: as for him (ſaid ſhe) I muſt confeſs he is in the ſame degree that you are,for indeed I ſee nothing in our friendſhip which doth now pleaſe me: The beginning was gallant, the equal was obliging, and I have obſerved him very careful to pleaſe me: He ſeems more tender and more ſenſible then he was at our firſt acquaintance: He is more glad to ſee me, and we divert our ſelves better when we talk together, then in the infancy of our friendſhip. You have alſo another friend (replied I) who loves to talk with you in private, as if he was your Lover. And I have obſerved, that when any come to you, he would always make a third: He whom you ſpeak of (replied ſhe) is none of the leaſt in my favour, for indeed it is one of the greateſt ſigns of a good wit to hold particular diſcourſe; and the greateſt proof that one can give that he is pleaſed with his friend, is to court in private: and did you know the good will I bear unto him you mean, becauſe I think he is better pleaſed when he finds me alone, then with much company, you would ſee that I do much prefer him before ſuch vapourers that are out of their element, unleſs they be in a great tumultuous company, where they muſt ſpeak loud before they can be heard, and who had rather be in the very worſt company of a Town, then ſpend an afternoon in civil diſcourſe with two or three rational perſons. Yet they are the greateſt loſers by it; for I am ſure, that commonly ſuch men get ſuch ill habits as renders them leſs amiable, and leſs inclinable to love.

But Meriontes (continued ſhe) to ſave you the labour of naming of any more, I will aſſure you that there is but you and three or four more who are in the firſt form of my friends: and as for the reſt, I imagine you will not much care for them. Why Madam (replied I) do you think that I am ſatisfied with your admitting three or four Co-equal in your heart? When you conſider (replied ſhe) that I have a hundred friends, and that I think but three or four of them your equals, me thinks you ſhould be well ſatisfied, and think your ſelf happy. Alas Madam, replied I, were I only your friend, I ſhould not be contented with it; for I am of ſuch an humour, that I would be the firſt of the four; and therefore being your Lover, I cannot eſteem my ſelf happy in my conviction with ſo many friends. To teſtifie (replied ſhe) that I will do all I can for you, I will tell you, that you are the firſt, provided you will not ſpeak any more of your pretended love. Alas Madam (replied I) I find no great ſecurity in all this, ſince you have a friend who may be in the firſt rank, and another whoſe place you know not, therefore this laſt may exclude me and all the reſt: Since I know not what is to come (anſwered ſhe) I will ſpeak of the preſent: And therefore all as I can ſay unto you is, that if he of whom you

ſpeak doth continue as he hath been of late, it is not all his merit, all his wit, nor all his handſomneſs that can obtain him the firſt rank of my friends: and I will tell you after, that of all thoſe who have any place in my friendſhip, you ſhall have the firſt rank if you will. Alas Madam (ſaid I) a Lover can never be contented with the firſt quality of a friend; and I had rather be in the loweſt rank of your Lovers, than in the higheſt of your friends. However, Meriontes (ſaid ſhe) this is all I can do; Conſider ſeriouſly upon it, for if you ſhould refuſe the firſt rank of my friends, perhaps I ſhall become your Enemy: As I was ready to anſwer, one came in, and ſaid her Mother did ask for her: So that I left her, not accepting the quality of her firſt friend, and ſhe not permitting me to be her Lover.

Yet ſince I had diſcovered my paſſion, my heart was ſomething more at eaſe: And my greateſt hope was, in knowing certainly that Dorinice did hold me in the notion of friendſhip, ſo as imagining it not impoſſible but her affection might change its nature, and believing it a more eaſie ſtep from friendſhip to love, then from indifferency unto that paſſion, my hopes did keep life in them: So as I paſſed over ſome days without any great inquietude, thinking it but fit I ſhould give Dorinice ſome time of conſideration before I could expect any recompence: Yet there was not a day in which this multitude of her friends did not perplex me, and in which I did not fear that this which ſome of them called friendſhip, may be called by the name of Love: and indeed I underſtood at laſt, that there were at leaſt two Lovers in this diſguiſe of friendſhip: So that with jealouſie and love together, I had many a vexatious hour. Yet after I had well obſerved theſe concealed Rivals, I was not ſo jealous of them, as of ſome other of her friends: Not but that one of them was very handſome, and likely to prove a very dangerous Rival, for his perſon was very pleaſing, and he had a delicate wit: and ſince his firſt affection was unto a perſon of great merit and wit, this did infuſe ſuch a politeneſs into his converſation, as made him ſo accompliſhed as he was; for it is moſt certain that nothing is more pernicious unto young men, then firſt to engage themſelves in Love with fooliſh perſons: and indeed, this ſecond Rival made this apparent which I ſpeak, for he was better born than the other, alſo he had wit and ſpirit enough: and yet it was his misfortune to fall at firſt into intimacy and familiary with many women of mean merit, who were unfaſhionable, and knew not the world, ſo as he blaſted his wit by their ſociety, and did inſenſibly accuſtome himſelf, to be ſuch a one as his company were, ſo as I had no cauſe to fear him: And for the other, though he had wit, merit, and manners enough, yet I did not fear him neither; becauſe Dorinice ſuſpecting him in Love with her, did treat him worſe then the reſt of her friends. I ſaw alſo very clearly that theſe two Rivals had not ſo great a part as my ſelf in the heart of this faire one; for ſhe was pleaſed to tell me what they ſaid unto her: But as for her friends, ſhe would not impart the leaſt ſyllable of what they ſaid, though I vowed ſhe was moſt abſolute Miſtreſs of my heart, and told her, that though generoſity required that I ſhould never reveal the ſecrets of my friends, yet ſhe had ſuch a power over me, that I could not keep my own: But this aggravation of my Love cauſed a great quarrel the next day; for be pleaſed to know Sir, that both of us meeting the day following in a place where one of the Ladies, who formerly I loved was with much other company, Dorinice very craftily began to talk of the power which a Miſtreſs hath over the heart of her Lover: and hearing that ſome reports of my paſſion were divulged in our Court, ſhe would needs be ſo pleaſant as to twit me with it. And to that end ſhe told me very openly, that as I was talking the day before with her, I ſaid, that as ſoon as ever I became a Lover, I would ſacrifice all my own, and my friends ſecrets unto my Miſtreſs, and that I had already told her all the paſſages of my firſt Love: So as being driven to the neceſſity either of contradicting what ſhe, whom I then loved, had ſaid, or elſe diſpleaſing her whom I loved not, I made choice of the latter, and would rather anger my old Miſtreſs then my new one; yet I turned the matter as well as I could: Indeed I ſaid (replied I unto Dorinice) that when one is in Love, one hath nothing which is their own: but I did nor ſay I would relate the ſecrets of friends and former loves unto my Miſtreſs; what I ſaid was this, that if ſhe would needs know them, and command me peremptorily ro tell them, I ſhould have much ado to diſobey her. Yet (replied one of Dorinice friends who always told her every thing) I do not think that ought to be; for if I did, I would never tell any thing unto my friends: For my part (ſaid the Lady whom I loved) I think he is a perfidious Lover, who reveals the ſecrets of his friend unto his Miſtreſs, and that ſhe is an unworthy Miſtreſs who ſhall deſire it.

For my particular (replied a friend of Dorinice's whoſe name was Nirtile unto whom ſhe made a ſign to contradict that Lady whom I loved) I do not underſtand your meaning, but I am ſure that the greateſt ſweetneſs of love is the abſolute empire of a Lovers heart: and if I had one who ſhould conceal any thing from me which I deſired to know, I would never look upon him again; for he did not love me, if he did not blindly obey me, right or wrong: and I would not only have a Lover tell the ſecrets of his friends, but I would alſo have him commit an unjuſt act if I ſhould command him: he may as well do the laſt (replied a friend of Dorinice's, whoſe name was Oxaris) as reveal the ſecrets of his friends, which of all things in the world ought moſt inviolably to be kept: and for my part, who does not think that Juſtice and generoſity are incompatible with love, I cannot think it allowable to be perfidious, but am ſo much againſt it, that had I a Miſtreſs who would exact this teſtimony of my Love; I ſhould no longer eſteem her, and conſequently be no longer her Lover, and ſo ſhould never tell her my friends ſecrets.

Did you know what Love was (replied I) you would not have ſaid ſo: For though a Miſtreſs ſhould command unjuſt things, yet for all that one cannot leave loving her for it: For if Love were a thing voluntary, it would of neceſſity follow that all the world would love none but admirable perſons, ſuch as there is not perhaps three in a whole Kingdom, and in a whole age: And there would be ſuch a croud about them, that there would be no approaching: Yet experience ſhews us every day, that there are men of great wits, parts, and ſpirits, who fall in love with perſons that have faults, and faults which they know of, and which yet will not cure their paſſions. I know very well (replied Oxaris ſharply) that one may find his Miſtreſs a little pale, or a little ſwarthy Complectioned, and yet not leave loving her; and one may know that there is ſome unequality in her humour, and ſome levity in her ſpirit, and yet not change, yet I cannot underſtand how one ſhould continue loving a Woman without honeſty and vertue. And I dare boldly affirm, that the perſon who reveals the ſecrets of his friends, is as great an offender againſt the rules of vertue and honeſty, as any Traytor is; and there is nothing in the world more odious than to betray thoſe who truſt them. Were I to judge only of the thing it ſelf (replied Nirtile) I ſhould condemn it: But however, I muſt needs affirm, that if a man be in love, and will not tell his Miſtreſs all he knows if ſhe deſire it, he does but love by halves; for he is not ſo much obliged in point of honour, to conceal the ſecrets of his friends, as he is in point of love to tell his Miſtreſs what ſhe deſires to know: For he is not to examine whether her deſires be juſt or no, but to give her a teſtimony of his love, he is to obey her blindly; ſince there is no greater than that of obedience, and without obedience there is no love nor delight in loving

For my part, (replied my former Miſtreſs) I know not how to comprehend this; and for my part (replied Oxaris) I ſee no reaſon in it: For I beſeech you (ſaid he unto Dorinice, though he did not diſpute the matter with her) may there not be many juſt cauſes of ceaſing to love: Doubtleſs there may (replied ſhe:) if ſo (replied he) why is it more juſt, that jealouſie ſhould make love die, than when you diſcover your Miſtreſs is not truly vertuous; as ſhe is not,if ſhe would have you perfidious;is there not much more reaſon to break off with her for that, then becauſe ſhe did caſt an eye a little favourably upon a Rival? ſhould I look upon you as a Philoſopher: you have reaſon for what you ſay (anſwers Nirtile) but when I look upon you as a Lover, I cannot think you ought to deny your Miſtreſs any thing. Truth is, if you deny her any thing that is unjuſt, you are to be looked upon as a wiſe man, whoſe paſſions are all in his own command.

But for all that, the Lady who required the injuſtice from you, will charge you with being a bad Lover: For though ſhe be in the wrong, to deſire any thing that is unreaſonable, however you have no reaſon to deny her, and you can expect nothing, unleſs whilſt your friends do ſay you are diſcreet, your Miſtreſs will ſay you know not how to love. The beſt of it is (replied I) not to grieve the Lady too much with whom I had a former correſpondency.) There are but few Ladies who are ſo unjuſt, or who will trouble themſelves with knowing a thouſand trifles which they have nothing to do withal.

For my part (replied Dorinice very maliciouſly) were I in the humour of having a Lover, my chief delight would be in making him relate all paſſages of his paſt love. As for the ſecrets of his friends, I would not deſire to know them: but as for trifles of Gallantry which are ſuch fond follies when they are paſt, and ſeem always ſo to them who have no intereſt in them, I ſhould take the greateſt pleaſure in the world in hearing them exactly related unto me: and if any reaſon induce me to admit of a Lover, I think it will be in hopes of this delight, in which I fancy ſuch great diverſion: And if I do make choice of a Lover, it ſhall be of ſuch a one who hath loved many others; for though they ſay firſt paſſions are moſt violent, yet I would not be his firſt Miſtreſs, leſt I ſhould loſe the pleaſures which I mentioned before. If, Madam, the knowledg of many ſecrets do ſo much delight one (replied I) then if you ſhould admit of a Lover who were of Nirtiles humour, he would have a fine time of it, if you ſhould reveal all the ſecrets of your friends unto him: You, I ſay, who has ſuch a multitude of them, that they can hardly be numbred. I cannot tell whether you jeer me in this or no,(replied ſhe and ſmiled) but I conceive the greateſt commendations that can be given me is, that I have ſo much wit as to get and keep ſo many friends: But, Madam, (ſaid I unto her to turn the diſcourſe) do you think it any honour in admitting ſo many of them? and do you believe that under colour of this gallant kind of friendſhip you ought to have a thouſand at a time? if ſo, I muſt needs confeſs that I think it a great conveniency for a Lover to have many Miſtreſſes, as for a Lady to have many Gallants. I am ſo fully perſwaded (replied Dorinice) that one may have as many friends as they will, that I look upon my friendſhip as a thing infinite: and when I have purchaſed any new friend, and paid him my friendſhip for it, after the rate that I think he eſteems me, yet I find my ſelf as rich within a quarter of an hour after, as if I had given him nothing for it: Then I perceive (ſaid I unto her) that it is not according to merit that you grant your affection. No, (replied ſhe) merit is the meaſure of my eſteem, and friendſhip the meaſure of my friendſhip, and thus I aſſure you I uſe to diſtribute my ſelf very equally.

For my particular (replied I) I cannot conceive that one can much love ſuch a number of men, nor know how any man can content himſelf with the hundred part of a heart; for if I had not a whole one, I ſhould never think my ſelf happy. Then you ſhall never have one (replied Dorinice and ſmiled) for I will never give all mine unto one man. After which, ſhe riſing up, and I going with her, I complained againſt her for her malice, and afterwards in a low voice uſed all my Rhetorick to perſwade her unto a permiſſion of my paſſion: But all to no purpoſe, and all my arguments and perſwaſions could obtain no more from her, than the firſt of her friends: ſo as ſeeing no other remedy, I would try, if I could content my ſelf with that rank ſhe gave me in her heart: And indeed, I muſt needs ſay, that Dorinice was as good as her promiſe unto me, and I had no cauſe to think that ſhe was more favourable unto any friend than unto me: For ſhe ſpake to me with much confidence, ſhe was always very glad to ſee me, ſhe diſcourſed with delight, and ſhe would ſincerely give me her opinion in any thing we talked of. Moreover, ſhe did intereſt her ſelf in my fortune; If I were ſick, ſhe would ſend conſtantly to ſee how I did: if by chance I were two days from her, ſhe would have me tell her what I had been doing: She took my part always ever againſt her deareſt friends: ſhe would highly commend me: ſhe would have all her acquaintance eſteem me, and was every way very obliging. So as it may be ſaid, that I enjoyed all the ſweets and pleaſures of a moſt ſolid, tender, and gallant friendſhip.

ſhip. Yet all this while I was nothing contented, and the moſt favourable looks of Dorinice, made me more angry than pleaſed; for though I never ſaw her eyes incenſed, yet I could never ſee them as I deſired: The truth is, ſhe looked upon me, as people uſe to look upon all indifferent objects which are in their ſight; her eyes were all tranquility, and I could never ſee in them the leaſt languiſhing glance which is the true character of Love.

I never ſaw them troubled, tranſported, or paſſionate; they had no language of Love in them, nor did they underſtand me when mine ſpoke in that Dialect: So as I could never think my ſelf happy.

Moreover, though ſhe was always gladder when I talked with her, than any other of her friends, yet I could never perceive that my converſation made any deep impreſſion; for if any, who had any private buſineſs, came unto her, ſhe would leave me to talk with him, and leave me without any regret: alſo be at ſeveral diverſions wherein I had no ſhare without any inquietudes, and all the priviledg I had by being her firſt friend was, that ſhe would ſometimes be a little freer with me than with others, and knowing that I did love her, though I did not often tell her ſo, ſhe uſed all ways imaginable to make me believe, that her Amity would never be any other than Amity, and indeed ſhe did ſo well perſwade me of it, that I thought my ſelf the moſt miſerable man alive. So as not being able to contain my ſelf any longer, I fell into a continual courſe of complaints, and complained ſo much that I was troubleſome unto her: And the very truth is, my complaints were excuſable, for there is nothing upon Earth more intollerable than to be extreamly in Love with one who returns only friendſhip: And there is no compariſon to be made between that miſery, and to love without being loved again: For in this caſe one is perpetually near a happineſs, and never is like to enjoy it, and all ſervices are to no end further than what one already knows, which can never give any content, for it is a moſt undoubted truth, that the moſt fervent friendſhip in the world, is not comparable to the loweſt degree of Love: Yet Dorinice would needs one day perſwade me, that my complaints were unjuſt, for (ſaid ſhe) were my affection to you of another nature than it is, I ſhould do leſs for you than I do: I ſhould think, Madam, (ſaid I unto her) that in doing leſs, you did more, and I am ſo confident of what I ſay, that I ſhould think my ſelf more happy if I could ſee you ſometimes turn away your fair eyes for fear of meeting mine, than to ſee them ſo full of tranquility as they are; and to ſhew you how little my Love is ſatisfied with your friendſhip, I do declare unto you, Madam, that your indifferency would be much leſs intollerable: This is ſo very fantaſtical (replied ſhe) that I almoſt think you are out of your wits; were you in love, Madam, but one quarter of an hour, (replied I) you would quickly find that the moſt miſerable condition of a Lover. is to be perſwaded that he muſt never be loved; ſo that, Madam, beginning to think that it is an eaſier ſtep from indifferency unto Love, than that a long continued friendſhip ſhould become that paſſion, you need not wonder I ſhould think my ſelf the moſt miſerable of men, in that I ſee all my Love, all my Cares, and all my Services can never alter the nature of your affection to me. And yet, Madam, methinks it is ſo eaſie a matter for you to make me happy, that I know no reaſon why you do not: For I am contented you ſhould love me leſs than you do, ſo you will but love me in another manner, and otherwiſe it is impoſſible I ſhould ever be ſatisfied, for Love is never ſatisfied but with Love again, and all your tender, gallant, and ſolid friendſhip is not comparable to the loweſt degree of that paſſion, and therefore I beſeech you judge, whether it be likely to ſatisfie the moſt violent paſſion that ever was: for all this (replied Dorinice) I muſt tell you again, that if I ſhould love in that manner as you mean, you would be leſs happy than you are; for now I ſhew you all the tenderneſs of my heart, I communicate my very ſoul unto you, and I have a thouſand obliging cares for you; whereas if I ſhould love you as you deſire I ſhould, I ſhould then conceal all the tenderneſs of my thoughts from you, I ſhould make choice of the moſt indifferent words to expreſs my affection to you, and I ſhould ſhun the place where you are, and therefore I pray judge whether you would not be more miſerable in my Love than in my Friendſhip: And to tell you truly, it is my Friendſhip unto which you are beholding, for this my indulgency in ſuffering you to ſpeak thus unto me of your paſſion, for did I not perceive the conſtitution of my heart ſuch, as it is impoſſible I ſhould ever love you in any other manner, I ſhould never ſuffer you.

Oh, Madam, (ſaid I) this is the extremity of cruelty; how ignorant are you in the ſweets of Love, and of being loving, a hundred and a hundred thouſand friends cannot afford one ſingle guſt of it. I beſeech you conſider, that you have not an abſolute power over any one of your friends; there is not one of them but are able to deny you ſomething: Whereas your power over me is abſolute without any exception, you are Miſtreſs of my Deſtiny, you can frame all my good fortune, and all my bad, and you have ſuch an abſolute Empire in my heart, that you muſt reign in it as long as you live. But, Madam, to reign with delight, you muſt take ſome care for the preſervation of your authority: Caſt off therefore, Madam, this multitude of friends, amongſt all which, perhaps there is not one who truly merits the name of friend, or are really worthy of your friendſhip: But if you will not rid your ſelf of this croud which are troubleſome both to you and me, yet I beſeech you make ſome difference in your Love betwixt me and them, for I do affect ſingularity ſo much in matter of affection, that I cannot endure to be loved in the ſame degree with others. Put ſome difference, I beſeech you, Madam, betwixt me and your friends, and know that if you do not, I muſt infallibly either loſe my life, or my reaſon and wits, for I am moſt certain I can never loſe that affection which I have unto you.

Methinks Meriontes, (ſaid ſhe unto me) that in telling you I eſteem you as the chief of my friends, and ſo diſtinguiſh you, that this ſhould content you: Alas, Madam, (replied I) though you ſhould tell me that I am your only friend, and though I am a Lover of Singularity, yet ſhould I not be contented; for your affection is ſtill friendſhip, and before I can be ſatisfied, your friendſhip muſt either become Love, or my Love friendſhip, and therefore ſince it is an eaſier matter to add ſome degree gree of heat unto your affection, than it is to quench the flames of mine, I beſeech you, and conjure you to ſtrive a little to love me in another manner than you do.

But Meriontes, (ſaid ſhe unto me) do you not conſider that if I ſhould love you as you deſire, you ſhall receive no favours from me? and that I cannot be ſo indulgent to you as now I am, for I ſee you, and I talk as long as you pleaſe: Yes, Madam, (replied he ſharply) you do ſee me, and you do talk with me; but you do them not with the ſame joy which you would, if you loved me as I deſire: There wants that mutual exchange of pleaſures which does nouriſh and augment Love, and which is the chief felicity of Lovers. And therefore, Madam, only out of curioſity, I beſeech you try the difference between Love and Friendſhip, and do not deprive your ſelf of life's greateſt delight, by making me the moſt miſerable of men.

Yet all theſe intimations in the ſweets of Love unto Dorinice were to no purpoſe, for, Sir, ſhe was unalterable, and I could not obtain the leaſt hope of ever changing her mind: So I was in a moſt miſerable condition, nor could I make any appeal to the Judges and Laws of Love, becauſe they were eſtabliſhed only for ſuch as do or did love one another, and I being the only party that ever loved, I could not have any remedy from them. Yet was I not able to incloſe all my ſorrows in my heart, but complained in ſuch a ſad manner unto Dorinice's friend whoſe name was Nirtile, that I did mollifie her heart,and moved her to ſpeak in my behalf unto her friend.

And as they were walking one day in a Garden, ſhe ſevered her from the reſt of Company, and told her ſhe did not well to mix me among the number of her other friends, and that ſhe had no reaſon to entertain ſuch a croud of them as ſhe did. For truly, (ſaid Nirtile to her) my humour is ſuch that I had rather make choice of ſome man of accompliſhed parts, than to love a hundred or two. Alas Nirtile, (ſaid ſhe then unto her) can you think I do love all thoſe who term themſelves my friends? I cannot tell (anſwered Nirtile) but you ſeem as if you did, and as if you thought them all the moſt faithful, and ſincere friends in the world.

The truth is (anſwered Dorinice) I am juſt unto all my friends, for I know how to diſtinguiſh betwixt thoſe who viſit me out of vanity, or for intereſt, or out of cuſtom, or out of inclination: And I have unto thoſe who love me, ſuch a kind of civility, as befits ſuch as are to be eſteemed; for if I had not, I ſhould deprive my ſelf of a thouſand delights, which the converſation of ſuch men afforded me but for all that, I only love thoſe who love me very well, and I am able to make it my boaſt, that I am the juſteſt perſon in the world unto all thoſe who uſe to ſee me. You muſt except Meriontes Madam, (replied Nirtile) for certainly he has no reaſon to be pleaſed with you.

Perhaps he hath more reaſen then you imagine, (replied ſhe) for I aſſure you, I have been ſtriving as much as I could theſe two months together, either to love him as he would be, or elſe to hate him: The one half of this had been enough to have told me (replied Nirtile;) doubtleſs it had (replied ſhe) but I could not unleſs I had lied; for the truth is, Meriontes doth every day move me unto both thoſe thoughts, though they be very oppoſite to each other: When I look upon his reſtleſs inquitude, and conſider his merit, his affection, and my own friendſhip to him, I wiſh I were able to make him happy by loving him as he deſires: But on the other ſide, when he ſmothers me with his complaints, upbraids me with my many friends, and permittance of many Lovers, this unjuſt perſecution makes me deſire to hate him, and yet I find an equal impoſſibility in both; and therefore I muſt remain as I am, and if he be not contented, I cannot help it.

However Madam (ſaid Nirtile to her) though you cannot love him, yet I beſeech you be leſs friendly unto others, and leſſen the number of ſuch friends as do ſo neerly reſemble Lovers, that truly I wonder Meriontes doth not look upon them as Rivals. Nay, as for that Nirtile, (replied Dorinice) indeed I cannot do it, and to tell you truly, that was as much as I could do, did I love Meriontes? for theſe kind of trivial amities of gallantry do render converſation ſo agreeable, and ſo ſweetly amuſe the mind, without diſquieting the heart, as I cannot part with one of them.

Truly Madam (replied Nirtile) you are very unreaſonable. I know not (ſaid Dorinice) whether I be unreaſonable; but I cannot think it any imprudence; for as I do behave my ſelf, I do enjoy a thouſand pleaſures without hazarding my reputation. and I do enjoy them without any inquietudes of melancholy, and thereſore I pray tell Meriontes, (if he did intereſt you to ſpeak unto me) that his beſt courſe is to reſt in quiet, and to let me reſt ſo alſo. For it were a moſt cruel thing that one, who enjoyes all the delights of innocent gallantry, ſhould expoſe her ſelf unto all the perſecutions of Love, when ſhe is not capable of that paſſion.

After this Nirtile had no more to ſay, but as one that was very ſincere, ſhe told me the next morning all the diſcourſe, with intention to perſwade me, either to comply with the humour of Dorinice, or to quench my flames of Love, but to tell you truly, I could do neither.

In the mean time, the ſeaſon of the year came on, in which we were wont to celebrate a great feaſt of thanks, unto the gods for ſeparating us from the ancient Sauromates this was the time when Dorinice's croud of friends did more perplex me then uſual, for ſhe was continually taken up with ſome piece of courtſhip or other, ſo as I may ſay, I ſaw her and ſaw her not; and to my grief I obſerved every day an addition of new friends which others brought unto her: And as ſoon as the admirable Sapho came into our Court, Phaon, and the brother of Phylire were alſo admitted into the number of her friends. I wiſhed that I could make my ſelf as many friends as ſhe did, to try if any ſuch delight could be found in a multitude, but it was impoſſible for me; yet I ſaw Sapho and Agelaſte very often, and complained of my miſery unto them; for my paſſion was grown ſo publick, that every one knew of it; And truly I muſt needs confeſs, I found much comfort from them; for both of them did ſo penetrate into the depth of my thoughts, that I perceived they knew them as well as my ſelf. And ſince they did not think it expedient to flatter me, they ingeniouſly told me, that they did not think ſo ancient a friendſhip as that of Dorinice unto me, could ever become love, ſo Sir, knowing Sapho to be one, who knew every one that came into her company, the ſooneſt and moſt perfectly of any one in the world; I grounded as much upon what ſhe ſaid as if ſhe had been one who could infallibly tell the future fate of things: And though I found much comfort in complaining unto her againſt the unalterable coldneſs of Dorinices heart; yet ſhe made me much more miſerable, by telling me her thoughts. But in the confidence that I had in the depth of her wiſdome, I deſired her ſhe would be pleaſed to take ſo much pains as to ſound the depth of Dorinices mind, and to tell me then her opinion; ſo as I obliged her to promiſe me her beſt endeavour, and to report unto me the truth of her imaginations: And after ſhe had held much diſcourſe with Dorinice ſeveral times: After a ſerious conſideration of her behaviour, and after extraordinary pains to know her throughly, and had ſpoken of me unto her with much affection; ſhe told me that there was no hopes that Dorinice would ever change her mind; and that if I could not be contented with being the firſt of her friends, ſhe would adviſe me to be no longer her Lover. Alas Madam (ſaid I unto her) it is not the quality of Dorinice's friend can ever ſatisfie me: and yet were I the only one who had that title, perhaps I ſhould preſerve all my Love unto her, provided ſhe beſtowed all her friendſhip upon me: But Madam, ſhe adds every day unto the number of her frieeds, and therefore ſince Dorinice cannot love me, nor let me have her intire friendſhip, I muſt endeavour to quench my flames: For it is not poſſible I ſhould long continue loving one whoſe ſoul is ſo rocky, that ſhe had rather make me miſerable, than part from the leaſt of her friends: And ſince I am not able to leave loving her as long as I ſee her, I muſt quit my Country. Sapho honouring me with her friendſhip, did at the firſt oppoſe my deſign: But at laſt, ſhe ſaw I was ſo miſerable that ſhe confeſſed baniſhment would be more ſweet unto me, then Dorinice's preſence. Yet ſince ſhe would not omit any thing which might conduce unto my tranquility, ſhe brought it ſo to paſs by the negotiation and diſcretion of Phaon, that though the Judges appointed for the determination of all differences in Love, could not by their Law meddle with any thing but ſuch as paſſed between perſons who had once contracted affection, yet they would take cogniſance of this difference between Dorinice and me. At the firſt it did much incenſe her: but ſince Sapho procured the Queen to countenance the matter by her Authority, ſhe was forced to put in her anſwer, and I alſo preferred my Complaint before the Judges.

Then they began to put ſeveral queſtions of much curioſity, for they asked whether a Lover could content himſelf with the friendſhip of one, who did not love any other? They asked alſo whether a Lover had any reaſon to be jealous of the friends unto his Miſtreſs? and whether theſe two things were a cauſe of legal complaint, and a juſt reaſon to change affection? Time will not allow me Sir, to particularize the whole matter unto you who have no intereſt in it: But give me leave to tell you in ſhort, that after ſerious conſideration of theſe two queſtions, the judges ſaid, that as to the firſt it was out of all doubt, that friendſhip could never come in compariſon with Love, nor give it ſatisfaction: And they declared that a Lover might accuſe his Miſtreſs of ingratitude, and complain as of a high piece of injuſtice, if ſhe do not anſwer his affection with an affection of the ſame nature. For beſides (ſay they) that Love is a paſſion which in all things requires equality of hearts. They ſaid further, that a Lover can never be in ſecurity as long as his Miſtreſs is only his friend; ſince he is in danger every moment to ſee her fall in love with another: So as they declared that I had good reaſon not to be ſatisfied with the friendſhip of Dorinice.

Afterwards they ſaid, that as to the ſecond thing in queſtion, That jealouſie was of ſo large an extent, that poſſibly it might be ſo, as one might be jealous without any Rivals, ſince one might be jealous of any thing, which too much took up the heart of the perſon loved; and (ſaid he who reported the opinion of the aſſembly) ſince one is not ſo jealous of thoſe thoughts which others have of the Lady whom one loves, as they are of thoſe thoughts which ſhe hath of others, it follows, that one may be jealous of any thing which engageth her heart any manner of way: If ſhe affect any ſolitude too much, a Lover may without extravagancy be a little jealous: Judg therefore I beſeech you then, ſince Dorinice having a hundred friends who may become her Lovers, or who at leaſt take up a great part of her heart, and who fill up her time ſo, that Meriontes can hardly ever ſpeak unto her: Whether, I ſay, ſuch a Lover hath not reaſon to entertain ſome thoughts which may be termed jealouſie, and whether he have not reaſon to complain of her, ſince ſhe is ſo eternally taken up with her friends, and ſuch friends as ſo nearly reſemble Lovers, that one may eaſily miſtake the one for the other.

As ſoon as this was ſaid, a friend of Dorinice's, who pretended unto the firſt Rank, ſtood up, and ſaid that it was great injuſtice to think friends could be jealous: That this was the way to violate all the priviledges of friendſhip, which of all things upon earth ought to be moſt inviolable: And that it would put a great diſorder and confuſion amongſt all men, if Love and Friendſhip ſhould be declared incompatible; for as Friendſhip cannot be without Love, ſo Love and Friendſhip may conſiſt together.

Then he inſtanced many examples out of antiquity, to make it appear that one may be a zealous Lover, and a zealous Friend both at one time: And amongſt the reaſt that of Achilles, who though extreamly in love with Briſeis, yet loved Patroclus with abundance of tenderneſs: And after this, he deſired it might be declared, that Dorinice might admit of as many friends as ſhe pleaſed, without being ſubject unto any complaints againſt her: But, Sir, after this friend of Dorinices had had ſaid all he could, and after I had anſwered all his objections againſt me, the Judges ordained, that Dorinice ſhould make her choice, either to anſwer my affection with the like: Or if ſhe could not, and would yet preſerve me, to exclude all the reſt of her friends, to the end I might ſolely remain in her heart: declaring, that if ſhe would do neither of theſe two, I might lawfully quit her without inconſtancy, or being accuſed of ingratitude. So, Sir, Dorinice being unable either to love me, or renounce that multitude of friends which diverted her, ſhe publickly declared that ſhe was ſo far from doing either of theſe two things, as ſhe was fully reſolved upon two other things quite contrary:

For (ſaid ſhe) I am reſolved never to love as long as I live, neither will I fail to admit of more new friends. You may eaſily imagine Sir, how this cruel Declaration of Dorinice's went to my heart: But that which finiſhed my deſpair was, that ſhe ſent unto me ſhe would never ſee me any more, and yet the very ſame day ſhe ſent this rigorous meſſage, ſhe admitted of two freſh friends: So as reſolving upon abſence, I employed the illuſtrious Sapho to obtain a licenſe from the Queen, to go out of her Dominions: And ſo I did, without bidding adieu unto any, but Sapho, Agelaſte, and Phaon.

As ſoon as I had paſſed thoſe Deſarts which environ our Country, I came into the Territories of the ancient Sauromates, where I found Troops ready to depart, which Aripithes had levied for Thomyris: So as I conceiving War the beſt remedy againſt Love, I followed them without any other deſign but to forget Dorinice. But though I am not able to do it, yet I am ſo fully reſolved never to ſee her again, that I will voluntarily baniſh my ſelf for ever out of the moſt pleaſant Country in the world. But, Sir, if you will be pleaſed to give me leave to devote my ſelf inſeparably unto your ſervice, I ſhall hope for more tranquility and ſatisfaction than ever I had: And my joyes in finding ſuch an illuſtrious Protector, will be above my ſorrows for the loſs of an unjuſt Miſtreſs.

Meriontes having ended his Relation and his Complement, Cyrus returned a very obliging anſwer unto this illuſtrious Sauromate After which entring into deep Cogitations of his paſt misfortunes and preſent miſeries, he ſpake little all the reſt of the day. But night being come, and all things ready, Cyrus entred into this cloſe Coach with Meliantes; and Meriontes being their Convoy, they got out by the favour of the night, none obſerving that Cyrus was in the Coach: And as they got well out of the Camp, ſo they arrived at the Tents Royal; and as good luck for Cyrus was, the Tent of Meliantes being one of the very firſt, Cyrus was preſently in a place where none could ſee him unleſs Meliantes would, and where it was unlikely any would ſeek for him; for his death was ſo generally believed on all ſides, that it was divulged over all places in the world. The Grecians which were in the Army writ into Greece; the Perſians ſent unto Perſepolis; the Medes made it known in Media; Intaphernes writ into Pontus and Bythinia; the Aſſirians ſent into Babylon; Thraſimedes writ it into Lycia; Ligdamis unto Epheſus; Myrſiles unto Sardis, and ſo all the reſt into their ſeveral Countries: And the noiſe of his death was ſo univerſally divulged in all remote places, and ſo generally believed, that many excellent Hiſtories were deceived by the miſtake, and Hiſtorians have left this ſuppoſed death of Cyrus in their Hiſtories, as true, though the truth is, it was the unfortunate Spitridates who loſt his life, and paſſed for this illuſtrious Conqueror.

In the mean time, Feraulas in this general belief of Cyrus his death, endeavoured all manner of waies to find out his Corps: And having many friends ſince the time that Cyrus was there under the name of Artamenes, he employed all their helps in the diſcovery: But in his queſt of one thing, he diſcovered another, which made him extreamly joyed; for he underſtood by accident, that the Gelon Captain who preſented the head of Spitridates unto Thomyris, as the head of Cyrus, did endeavour to ſell thoſe rich Arms of gold which that unfortunate Prince did wear the laſt day of his life, and which Cyrus gave unto him after his Combate with Aripithes: So as Feraulas knowing that Cyrus wore a very common ſuit of Arms that day, he concluded, that of neceſſity it muſt be the head of Spitridates which Thomyris plunged in Blood, and not of Cyrus: So as much hope and joy began to revive in his ſoul, and ſo as the death of Spitridates, which before made him full of ſorrow, now filled him full of joy.

On the other ſide, as ſoon as Cyrus was got ſafe into the Tent of Meliantes, where Meriontes was cloſe concealed with him, Meliantes began to contrive waies for his deliverance; and yet he would not be ſeen in two daies, leſt his counterfeit ſickneſs ſhould be ſuſpected: And during theſe two daies, Meriontes and he did bethink themſelves whether there was any poſſibility of releaſing ſing Mandana, as well as Cyrus: For ſince there was many Sauromates in the Army of Thomyris, who ſince the death of their Prince, had no affection unto that Princeſs, they thought it no hard buſineſs to move them unto a mutiny. And ſince it was Meriontes who had commanded them under Aripithes, it was moſt fit for him to negotiate with the reſt of the Captains over thoſe Forces. So as Meliantes and he communicating their thoughts unto Cyrus, he did ſo concur with them, that he deſired them to endeavour the execution of this deſign, before they thought any more of getting him out of the Tents Royal. And truly ſaid he unto them, if you can bring the buſineſs unto that paſs, as that there muſt be any fighting for Mandana, I will be there in perſon, and not be a debtor unto your valour only for her liberty.

That which did further the deſign of Meriontes was, that there were many Sauromatian Captains in the Tents Royal, who ſtaid there to ask the leave of Thomyris for their departure. So that to loſe no time, after Meliantes had kept in two daies to diſguiſe his ſickneſs, he went out; and ſounding the minds of the Sauromatian Captains, who were all intimate friends unto Meriontes, he found their pulſes to beat according to his wiſhes: So as obliging them very handſomly to come one Evening unto his Tent, he let them ſee Meriontes, unto whom they did as much vow their obedience, as unto their Prince, expreſſing ſo much deſire to revenge his death, as they wiſhed Cyrus were living, that they might fight under his Banners: Yet Meriontes did not think it expedient to tell them that their wiſhes were accompliſhed, until their deſign was riper: But he deſired them to diſpoſe the minds of their Souldiers, ſo as they might obey them upon any occaſion whatſoever, aſſuring them, that if they did make themſelves Maſters of their Troops, he would very ſhortly give them a brave occaſion to ſignalize their valours, to revenge the death of Aripithes, to get much glory, and to enrich themſelves if they would. After which, ſome of them returned to the Camp, to do as Meriontes deſired them, and the reſt ſtaid ſtill to confer about the correſpondency betwixt Meriontes and them

After this, Cyrus being acquainted with the promiſes of theſe Captains, he reſolved that when they had made ſure of their Souldiers, to give ſecret intelligence of this unto Creſſus and Mazares, who commanded his Army, to the end that when the Sauromates did ſever themſelves from the Army of Thomyris, to fall upon the Tents Royal, they might at the ſame time fall upon the Camp of Ariantes: And that thoſe great Auxiliaries which Ciaxares ſent him under the command of Artabates his Kinſman, might attempt to join with them, and enforce thoſe Troops which Andramites had ſet to guard the paſſages: So as Thomyris and Ariantes having ſo many things to do at once, they might be the more diſmaid, and eaſier overcome.

But ſince he would not attempt any thing raſhly until he heard the Sauromatian Captains were aſſured of their Souldiers, Cyrus was in a ſtrange perplexity, for he durſt not make it known unto Mandana that he was alive, leſt the way of his conveying that news unto her ſhould miſcarry, and ſo he ſhould both ruin himſelf, and deprive her of his aſſiſtance. Doubtleſs he might have obliged Meliantes to have made it known unto Arpaſia, and by her, have conveyed it unto Mandana: But as oft as he conſidered, if he ſhould fall into the hands of Thomyris, both he and ſhe were for ever ruined; he choſe rather to let her be ignorant of his being living, than to hazard their being for ever miſerable. Yet ſometimes he was ſo extreamly deſirous ſhe ſhould know he was living, that he was ready to run through all dangers, and would hazard all for one ſingle ſight of Mandana. That which moſt augmented his deſire of it was, becauſe he ſaw no great difficulty in it; for he underſtood by Meliantes, that the Tent wherein ſhe was, was not now ſo ſtrictly guarded; and that Thomyris and Ariantes were ſo fully perſwaded of his death, that they feared not the ſpeaking of any unto her, and yet the Guards were ſo ſtrict, as to hinder her from making any eſcape: Ariantes alſo was very circumſpect to hinder Thomyris from executing any revenge upon that Princeſs: But it was no difficulty to obtain ſo much liberty as to ſpeak with her, ſince the death of Cyrus was believed: So as this great Prince, who had never ſeen Mandana, ſince Ariantes under the name of Anaxaris carried her away, had now a moſt unmeaſurable deſire of ſeeing her, ſo as he could not chooſe but expreſs as much unto Meliantes and Meriontes: But they made it ſo full of danger unto him, that they diſſwaded him: For Sir, (ſaid Meliantes unto him) ſhould you be known, it would not be your life that would be in the danger, for the affection which Thomyris has unto you, would keep her from being ſo cruel unto Cyrus living, as ſhe was unto Cyrus dead: But what cruelties will ſhe not inflict upon the Princeſs Mandana? Therefore I beſeech you command me no ſuch ſervice, as you may repent of it as long as you live, and which may render you the miſerableſt of men.

So Cyrus being convinced both of his Reaſons and his Prayers, he reſolved to give over all thoughts of ſeeing Mandana, and think of nothing but how to conceal himſelf in expectation of this great attempt which Meliantes and Meriontes was plotting; for as Meriontes had great credit amongſt the Sauromates, ſo Meliantes endeavoured to gain ſome of Mandana's Guard, with whom he was in very good eſteem, yet he could not do any thing againſt Hidaſpes; and if he did get any new credit in the heart of Arpaſia, it was without diminiſhing of the reputation of his Rival. However, flattering himſelf, and knowing very well that Arpaſia eſteemed him very much; he believed that if he could once deliver Mandana unto Cyrus, Hidaſpes then durſt not diſpute with him for the poſſeſſion of Arpaſia. But ſometimes the violence of his Love would put his Vertue unto a moſt difficult trial; for when he thought, that if he ſhould put Cyrus into the hands of Thomyris, he ſhould eaſily oblige her to put Arpaſia into his, his heart did a little ſtagger: Yet for all that, Meliantes was both juſt and generous, and would not buy the poſſeſſion of Arpaſia at ſo unworthy a rate, as the ruin of the greateſt Princeſs, and moſt victorious Prince in the world. So as tranſacting upon noble Principles, and chooſing rather to be unfortunate, than to be happy by any baſe ways, or by the miſeries of illuſtrious perſons, he ſeconded the valiant Meliantes, who had negotiated the buſineſs ſo happily, that all the Captains of his correſpondency aſſured him their Souldiers were at their command, and they at his, demanding yet ſome days to get the Gelons unto their ſide, who exceedingly murmured that it ſhould be a Captain of their Nation, who in hope of recompence ſhould preſent the ſuppoſed Head of Cyrus unto Thomyris; though they ſaid, that without them he had never conquered that Prince.

In the interim, Cyrus heard by Meliantes, that the Armies were ſtill in their Trenches: That the Relief which Ciaxares ſent drew near: That Arſamones was killed by a Rebellion of the people: That the Princeſs his Daughter was extreamly troubled, and that both ſhe and Araminta grieved that they could not hear what was become of Spitridates: But the moſt obſervable of all was, Meliantes underſtood by Arpaſia, that theſe two days Mandana was nothing ſo ſad as ſhe was; her tears did ſtop, her ſighs were not ſo frequent, and ſhe could talk of any thing. Cyrus asking every day how Mandana did; and Meliantes uſing to ſhew him the greatneſs of her ſorrows, becauſe he ſaw it was ſome ſweetneſs unto him to know the fidelity of her he loved, he was much put to it, how to anſwer him that day: Yet ſince he would not diſquiet him, he told him that he knew not how ſhe did that day; but being ſomething ſlow in the return of his anſwer, and the ſpirit of a Lover being more penetrating than any others, Cyrus did know that Meliantes had not anſwered him ſincerely; ſo that imagining Mandana to be very ſick with grief, his ſpirits were ſo ſtirred, and he expreſſed himſelf ſo ſadly unto Meliantes, as he acquainted him ingeniouſly with what Arpaſia had ſaid, adding, to qualifie the matter, that doubtleſs Mandana did moderate her grief at the hearing of the relief which the King her Father had ſent : And therefore hoping to ſee his death ſhortly revenged, and her ſelf delivered, the exceſs of her ſorrows did ſomthing diminiſh.

Alas Meliantes (cried Cyrus out) if Mandana can ſo ſoon forget my death, Mandana will never think upon revenging it ; No, no, Mandana is unfaithful, Ariantes triumphs over my misfortune, and I am the moſt miſerable of men. Oh, I beſeech you Sir, (replied Meliantes) do not thus afflict your ſelf at what I tell you, until you know whether you have any cauſe, for you have ſo many real cauſes to grieve at, that methinks you ſhould not build upon any appearances which are often fallacious : No, no, Meliantes (replied Cyrus) the conſolation of Mandana can have no cauſe which can be advantagious unto me ; and I am ſure, that if ſhe had not changed her affection to me, ſhe could not believe me dead, or receive her Liberty without Tears : And therefore I muſt ſadly conclude, that ſince ſhe can ſo ſoon clear up her ſorrows, I muſt deſpair ; but yet Meliantes, I deſire to dye at her feet after I have killed Ariantes. Sir, (replied he) when your deſign is ripe, then perhaps in delivering Mandana, you may kill your Rival, but in the mean time, I beſeech you be not too raſh. It is poſſible unjuſt Princeſs, (cried out Cyrus, and addreſſed his ſpeech unto Mandana, as if ſhe had heard him) that you can ſo ſoon forget the Death of a Prince, who valued his own life not a ſtraw, when he thought you dead at Synope? And who had moſt infallibly killed himſelf, had he been certain that you were not living? You, I ſay, who has made me a promiſe of immortal affection, and whoſe ſoul always ſeemed unto me, ſo high and generous. Oh moſt ungrateful Princeſs! have you forgotten all I have done for you ? Can you retain in your imagination that bloody Head which you thought to be mine, and be able to talk of things ſo indifferent? Oh Mandana, Can you think me dead, and not grieve ? if it be ſo, then I am the baſeſt of all men living, if I continue ſtill my Love unto you.

As Cyrus was in this extremity of grief, and as Melian- tes was endeavouring to comfort him, they heard a great noiſe; and a little after they underſtood, that fire accidentally hapning in Mandana's Tents, they carried her, and all the reſt of the Ladies Priſoners unto other Tents, and in their paſſage to them, they muſt of neceſſity go by the Tent where Cyrus was. This ſadly afflicted Prince, would needs ſee Mandana with his own eyes, though Meliantes did what he could to hinder him: But Meliantes and Meriontes both got near him, purpoſely to hinder him from ſhewing himſelf as Mandana paſſed by, and indeed they had good reaſon for their foreſight: For when Mandana paſſed by, when he ſaw her in a Coach guarded by Ariantes, and when he obſerved in the Countenance of that Princeſs, a grave ſadneſs without any extream ſorrow, his reſentments were beyond all imagination.

But to compleat up the total ſum of his ſorrows, Mandana's Coach forced to ſtay, becauſe one of the Horſes in that Coach wherein Araminta was, being lame upon a ſudden, and that Coach going before Mandana's, it was alſo forced to ſtay: And as chance would have it, ſtaying juſt before the Tent where Cyrus was, that Prince had better leiſure to obſerve the motions of Mandana's face; he could not diſcover either any joys or mirth in her, nor could he ſee any grief or exceſſive ſorrow, but he ſaw one thing which made him almoſt mad, and needs would he go and upbraid Mandana with a thouſand reproaches: And if he had had any Arms, it is to be believed he would have ſet upon his Rival, for all his great number of armed Guards. The cauſe of his exceſſive rage was, becauſe Mandana having Doraliſa and Marteſia only in the Coach with her, and turning her head towards a multitude of people on her right hand, which looked upon her as ſhe paſſed by; ſhe whiſpered Marteſia in the ear, and ſhewed unto her ſome body whom Marteſia alſo looked upon, and as Mandana ſhewed her, a little colour came into her Cheeks, which preſently diſſipating part of her ſadneſs, did bring into her eyes ſuch an inclination unto joy, as appears in the aſpects of ſuch as ſmile, yet this diſpoſition laſted but an inſtant: For preſently after, Mandana lifting up her eyes unto Heaven, as if ſhe prayed for ſomething, returned unto her former aſpect of ſerious ſadneſs; but though this little ſmile did laſt but an inſtant, yet it raiſed a great and long ſorrow in the ſoul of Cyrus.

But as good fortune for him was, he was ſo ſurprized at this ſight, as his wonder did for a time deprive him of his ſpeech, otherwiſe certainly his complaints had been ſo loud, that Mandana might have heard them from the Tent where he was, and as good luck was, Meliantes and Meriontes were with him, to hinder him from ſhewing himſelf as he intended.

But the Horſe in Araminta's Coach being recovered, both it and Mandana's began to put on, and Cyrus loſing the ſight of this Princeſs, he remained in a moſt miſerable condition Is it poſſible (ſaid he, after he had recovered himſelf) that Mandana can ſmile under the power of my Rival? and in a belief that I am in my Grave? Since I have ſeen ſuch a prodigious alteration in her heart, I ſhall not deſpair, but I can ceaſe loving her. But alas the worſt is, I do ſtill love her, and ſhe loves not me: miſerable wretch that I am, (added this afflicted Prince) I did foreſee it was an eaſier matter to be unfaithful unto a dead Lover, than to a living, and yet I would not let Mandana know that I was not dead: But alas (continued he) how could I ever imagin, that a Princeſs who has ſeen the greateſt Princes in the world at her feet, and yet preſerved her fidelity, ſhould now be perfidious? How could I ever think that ſhe, who for the Love of me, had rejected the King of Aſſyria, the Prince Mazares, the King of Pontus, and Ariantes himſelf, ſhould the very next day think me in my grave, exclude me out of her heart and memory, and become the moſt ungrateful and moſt unjuſt perſon in the world? But, Sir, (ſaid Meliantes) I do not underſtand why any thing I have ſaid unto you, or any thing you have ſeen, ſhould ſo exceſſively trouble you: No, no, Meliantes, (replied Cyrus) I cannot be miſtaken, I know the very bottom of Mandana's heart, and I am ſo ſure that ſhe had ſome pleaſing thoughts in her mind when I ſaw her, that it is impoſſible but I ſhould be infinitely grieved. I thought that after all I had done for her, ſhe ſhould not ſo ſoon forget me, but that ſhe ſhould acknowledg my ſervices by a long continued ſorrow for my death, and yet I find her thoughts far different, and in ſuch a condition, that if our deſign be not ſuddenly executed, I ſhall hear of her being at ſome publick Diverſion, and that ſhe has recovered all her joys and pleaſant humours again.

Oh Heavens: that I ſhould ever ſee this day? is it poſſible I ſhould out-live the ſight which I have ſeen? Yes, yes, (added he upon ſecond thoughts) I will live to be revenged upon her that does not lament my death, and to kill my happy Rival, who hath driven me out of the heart of that unjuſt Princeſs, and who thinks himſelf my Succeſſor in her affection: But perfidious Anaxaris, as long as I live, thou ſhalt never enjoy Mandana. Afterwards this afflicted Prince fell into many bitter expreſſions, and was ſo inſtant with Meliantes and Meriontes to haſten their deſign, that he inſpired them with freſh zeal to the Execution of it. And indeed they did tranſact their buſineſs ſo well that all the Sauromatian Captains did not only aſſure him of all the Sauromates, but of the Gelons alſo. So as now having nothing to do but to make it known unto Creſſus and Mazares, that Cyrus was living, and to agree with them upon an hour of thoſe ſeveral aſſaults which they thought fit to be made all at once, they propounded it as the ſafeſt expedient, that Meliantes ſhould deſire a Herauld of Ariantes, to go and ſee a friend of his, who was really a priſoner on the other ſide, and that in the mean time, he who went with this Herauld ſhould ſpeak in private with Creſſus and Mazares, or if that could not be, then to Chryſantes or Feraulas, and acquaint them that Cyrus was living, and inform them of the ſtate of things. But all the difficulty being to find a faithful man for this imployment, whom they might truſt, and finding none, they changed their intentions, and reſolved that Meriontes ſhould diſguiſe himſelf, and go into the Camp of Mazares : For, ſaid he, I can do it without any danger, ſince if any of Thomyris ſide do ſtop me, they will know me and take me to be one of their own ſide, and if any of Cyrus his men take me, they will carry me unto Creſſus and Mazares: After this Meriontes without more delay, diſguiſed himſelf; and after he had received all neceſſary inſtructions from Cyrus, for the Execution of the work, he departed.

But that thoſe Princes might give the more credit unto what he ſhould tell them, Cyrus writ a little Note of three lines only unto Mazares, which Meriontes might tear, or ſwallow, in caſe he were ſtopped by any of Thomyris men; and before he went, Cyrus maugre all his ſorrows, Courted his fidelity with a million of obliging expreſſions. But they were needleſs, for Meriontes of himſelf was wholly devoted unto the Service of this Prince, and did negotiate the buſineſs with ſo much ingenuity and fidelity, that though he was ſtopped ſeveral times, yet he happily went his Journey; for his habit being of that Nation of which there was ſome in both Armies, he was able to tell any ſide that he was of theirs, and he went through all the difficulties ſo fortunately that he got unto Creſſus and Mazares; the truth is, he did not ſo much ſurprize them as he expected. For Feraulas an hour before, was returned from the Tents Royal, and had told them, that certainly the head which Thomyris had plunged in blood was not the head of Cyrus, but of Spitridates: So, as Meriontes giving Mazares that Letter which Cyrus wrote unto him, they had no reaſon to doubt any thing he told them afterwards, alſo they knew him to be that valiant Sauromate, whoſe life Cyrus ſaved from the flames, after he had overcome him.

But it was very obſervable, that though all the hopes of Mazares did die, by the reviving of Cyrus, yet he was ſo generous as to rejoice at it: The truth is, that to uphold his virtue, he had recourſe unto his Love, and his hopes of ſeeing Mandana ſoon delivered, made him rejoyce that Cyrus lived. And to let the height of his generoſity appear, he endeavoured all manner of ways to haſten the execution of a deſign, which he thought being retarded, might ruin Cyrus, who being in a place where he might be diſcovered, he was in abundance of danger. So as conſulting with Creſſus, and finding it expedient to impart the buſineſs unto the moſt conſiderable friends of Cyrus, they ſent for the Prince Artamas, Myrſiles, Tygranes, Intaphernes, Gobrias, Gadates, Atergatis, Indatherſis, Hydaſpes, and Chryſantes.

But in the interim, Creſſus and Mazares cauſed Meriontes and Feraulas to tell them all they knew concerning Cyrus and Mandana, both of them ſadly bewailing the ſad reſentments of that Princeſs, when ſhe heard of the ſuppoſed Death of Cyrus. Sirs, (ſaid Meriontes) there is more need of bewailing that great Prince, than that Princeſs: At leaſt he thinks her too much comforted after his ſuppoſed death; for he ſaw her in a Coach before his Tent, and ſaw ſo few ſigns of ſorrows in her face, that he ſaw her ſmile as ſhe talked unto Marteſia. And to tell you truly, I know not how ſhe can excuſe her ſelf for being ſo ſoon comforted; but I am ſure never Lover was ſo afflicted as the illuſtrious Cyrus was when he ſaw it. Alas, alas, (cried out Feraulas) it is with much injuſtice, and the joys which he ſaw in the face of that Princeſs, ought infinitely to oblige him: For generous Meriontes, that ſame day when Cyrus ſaw her, was the day when her Tent was on fire, and when they carried her into another, and that ſame day in the morning, I did let her know by Marteſia, that it was the Head of Spitridates which ſhe ſaw, and not of Cyrus; ſo as it is no wonder if having ſome hopes of that Princes life ſhe was not ſo ſad as when her own eyes told her that he was dead: And when he ſaw her ſmile a little, doubtleſs it was an effect of her affection to him: For Marteſia telling her how I was diſguiſed, and amongſt the multiude to ſee her paſs by, ſhe knew me, and ſhewed me unto Marteſia, making a little ſign with her head unto me, to teſtifie ſhe was glad of the good news which I ſent her, and not being able to think that Cyrus was living without the appearance of ſome joy in her eyes, me thought indeed I ſaw her ſmile a little: Oh Feraulas, (ſaid Meriontes) how welcome will this news be unto Cyrus? for I am fully perſwaded that from the firſt day of his loving Mandana unto this hour, nothing hath hapned which ever made him half ſo miſerable as this accident: Sir, (replied he) I can ſo eaſily juſtifie this great Princeſs, that I have a great deſire to return with all the haſte I can to undeceive my illuſtrious Maſter of this Error. Indeed, I think it requiſite (replied Creſſus) that you return with Meriontes: For conſidering the depth of his reſentments, perhaps he will imagin that Meriontes flatters him. Then whilſt Creſſus, Meriontes, and Feraulas were thus talking, and expecting the coming of thoſe Princes whom they had ſent for, Mazares was entertaining himſelf with his own thoughts, and carefully examined them, leſt his love ſhould be too ſtrong for his vertue.

At laſt, all the illuſtrious friends of Cyrus being come, and hearing with incredible joy that he was alive, they loadned Meriontes with a million of Carreſſes, and thanked him as heartily as if he had raiſed him from the dead. But Meriontes being all generoſity, ſtopped them, and ſaid, that it was not he who had ſaved the life of Cyrus, nor that would ſet him at liberty, but that it was an illuſtrious Aſſyrian called Meliantes. At the very name of Meliantes, Hidaſpes changed colour, and could not chooſe but teſtifie his aſtoniſhment. How (ſaid he and Gobrias both) is it Meliantes, who was heretofore of Alſenes, is it he unto whom Cyrus is a Priſoner? Yes, (replied Meriontes) he who hath the Deſtiny of Cyrus in his hands is the ſame Meliantes, who I underſtand did meet the fair Arpaſia upon the banks of a little River, and who began his acquaintance with her, by relating how Seſoſtris had heretofore erected a ſtately Column unto his Glory, upon which Column Arpaſia did ſit. Hidaſpes being extreamly vexed that Cyrus ſhould be ſo obliged unto his Rival, his reſentments of it were beyond expreſſions: but being generous, he aſſured the Princes that ſince he had promiſed fidelity unto Cyrus, he would keep it.

After which they reſolved to ſend in all haſte unto Artabates, who brought up the puiſſant Auxiliaries which Ciaxares ſent, to the end that things might be ſo contrived, that at the very ſame time the Sauromates and the Gelons departed from the Army of Thomyris unto the Tents Royal, to try if they could deliver Mandana, they might fall upon Ariantes in three places at once: And that Artabates dividing his Troops, might fall upon Andramites with one part, and ſend another to encamp themſelves between the Tents Royal, and the Camp of Thomyris, and ſo cut off communication between theſe two places, whilſt Cyrus was fighting with the Gelons and the Sauromates againſt the reſt, with orders to relieve, if need required.

But ſince all this would require ſome time, Merontes did not return, until it was known that Artabates had received theſe orders, and promiſed exact obedience; and until he had taken a punctual meaſure for the march of thoſe Troops which were to encamp themſelves between the Tents Royal, and the Camp of Thomyris. The difficulty was, that Myrſiles, Intaphernes, Atergatis, and Hydaſpes, who had each of them a Miſtreſs in that place, would by all means joyn themſelves with Cyrus, and fight next him: And indeed, though Creſſus told them it was not expedient they ſhould go, leſt they ſhould be taken, and prejudice that Prince, and diſcover him, yet they were reſolved upon it. Yet the laſt of theſe could not take that reſolution without great agitation of ſpirit, in a thought that he ſhould there meet with a Rival unto whom Cyrus owed his life and liberty. Artamas alſo had a great mind to go unto Cyrus, if he could have gone without prejudice to his ſide: but ſince he thought that he ſhould do better ſervice in the Army than in the Tents Royal, he reſtrained his deſires.

As for Indatherſis, he much deſired he might fight in the ſight of Cyrus, but a generous thought made him reſolve to go, and aſſault Thomyris even in her very Tents. As for Feraulas, he was reſolved to go with Meriontes, and ſo did Chryſantes.

But whilſt theſe things thus paſſed, and whilſt all theſe brave and gallant men were preparing themſelves to go and fight for Cyrus, for Mandana, and for all the reſt of the illuſtrious Captives, there paſſed things of great importance in the Tents Royal. Thomyris, the more ſhe conſidered the ſtate of her fortune, the more miſerable ſhe found her ſelf: and the death of Cyrus taking at once from her the object both of her love, and of her revenge, her Soul conceived a moſt horrid hatred both of Mandana, and of her ſelf, which did in ſuch a cruel manner torment her, that her intellects were not very free. As for Ariantes, ſince he ſaw Mandana was ſomewhat leſs melancholick, he was abundantly joyed, ſo as he was in greater hopes, and Mandana in leſs perſecution. Yet ſhe being of a generous ſoul, ſhe was extreamly ſad at the misfortune of Araminta, when ſhe heard of Spitridates his death: Alſo, not knowing yet where Cyrus was, and not being ſo much joyed as not to doubt his death, ſhe was far from thinking her ſelf in any happy condition, although Feraulas had put her in great hopes by Marteſia, ſo as ſhe ſtood in need of Doraliſa's conſolation, who for her particular had the comfort of Andramites being far from her.

As for Meliantes, ſince he had ſometimes the liberty to ſee Arpaſia, and hoped for much protection from Cyrus, he was in a happier condition than ever he was, ſince the time that Argeliſe arrived at Alſenes, to interrupt his felicity. But for Cyrus, he was in a worſe condition than ever; as oft as it came into his imagination that Mandana ſhould ſmile when ſhe thought him dead, and ſo ſoon after the barbarous act of Thomyris, he thought that he had all the reaſon in the world to grieve. Truly (ſaid he one day unto Meliantes) had Mandana changed her affection when ſhe had ſome ſparks of jealouſie of the Princeſs Araminta, and had beſtowed it upon the King of Pontus, I ſhould have thought her more excuſable. But that ſhe ſhould ſmile the very next day after ſhe knew of my death, in a time when ſhe was ſatisfied with my paſſion, and believed that I loſt my life becauſe I I would continue faithful, and ſlighted a great Queen becauſe I would be conſtant unto her, this adventure is ſo ſtrangely terrible, that if theſe eyes of my own had not ſeen it, I could never have believed it, and yet alas now I cannot doubt it: Oh Heavens! what a ſtrange alteration is in her heart, ſince ſhe was in Sinope, and there thought me dead? In thoſe happy days ſhe lamented me, ſhe ſighed and ſhed tears, and ſeemed to refuſe all comforts: Yet then, I had ſcarcely done any thing for her, I had not ſo much as told her that I loved her, and yet ſhe did all that reaſon required ſhe ſhould. But alas now, when I may juſtly demand a recompence for my million of Services, and when I have thus long loved her the moſt fervently and conſtantly that was poſſible, ſhe can ſmile, and perhaps ſo quite forget me, that ſhe never thinks upon the miſerable Artamenes, or the unfortunate Cyrus.

Ah Mandana, unjuſt Mandana! is it poſſible I ſhould ever have ſuch cauſe to upbraid you? Can I live, and not go into the midſt of your Guards? and in the very preſence of Thomyris and Ariantes, proclaim you the moſt ungrateful perſon in the world? No, no, Meliantes, I cannot live, unleſs Mandana know that I am living, and unleſs ſhe know that I ſaw her ſmile when ſhe thought me dead: I am aſhamed that I ſhould have more prudence than love, and my paſſion muſt this very day make it appear that I am fuller of Love, than Prudence. Oh Meliantes (continued he) you muſt needs invent ſome way to convey a Letter from me unto Mandana; for if you do not, I will go my ſelf and chide her extreamly for her poor affection to me. Meliantes did what he could to avert him from this deſign; for ſince he could not deliver this Letter to Mandana's own hand, becauſe he never uſed to ſee her, he feared leſt ſome unlucky accident ſhould happen which might ruin this Prince, and ſpoil the great deſign which was ready almoſt for execution, which moſt apparently would ſet both Cyrus and Mandana at liberty, and which would ruin Thomyris and Ariantes, ſo as he uſed the utmoſt of his arguments and perſwaſions to turn his intention: but ſince the love of this Prince was above all theſe conſiderations, and his reſentments above his love, he would not follow the advice of Meliantes, though he knew it reaſonable: So as Meliantes fearing leaſt he ſhould ſteal out, and go unto Mandana himſelf, he promiſed to do his beſt to deliver his Letter unto her.

So Cyrus calling for Pen and Paper, he writ preſently unto Mandana, but he writ when he was ſo full of tumultuous thoughts, that his wit was never ſo confuſed as then; he never ſo much as ſtopped nor ſtayed to give it any method, but writ ſo faſt, that his hand had much ado to follow his fancy; and not at all conſulting with his heart, he expreſſed himſelf in all the terms that both an incenſed and reſpective Lover could invent. After which, ſealing up this Letter, he gave it unto Meliantes, who went the very ſame hour unto Niſide, and entreated her to deliver it unto Marteſia, to the end ſhe might give it unto Mandana with all poſſible ſecreſie. Niſide ſhe gave it unto Marteſia, and Marteſia unto Mandana. But ſince Niſide knew not who ſent it, becauſe Meliantes thought it not expedient that ſhe ſhould know how Cyrus was alive, though he knew her very diſcreet, ſhe would not tell Marteſia, ſo as Marteſia gave this Letter unto Mandana in the preſence of Araminta: And betwixt them two all manner of Ceremonies were baniſhed, unleſs upon certain occaſions when their qualities would not diſpence with them: So that Mandana receiving this Letter in preſence of Araminta, ſhe was extreamly impatient to ſee whether it came from Feraulas, and whether he had heard any thing which might confirm her hopes of Cyrus being alive: ſo as after ſhe had asked Araminta leave to read this Letter, ſhe did ſo not bethinking her ſelf that ſhe had never ſaid any thing unto this Princeſs of all that Feraulas had acquainted her withal.

One the other ſide, Araminta thinking this Letter could be nothing but ſome advertiſement concerning Mandana's delivery, ſhe deſired that ſhe might ſee it, in hopes that perhaps ſomthing was ſent unto Mandana concerning Spitridates. So that fixing her eyes upon this Letter which Mandana haſtily opened, with an earneſt deſire to ſee what was in it. It was no ſooner opened, but Araminta knew it to be the hand of Cyrus : and judging at the very firſt that if Cyrus was living, Spitridates muſt be dead, and that there was a miſtake in their reſemblance, ſhe gave ſuch a dolorus and loud ſcriek, that the Guards which were at the other end of the Tent, did believe that ſome ill accident had chanced unto this Princeſs, ſo as coming to her as well as Heſionide, Doraliſa and Marteſia, they found her ſo perplexed, that they knew her ſorrow was exceſſive.

But the worſt was, Mandana knowing at the very firſt the hand of Cyrus as well as Araminta, ſhe was ſo pleaſingly ſurprized, and her mind was ſo wholly taken up; that taking no notice of Araminta, ſhe began to read, and read on until the Guards were come up unto them: Then recollecting her ſelf, ſhe preſently put up the Letter, yet ſhe could not put it up ſo ſoon but the Guards ſaw it

In the mean time, Araminta ſeeing ſo many men about her, did make a ſign unto them that ſhe was not well, and that ſhe would have them retire, which according to their reſpects they did: but ſince what they had ſeen had filled them full of curioſity, they obſerved theſe Princeſſes very cloſely, each of them with intentions to report what they had ſeen and heard, unto thoſe upon whom they depended ; for there was ſome of them who were more for Thomyris, than Ariantes, and ſome alſo who were more for Ariantes, than Thomyris.

After they were gone out of the Tent, they began to liſten and hearken very attentively : and to tell you truly, they might eaſily know that this Letter contained ſome matter of great importance: For as ſoon as ever they were retired, the ſad Araminta after a deep ſigh, returned towards Mandana, and holding out her hand ; I beſeech you Madam (ſaid ſhe unto her) let me ſee whether I muſt live, or dye, by ſhewing me the Letter which you received ; for if my eyes have not deceived me, I muſt dye, and there is nothing which can hinder me.

Mandana was much unreſolved what to do : for ſhould ſhe ſhew her the Letter, ſhe ſhould as good as tell her Cyrus was living, and by conſequence, that Spitridates was dead : One the other ſide, ſhould ſhe not ſhew it unto her, ſhe did as good as tell her the ſame, ſince conſidering the familiarity that uſed to paſs between them, it was not likely Mandana ſhould hide any thing from Araminta, unleſs ſome ſuch thing as would afflict her. Alſo Mandana ſeeing that ſhe knew it to be the hand of Cyrus, it was all one, as if ſhe ſhewed her the Letter. However, ſhe muſt return an anſwer unto the great and unfortunate Princeſs, and ſo ſhe did, with as much diſcretion as poſſible.

The condition wherein I ſee you are (ſaid ſhe unto her when ſhe asked a ſight of the Letter) does move me unto ſo much pity, that I would do any thing to leſſen your ſorrows: therefore I muſt not put my ſelf to the hazard of aggravating them; as perhaps I might by ſhewing you this Letter: For ſince I have not yet read it over, I cannot tell whether it intimate unto me that the Army of the King my Father is cut in peices, and whether we are expoſed unto perpetual Captivity: and therefore I beſeech you let me read this Letter in private, before I ſhew it unto you; and reſolve with your ſelf, if you can, to let me forbear the reading of it until it be night; for ſince you ſee the ſcriek you gave, did put the Guards into ſome ſuſpition, and moves them to watch us more narrowly, therefore it is diſcretion to forbear a while.

Alas Madam, replied Araminta, you may as well tell me that I muſt dye, as refuſe me what I ask. For if the writing which I ſaw was the hand of Cyrus, that's enough: And therefore Madam, I have no more to ſay unto you, but that ſince I am not able to govern my ſorrows, I will go and hide my ſelf in my own Tent, leſt I ſhould prejudice you.

In ſaying ſo, the ſad Araminta roſe up, and went into a Tent which joyned unto Mandana's, whether that Princeſs followed her: And they were no ſooner there, but Araminta giving her ſelf over unto ſorrow, her expreſſions would have tendred hearts that were as hard and pitileſs as ſtones. Mandana now would have done her the ſame office which ſhe received from her, when ſhe endeavoured to comfort her, when Thomyris ſhewed her that Tragical ſpectacle: But alas, Araminta's ſoul was not in any condition of receiving Conſolation; and therefore Mandana conceived, that ſince her ſorrow was ſo exceſſive it was better to let her know the truth now, then leave her in a languiſhing ſuſpition of that which ſhe muſt one day know: So as no longer oppoſing her ſorrows, but condoling with her, Araminta was confirmed in the opinion which ſhe had before, that Spitridates was dead: ſo as being out of all hopes, her ſorrow had no bounds and her ſoul was ſo over-ſwelled, that never thinking it might prejudice Mandana, ſhe cryed out ſo loud, that all thoſe who were in the next Tent, might hear her complaints.

Alas (ſaid ſhe) could I ſee the unfortune Spitridates dead, and I live? Is it poſſible ſo great, and ſo virtuous a Prince ſhould be ſo cruelly treated both by Fortune and by Thomyris? After this Araminta was ſilent, and her Teares did flow in ſuch abundance, that not being able to weep, to ſigh, and to complain all at once, ſhe ceaſed her complaining: and during her ſad ſilence, it was eaſie to ſee ſhe ſuffered abundance of pain; and there was to be ſeen in her face ſuch ſigns of exceſſive ſorrow that ſhe would have moved the moſt inſenſible ſoul unto pity: her face was wholly changed, a mortal paleneſs was in her cheeks, her looks ſad enough to draw tears from the hardeſt eyes; and the greatneſs of her grief did ſo appear in all her actions, that Mandana was afraid leſt ſhe ſhould take ſome ſad reſolution in hand: For Araminta being naturally as wiſe, and prudent a perſon as any in the world, the diſorder of her ſpirit ſeemed the more ſtrong: For after ſhe had been a while ſilent, ſhe began to call to memory the things which had hapned unto Spitridates, and to ſpeak of them very earneſtly: So as heaping up all the misfortunes of that Prince, ſhe accuſed the King of of Pontus, though dead, for the loſs of Spitridates. Preſented after, ſhe would accuſe Arſamones, and ſomtimes ſhe would accuſe her ſelf. The truth is (did ſhe ſay) I ſhould either not have ſuffered the affection of this Prince, or elſe ſhould have better acknowledged it; for unfortunate Araminta hadſt thou been more prudent and conſiderate, he had not died, nor needeſt thou have been put to the neceſſity of dying with him.

But for all that (continued ſhe) It is fit thou ſhouldſt make it appear that thou art worthy the love of Spitridates, ſes, and make thy own grief enough to take away thy life, without recourſe either unto ſword, or poyſon: think upon the grandeur of his affection, of his generoſity and conſtancy. Remember it was for thy intereſt that he ſuffered ſo many impriſonments, forſook ſo many Crowns rather than forſake thee: and for the love of thee, had exiled himſelf from a place where he might have been happy, hadſt not thou made him miſerable: Conſider, that though thou didſt deny him all things, yet his paſſion was ſtill the ſame: and ſince thou haſt been the cauſe of his death, couragiouſly follow him, and the more to incite thee unto it, conſider that it is a ſhame for thee to live. But I beſeech you Madam (ſaid Mandana unto her in a low voice) call to memory thoſe reaſons which you gave me, when we beheld the ſad ſpectacle which Thomyris ſhewed us. Ah Madam, cryed out Araminta (not conſidering ſhe ſhould not ſpeak of Cyrus ſo loud) I muſt needs reject your Counſel as you rejected mine, and I beſeech you pardon me, if I grieve at the life of Cyrus, ſince ſuch is the will of Fate, I cannot hear of his being alive, but I muſt at the ſame time hear of Spitridates being dead: I beſeech you Madam (ſaid Mandana) ſpeak as little of that Prince as you can, leſt you ſhould diſcover his being alive unto ſome who may do him hurt; for you know that there are many eyes and ears over us, and they may hear what you ſay unto the next Tent. I beſeech you Madam pardon me, (ſaid the ſad Araminta) if I have ſaid any thing which I ſhould not: For alas I cannot govern my grief, but I muſt needs complain my ſelf to death, and yet I think I cannot complain long: For after all theſe misfortunes which are fallen upon my family; after the loſs of the King my Brother; and after I have ſeen Spitridates dead, I ſhould deſerve theſe misfortunes, if I did endure them.

After this, Mandana gave a thouſand tender, obliging, and diſcreet expreſſions unto Araminta, and that miſerable Princeſs did anſwer her ſo ſorrowfully, that ſhe took away from Mandana much of her joy to ſee that Cyrus was living. But at laſt, Mandana conceiving Heſionide to be the moſt fit to give any comfort unto Araminta: And thinking it not good to make the Guards over curious, and to come into the Tent again, ſhe left her, and went into her own Tent : But as ſoon as ſhe was there, ſhe could not chooſe but read the Letter which Cyrus writ: Yet ſhe was as careful as poſſible, leſt the Guards who ſtood at the entrance into her Tent, ſhould ſee her read it : And to that end ſhe deſired Doraliſa and Marteſia to ſtand before her whilſt ſhe read theſe words.

MADAM,

Since my death hath been very indifferent unto you, I doubt not but my life will be ſo alſo : and I am confident you will be as backward in your joys, that I am living as you were forward in comforting your ſelf after you thought me dead, I muſt ingenuouſly confeſs unto you, that it is more to be revenged upon your infidelity than for any other reaſon that I acquaint you, Cyrus is not dead as you believed. The truth is, his life is no happineſs unto him. For having ſeen you ſmile that day you changed your Tent, Death will be much more ſweet unto him,then a life in which he lives not in your heart. For Madam, one is not ſo ſoon comforted after the loſs of a perſon whom one loved : and the little thought which you had of my death makes me ſo ſenſible and ſad,that doubtleſs I ſhall ere long give you an occaſion to rejoyce the ſecond time at my Ruin. Yet I will do what I can to live, that I may hinder my Rival from triumphing over my miſfortune, and thriving by your inconſtancy ; and doubtleſs I ſhall do all this by rendring you into the hands of the King your Father.When this is done, Madam, my only buſineſs is to dye ; for I have no reaſon to believe, that a man whoſe death is ſo indifferent unto you, can ever give you any ſatisfaction. Yet I will keep my reſpect and my Love unto the laſt of my days, and I will be revenged of your ingratitude only upon my Rival, and your Enemies. Theſe Madam are the reſolutions of the revived Cyrus, who I think did merit to be longer lamented by her, of whom he ever had ſuch tender thoughts, and to whom (as unjuſt and perfidious as ſhe is) he always paid the whole devotion of his heart.

CYRUS.

The reading of this Letter did ſo much ſurprize Mandana, that ſhe called for Doraliſa and Marteſia to ſhew it unto them; and they obeying her, they did not ſo well hide the Letter, but the Guards did ſee it; and thinking it to be the ſame which cauſed Araminta to cry out, ſome of them went to acquaint Thomyris, and others to acquaint Ariantes with it, not doubting but that there was ſomething of extraordinary conſequence in it.

Moreover, ſince there was ſome who confuſedly over-heard the complaints of Araminta, wherein the name of Cyrus was brought in, they added this which they heard unto that which they had ſeen. Thus were Thomyris and Ariantes both at one time acquainted, that Mandana ſome way or other, had received Letters which were in all likelihood of great importance: For the Guards neglected not the leaſt circumſtance, but told them of the great ſcriek which Araminta gave at the ſight of it: The exceſſive ſorrow wherein ſhe was; her complaints after ſhe was in her Tent; the name of Cyrus pronounced, and the earneſtneſs wherewith Mandana read this Letter after ſhe was returned into her own Tent: So as making no queſtion, but there was ſome buſineſs of conſequence in this Letter, they began to conſider upon the matter.

The Queen preſently after ſent for her Brother; he came, and they began to conſult what might be the cauſe of Araminta's ſorrow. At the firſt Thomyris came near the truth, for ſhe thought this Letter imported that Spitridates was dead. But Ariantes conſidering that Mandana was of late leſs ſad than ordinary, he told it unto Thomyris, though he could not deviſe why Araminta ſhould thus redouble her ſorrows; Yet knowing that there was a reſemblance between Cyrus and Spitridates, a thought came into his head which ſtrangely troubled his heart: Yet ſince he knew not that Cyrus had given Spitridates that rich ſuit of Arms, which this Prince wore, and which made him to be taken for Cyrus he was more quiet.

As for Thomyris, ſince ſhe only ſought for a pretence to perſecute Mandana, ſhe told Ariantes, that abſolutely ſhe would ſee that Letter which that Princeſs had received, and would know the cauſe of Araminta's ſorrows, and whether that would give any light unto the reſt, ſaying that ſhe would go immediately unto that Princeſs under colour of a civil viſit: And Ariantes concurring with her opinion, Thomyris did go unto Araminta's Tent, that Prince waiting upon her; where they found Mandana was returned, and where Aspasia was come alſo upon reports of her ſorrow.

In the mean time, this ſudden coming of Thomyris and Ariantes did ſo ſurprize Mandana, as was eaſie for them to imagine, that there was ſome conſiderable thing in the wind.

On the other ſide, Araminta, whoſe mind was all upon Spitridates, whoſe Head Thomyris had plunged ſo in blood; ſhe no ſooner ſaw this Queen, but the fancy of this fearful object coming into her mind, her grief was ſo great, that never thinking upon either Cyrus or Mandana, ſhe was not Miſtreſs of her firſt thoughts: But giving a great ſcrick, ſhe turned away her head from the ſight of a Queen who was ſo full of cruelty: So as Thomyris, who ever found Araminta very civil, and diſcreet in all her actions and words, ſhe was extreamly ſurprized at her behaviour. Yet drawing near the Bed on which ſhe lay, and beginning to ſpeak; Madam (ſaid Thomyris unto her) you receive my civilities in ſo ſtrange a manner, as I cannot chooſe but ask the reaſon of it? Since I do not value life (replied Araminta in a violent manner) I have nothing to care for, and therefore Madam, I will not tell you neither what afflicts me, nor what makes my ſorrows ſwell at the ſight of you, nor why I reſolve to dye: But to acknowledge your civilities, I will tell you, that if you do not give over your thirſt after illuſtrious Blood, nor deliver the Princeſs Mandana, whom you detain by a moſt unjuſt and cruel War, you will make your ſelf the object of mens hatred, and the Gods revenge. More than this, Madam, expect not from the miſerable Araminta. Let her alone with the ſorrows of her ſoul, without further diving into the cauſe of them, and let her expect that death which ſhe deſires, as the only thing that can give er any comfort.

Araminta having ſpoken theſe words, was ſilent, and as ſo drowned in ſorrows, that though ſhe had deſied to ſpeak more, yet her tears and ſighs did ſo ſtifle her, that it was impoſſible.

In the mean time, Thomyris, who was not uſed to ſuch entertainment, bluſh'd for anger: And turning towards Mandana, after ſhe had looked upon Ariantes: It is you, Madam, (ſaid ſhe unto her) that muſt acquaint me with the cauſe of this Princeſs ſorrows; for I know that you received the Letter which brought her the news which afflicts her: Therefore, Madam, never offer to deny a thing which I do moſt certainly know, but ſhew this Letter unto me, for I will ſee it, ſince I have power enough to make my ſelf be obeyed.

Mandana hearing Thomyris ſay ſo, was in a ſtrange perplexity, for ſhe knew very well the danger that there was in ſhewing this Letter unto Thomyris, or in telling her that Cyrus was living, and in the Tents Royal: So as in this urgent neceſſity of an anſwer, ſhe would endeavour to try if ſhe could take this Letter out of her Pocket, and beginning to anſwer; As for the Letter you ſpeak of (replied Mandana) I cannot ſhew it unto you, becauſe I gave it back unto the man of the Guard who brought it unto me; but leſt we ſhould aggravate the ſorrows of the Queen of Pontus, if it will pleaſe your Majeſty to go into my Tent, I will acquaint you with the cauſe of them.

Since Mandana ſpoke this with a confident and pleaſant look, Thomyris believing that ſhe ſpoke ſincerely: And Ariantes deſiring to keep Thomyris from doing any thing which might diſtaſte that Princeſs, he deſired her to do ſo. So as the Queen of the Maſſagettans, paſſed from the Tent of the ſad Araminta, unto that of Mandana's.

But in paſſing from one Tent into another, Mandana, who followed Thomyris, and who obſerved that Doraliſa and Marteſia were at the Door of the Tent, ſhe haſtily took the Letter out of her Pocket to give it unto one of them; but as ſhe took it out with much haſte, and would have given it either unto Doraliſa or unto Marteſia, theſe two, not knowing unto which of them ſhe would give it, becauſe ſhe made no ſign to ſignifie her intention, they both advanced to her at once: So that Mandana parting from the Letter a little too haſtily and ſoon, in lieu of leaving it in the hands either of Doraliſa or Marteſia, it fell down; and fell ſo unluckily, that when theſe two Ladies ſtooped haſtily to take it up, Thomyris turning her head to ſee whether Mandana followed, ſhe ſaw it in the hands of Marteſia, and ſeiſed upon it immediately.

As ſoon as Mandana ſaw this Letter in the hands of Thomyris, Oh Heavens! how vexed was ſhe? But there being no remedy, ſhe reſolved to take this croſs adventure patiently, and pray to the Gods that this accident might not bring Cyrus under the power of Thomyris, ſo as ſhe did ſtrive to reaſſume her confidence of ſpirit, and to follow that Queen into her Tent; where ſhe was no ſooner come but ſeeing Thomyris ready to open the Letter, and by conſequence to know the hand of Cyrus, (as well as Ariantes, who had often ſeen his hand) ſhe began to ſpeak with much Courage, Magnanimity, Prudence, and Diſcretion. I cannot tell Madam, (ſaid ſhe unto her) what thoughts you will have when you underſtand that Cyrus is not dead; but before you do underſtand it by this Letter which is written unto me; I do proteſt before all the Gods, that you ſhall never know by me, from whom I received it. How (ſaid Thomyris, (and haſted to open the Letter) is not Cyrus dead? Is it poſſible (ſaid Ariantes) that Cyrus ſhould be living? If ſo Madam, is it many days ſince you knew it? And that conſolation which I hoped for, in lieu of rejoycing me, muſt afflict me.

Whilſt he was ſpeaking thus, Thomyris was reading the Letter which Cyrus writ unto Mandana, and ſhe read it with ſuch tumultuous and oppoſite thoughts that it was a great difficulty to reconcile them; for it filled her mind full of Wonder, Joy, Anger, Sorrow, and Jealouſie.

louſie. So as being leſs able to endure the ſight of Mandana, when ſhe knew that Cyrus was alive, than when ſhe thought him dead, ſhe ſhut up the Letter before ſhe had read it out, and turning towards Mandana, though you are reſolved Madam (ſaid ſhe unto her) not to tell who brought you this Letter, yet I ſhall find out a way to make you confeſs it: You may eaſily find out many ways to perſecute me, Madam, (replied Mandana) and to make me dye, but you can never find out any way to make me confeſs any thing that may prejudice Cyrus: And you ſhall never ſee me do any thing (replied Thomyris in a great rage) that ſhall pleaſe Mandana.

Afterwards, this Queen told Ariantes, that he muſt double the Guards upon this Princeſs, and upon all the reſt of the Ladies; alſo to let no communication be between them: And accordingly this order being obſerved the very ſame hour they parted all the Princeſſes, for Araminta remained alone with Heſionide in her Tent; Mandana in hers with Doraliſa and Marteſia, and all the reſt with their own women. So as by this means, it was impoſſible for Niſide, unto whom Meliantes had delivered the Letter of Cyrus, to ſend back unto him, and to advertiſe him of this great diſorder, of which he was ignorant, becauſe he was then very buſie in a ſecret conference between him and Sauromatian Captains, with whom Meriontes and he had treated.

In the mean time, Thomyris and Ariantes were no ſooner parted from their Tents, but they opened this Letter, and read it with ſtrange agitation of ſpirit, though with different reſentments. For Thomyris, out of ſome reſentments of Love, was very glad that Cyrus was not dead, and that he complained againſt Mandana, though otherwiſe ſhe would have been very ſorry for the reſurrection of ſuch an Enemy, and that he ſhould be ſo tender towards her Rival. But for Ariantes, though his generoſity had moved him to compaſſionate his Rivals death, yet he was extreamly ſorry to hear he was living, and all the complaints he made againſt Mandana, did not comfort him.

However, both Thomyris and Ariantes finding by this Letter, that Cyrus was alive, and that he either was, or had been in the Tents Royal, ſince he told Mandana that he ſaw her ſmile that day ſhe changed her Tent, they endeavoured to ſecure his perſon: but the great difficulty was, how to know where this great Prince was.

The truth is, fortune favoured their deſign, for as they were thus conſulting three Priſoners were brought in, which Agathyrſis had taken and ſent unto Thomyris: The one of them was the Prince Atergatis diſguiſed in a Maſſagettan habit. The ſecond was Intaphernes, and the third Feraulas, who had a Letter about him from Gobrias unto Meliantes. So as now, not doubting but that Meliantes knew where Cyrus was, Thomyris commanded the Captain of the Guard to go that very hour and arreſt him, and to ſearch his Tent very well, to ſee if they could find Cyrus; for the Letter from Gobrias gave ſome ſuſpition of ſuch a thing: But ſhe gave ſtrict Commands, that whatſoever he did to bring him alive, and if he did reſiſt, yet none to kill him.

After which, ſhe commanded that Intaphernes and Atergatis ſhould be ſtrictly guarded; as for Feraulas, ſhe would ſee him, and examine him what he knew concerning his Maſter: And the ſooner to induce him unto a confeſſion, ſhe ſpoke unto him at firſt with all imaginable ſweetneſs: Afterwards ſhe threatned him, and at laſt did ſpeak unto him in ſo much fury, that Feraulas was extreamly afraid leſt Cyrus ſhould fall into the hands of a Princeſs, whoſe paſſions were ſo violent. But whilſt Thomyris imployed all her unprofitable menaces upon Feraulas to make him diſcover where his Maſter was, and whilſt Ariantes, by order of Thomyris, was gone to ſet double Guards about the Tents Royal, that none might go out, or in, without expreſs permiſſion from the Queen; Cyrus and Meliantes were not without their ſhares of trouble; for though Niſide could not advertiſe Meliantes of all paſſages, and though Meliantes had been ſo buſie that he ſaw none that could inform him, yet one of his domeſticks telling him that Thomyris and Ariantes had been in Mandana's Tent, and that Orders were given for a ſtrict Guard upon the Princeſs, he feared (and with reaſon) that the Letter which Cyrus writ was diſcovered, and that it was known he was living; ſo as not conceiving it fit to conceal his fears from that Prince, he told him all his thoughts, to the end he might prepare himſelf for going out of the Tents-Royal the night following, or at leaſt to change his Tent, and to go into the Tent of one of thoſe Sauromatian Captains, who were of their intelligence. But ſince it muſt be night before this could be done, they had not time enough for it; for as they were in conſultation what to do, the Captain of the Guard came with fifty followers; ſo that ſince they could not defend themſelves in a Tent as in Houſes, all that Meliantes could do was to go towards the Captain of the Guard, who asked for him from Thomyris, aſſuring Cyrus that he would ſooner dye than diſcover him, and hoping that the Captain of the Guard would be contented with arreſting him: But it was otherwiſe; for in lieu of being contented with Meliantes, they would enter into the Tent from whence he came. Meliantes ſeeing this, he got between the door of the Tent and the Captain of the Guard, and drawing his Sword, ſtopped him, purpoſely to give Cyrus ſo much time as to get out at another door of the Tent, and to get into the Tent of that Sauromatian Captain, of which they had ſpoken: For as luck was, Cyrus was diſguiſed in a Maſſagettan habit ever ſince he came to Meliantes, who could hope for no more, than to gain ſo much time, as till Cyrus got out. But as that Prince would have done ſo, he found that the Captain of the Guard had beſet the Tent round about; and it ſo happned, that the Prince Ariantes paſſed accidentally that way as Cyrus was going out. So as ſeeing an impoſſibility any way to eſcape, he choſe that place to get out at, where happily he might kill his Rival before he was killed himſelf; for being in the mind he was, and conſidering what minds Thomyris and Mandana were in, he had much rather dye, than be a Priſoner unto that Queen, or his Rival: So as this being his reſolution, he drew his Sword, and calling Meliantes unto him, that they might fight both together, he went out of the Tent, accompanied with that generous Aſſirian, and four or five of his men; and ſo ſharply fell upon Ariantes, that though the Captain of the Guard had beſet the Tent round, yet thoſe who were on that ſide where Cyrus went out, could not hinder him from having a blow at that Prince, after he had ſeveral times called him ungrateful Anaxaris, perfidious Anaxaris. Ariantes being on Horſeback, and Cyrus on foot, the blow which he made at that Prince did not hit as it was intended, for the Horſe of that Prince being curvetting as the blow was made, it was the Horſe which received his blow in the flank, and who not being able to endure the fury of the ſtroke, did violently bound, and broak the Sword of Cyrus. Meliantes ſeeing this, out of his heroick generoſity, he gave his unto this illuſtrious Hero, and took another from one of thoſe who followed: After which Ariantes having time to know him to be his Rival, he went towards him, with intention to end all the differences by his death; but his Horſe being much wounded he fell, and his Rider alſo fell under him, who perhaps ſaved the life of his Maſter by his own death. For in this interim, the Captain of the Guard with all his Companions came out of the Tent, and ſo ſurrounded both Cyrus, and his brave Aſſirian, , that they hindred their falling upon Ariantes.

In the mean time, ſince Cyrus would not render himſelf, and ſince the Captain of the Guard would not let him be killed, becauſe Thomyris had expreſly commanded to bring him alive, Cyrus ſeconded by Meliantes, killed ſo great a number of them, that when Ariantes was diſengaged from under his Horſe, he did not think it fit to inſiſt upon ſuch ſtrict orders from Thomyris; ſo as thruſting in among thoſe who would have taken Cyrus, he fell upon him with much vigour; Cyrus warded the blow which he made at him, and returned another ſo ſharply that he was forced to ſtep back.

But whilſt things were in this condition, and whilſt Cyrus and Meliantes could hardly avoid death, conſidering the number of their aſſaulters, and their reſolution not to be taken; Thomyris, whoſe impatiency and inquietude brought her out of her Tent, appeared on Horſeback: So as ſeeing this combat, and hearing the cauſe, ſhe advanced into the midſt of the tumult, forbidding her men from killing of Cyrus, and commanding Cyrus to render himſelf: But Ariantes being ſtrangely incenſed againſt the obſtinate reſiſtance of this Prince, valued not the command which Thomyris gave; but fell again upon his Rival, who had laid the Captain of the Guard dead at his feet: But when Thomyris ſaw this, and obſerved that Cyrus did not ſee Ariantes: She cried out, take heed of your ſelf Cyrus, and guard the blow which one of my rebellious Subjects is making at you

At theſe words, Cyrus who knew well the voice of Thomyris, turned himſelf about, and ſaw that Ariantes was making a moſt furious blow at him, ſo as he warded the blow: But in the mean time, three or four of thoſe who came with the Queen, fell upon him and laid hold of his Arm, and hindering him from continuing his Combat with Ariantes, they preſented him unto Thomyris, who was more joyed to ſee Cyrus in her power, than if ſhe had won a hundred Battels, and conquered as many Kingdoms.

In the mean while, Meliantes ſeeing Cyrus taken, he fell upon Ariantes, who being vexed to the heart that he had not vanquiſhed his Rival, he made a Paſs upon the Aſſirian: Theſe two then like two who would have either death or victory, maintained a fight moſt couragiouſly: Thomyris ſeeing it, and being extreamly angry againſt the Prince her Brother for diſobeying her, and for perpetually oppoſing of her when ſhe offered to perſecute Mandana; ſhe commanded them both to be ſeized upon, and that both the Prince her Brother, Cyrus, and Meliantes ſhould be carefully guarded: So as ſince it was an eaſie matter to take two men who were ſtriving one againſt the other, they were both of them eaſily arreſted: Yet there were ſome who were friends unto Ariantes, that would have made ſome ſtir, but the preſence of Thomyris hindered them.

In the mean time, this Queen not knowing well what thoughts to have of Cyrus, ſhe would not ſpeak unto him, but commanded he ſhould be carried into one of her Tents, and ſo ſtrongly guarded as that there might be no fear of his eſcape. As for Meliantes, he and Intaphernes and Atergatis were put together, that one Guard might ſerve them all. So that when Meriontes, Myrſiles, Chriſantes, and Hidaſpes returned unto the Tents Royal diſguiſed like Maſſagetans, they found Cyrus a Priſoner, that Meliantes was the like: That Ariantes was arreſted; that Intaphernes, Atergatis, and Feraulas were taken, and that Mandana was more ſtrictly guarded than ever: That Thomyris (ſince the impriſonment of her Brother) had changed the Guards of that Princeſs: And indeed they knew not how this ſudden alteration came about: So that to have a little time of conſideration what to do, they went and concealed themſelves in a Tent of one of thoſe Sauromatian Captains with whom Meriontes had treated.

In the mean time, the report of Cyrus being alive did make ſo great a noiſe, that the impriſonment of Ariantes did not make a greater. For nothing almoſt was talked of but Cyrus, and it was ſo much the talk of every one, that Mandana heard of it by her Guards. The Princeſs of Bythinia alſo underſtood from hers, that Intaphernes was arreſted: Iſtrina heard that Atergatis had the ſame deſtiny: And Arpaſia was not ignorant that Meliantes was a Priſoner. So as then looking upon him as more miſerable than Hidaſpes, the tenderneſs of her heart augmented towards him, and ſhe was ſorry to think that ſhe was the cauſe of ſuch an excellent mans misfortune, who had killed two, which had rendred her moſt miſerable if they had lived: Marteſia alſo for her particular heard that Feraulas was in the hands of Thomyris: And Fate had ſo diſpoſed of things, that nothing but ſorrow and deſpair was on all ſides.

When this news was heard in the Army of Cyrus, there was an univerſal murmur: And when it was known in the Army of Thomyris, all thoſe of any reaſon did apprehend that ſhe would by her violences againſt Cyrus, againſt Mandana, and againſt the Prince her Brother, force her own Subjects to arm themſelves againſt her, and joyn with her Enemies.

In the mean time, the great Deſign which was juſt ripe, was now not fit to be executed: For this change had made an alteration in their meaſures; and this great Revolution did ſo blaſt the ſpirits of every one, as that they talked of nothing but what had happened and what was like to happen. But if perſons indifferent were thus perplexed, what is to be thought of perſons intereſted, and amongſt them, the Princeſs Mandana: For after the ſight of that cruel action of Thomyris, when ſhe thought Cyrus was dead, might ſhe not well fear the ſame now while he was living, and in the power of this incenſed Queen? The moſt pleaſing thought ſhe had, was in hopes to ſee Cyrus unfaithful; for (ſaid ſhe unto Doraliſa and Marteſia) ſince Cyrus is diſcontented at me, and ſeems by his Letter to believe that I was not grieved at his death, is it not likely that he will not think himſelf obliged to be faithful unto one whom he thinks perfidious? And ſo ceaſing his ſcorn of Thomyris, he may perhaps begin to hate me? But alas (added ſhe) this is the greateſt advantage I can expect unto my ſelf, if he ſhould do ſo; for if this unfortunate Prince ſay true, he loves me ſtill as perfidious as he thinks me: So as if he continue obſtinate ſtill againſt the cruel Thomyris, perhaps ſhe will cauſe him to be ſtabbed in my preſence: So as I am in ſuch a condition, as I muſt inevitably either ſee Cyrus unfaithful, or dye: Oh moſt cruel neceſſity (cried ſhe out) Oh rigorous Fate! unto what miſeries have you reſerved me, and what ſtrange Torments have you prepared for me? But Oh ye moſt juſt Gods! never let Cyrus accuſe me of any inconſtancy or ingratitude: Clear up his ſpirits I beſeech you, open his eyes, and let him ſee he wrongs the moſt faithful perſon in the world by ſuſpecting her of any infidelity. But alas (ſaid ſhe, and reprehended her ſelf) in wiſhing that Cyrus ſhould know the conſtancy of my affection, perhaps I wiſh his death, and make prayers againſt his life, ſince the more he believes me faithful, the more he will incenſe the cruel Thomyris. Madam (ſaid Doraliſa unto her) there hath happened ſuch wonderful alterations in your life, that methinks you ſhould not deſpair of any thing: For Cyrus was thought to be dead in the Bythinian War; He thought you ready to periſh in the Conflagration of Sinope; he believed you drowned when he found Mazares ready to expire; Mazares himſelf thought ſo a long time; Cyrus was believed ſo over all Aſia, and you your ſelf thought you ſaw him dead with your own eyes.

'Tis true Doraliſa (replied Mandana) that all theſe ſo fell out: But it is a much greater difficulty to imagine how I ſhould come happily out of this miſerable condition wherein I am: For Cyrus is in the power of a moſt cruel perſon, who ſeemed to rejoyce at his death, who looked upon that bloody head of Spitridates, which ſhe thought was his, with much delight; and whoſe ſoul is inſpired with ſuch a violent and furious paſſion as is ready to prompt her unto any thing.

For my part Madam (replied Marteſia) I cannot imagin that Thomyris will be ſo cruel unto Cyrus living, as ſhe was to Cyrus Dead: For when ſhe thought he had loſt his life, perhaps a ſecret ſorrow for his death cauſed all her rage: And thinking him dead, in thoughts of ſcorn unto her, ſhe was cruel unto him after his death, but I cannot believe ſhe will be ſo inhumane unto him living; for hopes both flattering and ſweetning her ſpirit, it will allay her cruelty: Alſo (added Doraliſa) when I conſider how you got out of the power of the King of Aſſiria, of Mazares, and of the King of Pontus, you have reaſon to hope that both Cyrus rus and you will get out of the power of Thomyris: Alas Doraliſa (ſaid Mandana) Cyrus cannot be his own Deliverer, as he might have been mine: And though the Prince Mazares ſhould be as happy as he is brave, and though he ſhould have more generoſity than love, yet I have no grounds for any hope, becauſe I believe that if he do attempt any thing, the life of Cyrus will be the more in danger, ſince Thomyris had rather ſee him dye than delivered. Alſo it grieves me that his Rival is a Priſoner as well as he: For he being obliged unto him, being generous, and having ſome power over his own ſpirit, I might hope if he were at liberty, that he would prevent all ſad conſequences of Thomyris her paſſion: But alas! it hath pleaſed the Gods to deprive me of all relief, and to take all hopes from me.

As Mandana was talking in this ſad manner, Heſionide, all in tears, came and beſeeched this Princeſs to go into Araminta's Tent: For though Thomyris had commanded that all the captive Ladies ſhould be ſevered, yet Araminta was not, by reaſon of her exceſſive ſorrows.

As much grieved as Mandana was for her own intereſts, yet ſhe would not deny aſſiſtance unto a Princeſs whom ſhe ſo much eſteemed; but went into her Tent, and found her in a moſt lamentable condition, for ſhe would never eat any thing ſince ſhe knew of Spitridates his death: She was grown ſo weak, and yet had ſuch a violent Feaver, that it was eaſie to ſee that her grief would ſoon eaſe her of all her pains: Yet her reaſon was very perfect; and though her voice was very faint, yet ſhe could expreſs her ſelf moſt ſenſibly unto Mandana: I beg your pardon Madam (ſaid ſhe unto her) for augmenting your ſorrows by a ſight of mine; yet ſince I have but a few minutes to live, I hoped that you would give me leave to make one requeſt unto you. Alas, Madam, (replied Mandana) My condition is ſo deplorable, that there is nothing in my power but to lament your misfortunes, and weep with you: Yet I aſſure you Madam, that there is nothing but things impoſſible which I would not do for you. My requeſt is (replied the miſerable Araminta) that by the power you have with Ariantes, you will obtain from him that Spitridates and I may have but one Tomb: That you will let the illuſtrious Cyrus know I leave him all the right which I have unto the Kingdom of Pontus: And that I conjure him to keep in memory that unfortunate Prince, who had the glory to reſemble him, and dye in his ſervice. But above all, Madam, I beſeech you, ſo contrive it, that Death may unite what the cruelty of Fate hath ſevered, and that Spitridates and Araminta may have but one Grave. I hope, Madam, (replied Mandana) that you will not ſtand in need of my help, and that you will live to erect a Monument unto that illuſtrious Prince, for whom you grieve. But if you do not, alas, Madam, I ſhall not be able to do that Office which you deſire: For the Prince Ariantes is arreſted by Orders from Thomyris: The miſerable Cyrus is in Fetters, and I am in as great a deſire of death as you are. Do thy worſt, Fortune, do thy worſt (replied Araminta weakly) and after thou haſt taken two Kingdoms from me, deny me a Grave, and deprive me of the only ſatisfaction which I had left, which was my hope that the Prince whom Spitridates reſembled, might be happy. As for you Madam (added ſhe, holding Mandana by the hand) I have nothing to ſay unto you, ſince you have occaſions enough for your own Tears, and your afflictions deſerves them. After this Araminta was ſilent, and turned to the other ſide: And about two hours after ſhe fell into ſuch a profound Lethargy, that ſhe never recovered out of it, but only to pronounce the name of the miſerable Spitridates, and dyed patiently. Such a ſad augmentation of ſorrow as this, filled the imagination of Mandana with all the horrours of death: Yet that of Araminta was moſt worthy of life, and of that paſſion which poſſeſſed her ſoul: For during that quarter of an hour which ſhe recovered, ſhe was full of high expreſſions: She told Mandana, that ſhe did not ſtand in need of all her patience and conſtancy to ſuffer

the loſs of two Kingdoms, and ſuffer exile and impriſonment: But ſhe ſtood in need of more than all ſhe had, to endure the death of Spitridates. She ſpoke moſt obligingly of the Bythinian Princeſs: She recommended Heſionide unto her: She beſeeched the Gods to pardon her weakneſſes and exceſs of ſorrows: Alſo ſhe prayed them to unite her ſpirit, unto the ſpirit of Spitridates. After which, ſhe dyed quietly without any ſtrugling, or loſs of that Beauty which rendred her the moſt charming Princeſs upon Earth, though that was the loweſt of thoſe rare qualities which made her admired.

In the mean time, Mandana endeavoured to do her that office which ſhe deſired, and entreated the Phyſitian of Thomyris, who ſaw her dye, to be a mediator unto this Queen, that Araminta's Tomb and Spitridates might be all one: And this man being much moved with compaſſion, he obtained of Thomyris what Araminta deſired. Thus Death united what Fortune had ſeparated, and theſe two illuſtrious Perſons who could not ſit upon one Throne, did lye both in one Grave. But all this while Ariantes was in moſt incredible torment, in fears leſt Thomyris ſhould take any violent courſe againſt Mandana; and his fears of it were ſuch, that he almoſt wiſhed her in the power of Cyrus, rather than of Thomyris.

On the other ſide, Myrſiles was extreamly grieved at his Arreſt, and that he was not able to do any ſervice unto Mandana, Cyrus, or Doraliſa. Intaphernes and Atergatis were as much grieved as he, but Feraulas was incomparably moſt of all dejected. Meliantes alſo was vexed that Hidaſpes was not a Priſoner, as well as ſome of thoſe who came upon the ſame deſign. The Princeſs of Bythinia grieved for the death of her Brother, for Araminta, and for the impriſonment of her Lover. Iſtrina alſo was ſadly concerned in the affliction of that Princeſs, and in the misfortune of Atergatis: And Arpaſia was very ſad, becauſe Meliantes was a Priſoner, and becauſe ſhe knew not where Hidaſpes was. But put all the miſeries of all theſe perſons together, they were all incomparable to that of Cyrus: For when it came into his thoughts, that his Rival was a Priſoner, becauſe he ſhould not defend the life of Mandana againſt the fury of Thomyris, his grief was beyond all expreſſion: which way ſoever he turned his thoughts, he could find no conſolation. For if he conſidered Thomyris as his Enemy, he could not endure his Fetters: If he thought upon her as his Lover, ſhe was more odious unto him: If he remembred all his Victories, he remembred them with ſorrow, ſince his Fate was changed: If he called to memory the cruelty of Thomyris unto the dead Spitridates, when ſhe took him for himſelf, he prepared himſelf to die in the ſame cruel manner: And if he thought upon Mandana, he thought upon her with unimaginable ſorrow, ſince he thought upon her to be unfaithful, or at leaſt too little ſenſible of his death, and too ſoon comforted at it. And yet this ſad thought did not leſſen his tenderneſs, nor his affection; but by a moſt cruel and ingenuous device of Fate, he was all at once both full of anger, tenderneſs, jealouſie, pity, love and fury: For ſometimes he would complain againſt Mandana, and ſometimes he would complain againſt himſelf in lieu of her. Preſently after, he would curſe Ariantes, and inſtantly after that, he would wiſh him at liberty: Then would he make imprecations againſt Thomyris, and ſometimes againſt himſelf, charging himſelf with all the miſeries of Mandana, with all his own, with all the violences of Thomyris, and alſo with all the affection which his Rivals bore unto the Princeſs whom he adored: ſo as paſſing continually from one ſad thought unto another, he was in perpetual torment: But the ſharpeſt part of all his miſeries was, his opinion that Mandana did not love him, or at leaſt did not love him enough. The cruelty of Thomyris did not ſo much grate upon his Soul, as the want of affection in Mandana did; for he was accuſtomed to ſee Death in his grimeſt look, but he was never uſed to ſee Mandana perfidious, or indifferent. Alſo he had one addition of ſorrow more, when he heard of Araminta's minta's death by one of his Guards, and he ſet that upon the ſcore of his own misfortunes, and began to number them all up. Is it not enough, Oh cruel Fate (cried he out) that I ſhould be miſerable in my own perſon? But I muſt alſo be ſo in the perſons of thoſe whom I love? Muſt Spitridates die becauſe he reſembled me, and was my friend? Muſt Araminta loſe her life, becauſe I profeſſed friendſhip to her? Muſt Meliantes be impriſoned becauſe he protected me? Muſt I be miſerable becauſe Thomyris loves me? and alſo becauſe Mandana loves me not? Fortune makes uſe of all this variety to torment me, and yet I could ſupport them all, were I aſſured of the affection of my Princeſs: But alas, I am far from that happy condition; for ſince ſhe can ſoon comfort her ſelf after my death, it muſt needs be concluded that ſhe values not my life, and therefore why ſhould I, unleſs againſt all reaſon, in hopes of revenge; I had indeed ſome hopes that the Oracle had been fulfilled in Spitridates: But Heavens! I fear it is not, ſince I am under the power of a loving, and yet of an enraged Queen: Mandana is under the power of a proud Rival, and I am out of Mandana's heart; and therefore I were abſolutely out of my wits, if I ſhould hope for any reſt, but in Death, yet thanks be unto the Gods, I am not capable of ſuch a weakneſs.

But whilſt Cyrus was reaſoning with himſelf in this ſad manner, Thomyris was ſo full of unquiet diſtempers, as ſhe was not half a quarter of an hour in one mind. Gelonide knowing the very bottom of her heart, ſhe diſcovered all the tumultuous thoughts of her Soul unto her. I perceive Gelonide (ſaid ſhe unto her, ſeeing her look earneſtly upon her) that you deſire to dive into my thoughts, but let me tell you, it is very difficult, for they wander upon ſo many ſeveral ſubjects, as they continually ſmother one another: and ſuch is the agitation of my Soul, that it would ſuffer much leſs if I were in the condition of Cyrus: And yet (replied Gelonide) that Prince is in a very ill condition; and I believe that if your Majeſty conſider it well, you will find a great difference between your fortune and his. Were I at peace with my ſelf, Gelonide, (replied Thomyris) you were in the right: But alas, there is ſuch a Civil War in my heart, that ſhivers it into pieces: For when I think how this Prince ſlighted me both under the name of Artamenes and Cyrus, I cannot chooſe but hate him: And I am reſolved to put Mandana to death, to let him ſee her dead, and then to put him to death alſo: For if I conſider him upon that account, I cannot think upon any puniſhment which he deſerves not, he has ſcorned me enough to merit a thouſand deaths; he hath blaſted my glory, he hath made the blood of my Subjects run like Rivers, and he hath cauſed my Sons death. So as looking upon him upon this accompt, and having him in my power, I am often in a mind to taſte the ſweets of a full revenge.

But alas, theſe thoughts laſt but a while: and when I conſider Cyrus as the greateſt Prince upon Earth, and as the moſt excellently accompliſhed man in the whole world, my revenge dies, and I am ready to excuſe him. Yes, Gelonide, ſometimes I tell my ſelf that he loved Mandana before e're he ſaw me; that he does no wrong unto me in not loving me, and that I am obliged unto him for ſparing my life, when he might eaſily have killed me in the Sauromatian Wood: But after all theſe Conſiderations, my Soul is never the quieter; for the leſs reaſon I find to accuſe Cyrus, the more I find to accuſe my ſelf: But Gelonide, my greateſt grief is, that Cyrus doth moſt horridly hate me, eſpecially ſince the time that the violence of my Love and Jealouſie did prompt me unto that act of cruelty, which yet I only did, becauſe he had been cruel unto me. But as oft as I think upon Cyrus, unto whom I have expreſſed a thouſand teſtimonies of Love, and that he ſhould know of this terrible effect of my hatred, I am vexed beyond my expreſſion: For the truth is, I have a deſire to ſee him, and yet I dare not, after this act of cruelty whereof he is not ignorant. 'Tis true, that if he do me juſtice, he will excuſe my cruelty, and Cyrus living ring doubtleſs ought to think himſelf obliged unto me, for what I did againſt Cyrus dead, ſince my inhumanity was as well an effect of my Love, as all thoſe teſtimonies of tenderneſs which I gave him upon a thouſand occaſions. Truly, Madam, (ſaid Gelonide) unto her) ſince Cyrus can never be unfaithful unto Mandana, as long as you give him ſo many cauſes to hate you: It is not probable he ſhould love you now, he may charge you with more hatred than love: And therefore your Majeſty would do very well to re-eſtabliſh your glory by ſome great and high action, ſuch an Act as would regain the eſteem of Cyrus. If you ſhould now ſet Cyrus and Mandana free, and ſend them to the King of Medes, you would do an Act which would render your glory immortal. Ah Gelonide, (ſaid Thomyris, and interrupted her) I know very well that I ought to love my glory above Cyrus: But I have found by long experience that I cannot, and therefore without any conſideration of generoſity, or reaſon, or virtue, I muſt take ſuch a courſe as Cyrus may reign in my Dominions, and in my heart: And when all hopes of that is gone, then ſhall my fury have no limits: and if I cannot ruin Cyrus and Mandana, unleſs I ruin Ariantes and my ſelf alſo, I will not ſtick to ſacrifice all unto my revenge.

But, Madam, (ſaid Gelonide) I beſeech you conſider, that though you have Cyrus in your power, yet you have a formidable Army to fight againſt: Mazares is a brave man, the Relief which Ciaxares ſends, is puiſſant, and the Prince Ariantes is not in the head of your Army. I value not my own ſafety (replied Thomyris) and therefore Gelonide, without any further conſideration of theſe dangers wherewith you threaten me, which perhaps are not ſo great as you imagin, I will think upon nothing but to get ſo much boldneſs as to ſee Cyrus. But, Madam, (ſaid Gelonide unto her) I would gladly know what you do aim at in ſo doing? I intend (replied Thomyris) to do all things poſſible both juſt and unjuſt, which may induce Cyrus to quit Mandana, and anſwer my affection: and if I find there is no hopes of any good upon him, I will puniſh Ariantes for his old Rebellion, to the end that he may be no obſtacle unto my Revenge: Then I will have Mandana ſtabbed before the eyes of Cyrus: I will mingle the blood of Cyrus and Mandana together, and perhaps I will kill my ſelf, if I find this revenge not ſweet enough. Alas, Madam, (cried out Gelonide) what ſtrange thoughts are theſe? Alas Gelonide (replied Thomyris) what ſtrange thoughts may not a Queen have, who loves a man which ſlights her.

After this, Gelonide offered to ſay ſomething, but Thomyris commanded ſilence, and without more delay ſhe went unto the Tent of Cyrus, waited upon by the Lieutenant of her Guard, and ſome of his Company which ſtayed at the Tent-door, and kept Centinel with the reſt of that Princeſs's Guard: This Queen having no other Women with her but Gelonide; for though ſhe did not approve of her opinion, yet ſhe loved her, and always carried her with her, becauſe ſhe was the only perſon unto whom ſhe diſcovered her love. But in her way thither, Thomyris, as fierce as ſhe was, her heart was ſtrangely aſhamed, yet the force of her paſſion overcoming all; She entred into the Tent of Cyrus, without giving him any notice, ſo as he was ſtrangely ſurprized at this viſit: Yet having a great Soul, a reſolute ſpirit, and a generous heart, there appeared no diſorder in his Countenance, but he ſhut up all his reſentments in his heart: And indeed, he no ſooner ſaw Thomyris, but he ſaluted her with all reverence that was due unto the Queen of Maſſagettes, and it was with all the coldneſs that was due unto the Enemy of Mandana, and a Queen that had given him ſuch a publick teſtimony of her hatred, as to plunge that Head in a Baſon of Blood.

As for Thomyris, ſhe no ſooner ſaw Cyrus, but ſhame at her own inhumanity made her bluſh, and hindred her from ſpeaking firſt: So as that Prince coming towards her; is it to demand my Head, Madam, (ſaid he unto her with a moſt Heroick boldneſs) that you have taken this pains to come hither? to the end that ſeeing it cut off with your own eyes, you may not be deceived the ſecond time as you were at the firſt? When I reſolved to ſee you, Sir, (replied ſhe, and carried him to the other end of the Tent) I prepared my ſelf for your reproaches, that I might have ſome right to retort them: For unjuſt Prince, there is a notable difference betwixt the cruelty which I have uſed unto you, and that which you have uſed unto me. For that terrible Act which ſeems unto you ſo full of inhumanity, was only a rapture of my deſpair, in a belief that your laſt words were ſigns of love unto Mandana, and of your hatred unto me. But though I was inhumane unto you, when I thought you could not be ſenſible of my cruelty; yet you were inhumane and cruel unto me, when I was ſenſible even of the leaſt of your ſlights: and though I only plunged in blood the Head of Cyrus ſuppoſed dead, yet you tear my heart in pieces living, yet unjuſt Prince, you were the firſt that began the cruelty, and if I was ſo, it was after you had made me loſe my patience, and diſordered my reaſon. Yet though you are my priſoner, and by the right of Conquerors I may diſpoſe of you as I pleaſe, yet I will only tell you, the ſooner to induce you to quit Mandana: That unleſs I comfort my ſelf ſo ſoon after your death as ſhe did, ſhe hath wronged you more than I have done by that act of cruelty, wherewith you upbraid me, and wherewith I upbraid my ſelf: For truly my fury and my hatred was an effect of my paſſion, but her forgetfulneſs was an effect of a light ſoul, and faint feeble affection.

Therefore without asking, or beſeeching you to love me, I will only beſeech you not to love her any longer: That you will give your conſent ſhe ſhould marry Ariantes whom ſhe hates not: that I may ſend her unto Iſſedon with the Prince whom ſhe ſhall marry. And that you will promiſe me never to ſee her again, upon theſe conditions, I will deliver you, and will not oblige you unto any acknowledgment of my affection. If you ſhould peremptorily command me to love you, Madam, replied he, though you have given me reaſon to hate you; yet it would be leſs impoſſible for me to obey you, then it would be for me not to love Mandana, though ſhe were perfidious unto me: For the truth is, Madam you are a great Beauty, you have a great Soul, a high heart, and a thouſand excellent qualities, which as great an Enemy as you are, does move me to eſteem you: So that without infidelity to her whom I love and adore, I could be very friendly and eſteeming of you: But, Madam, I can never leave loving Mandana, nor conſent ſhe ſhould marry Ariantes, nor promiſe you never to ſee her again.

The truth is, though I ſhould know of a moſt infallible certainty, that ſhe had left off loving me, yet I could never leave off loving her, without leaving off to live, nor endure ſhe ſhould be enjoyed by another, without doing my utmoſt to prevent it, at the hazard of a thouſand lives, which I ſhould never value above my glory, or my Love: And therefore, Madam, never expect I ſhould promiſe you more than I am able to perform: For I know that though I ſhould be ſo baſe as to make ſuch a promiſe unto you, yet I ſhould be no ſooner at liberty, but I ſhould Arm all Aſia the ſecond time to pull Mandana out of the Arms of my Rival.

Therefore, Madam, I beſeech you for your own tranquilities ſake, never think that I have ſuch a kind of ſpirit as can ſubmit and crouch unto any ill fortune; but on the contrary, be confident that if I were in the head of two hundred thouſand men, and you my priſoner, I would do more for you, than now I am in your Fetters: The truth is, Madam, ſince I am perſwaded that it is glorious not to grant that which cannot be denied without danger, I will not promiſe you to leave loving Mandana, or conſent ſhe ſhould marry Ariantes, nor promiſe you to ſee her no more: Since of theſe three things which I ask (replied Thomyris ſharply) there is one of them which depends abſolutely upon me, and not at all upon you, I cannot tell whether it be prudence in you, to incenſe any by your arrogant generoſity, for I need not your conſent to hinder you from ever ſeeing Mandana; not need it in Ariantes marriage of her, for ſince if I will, I can look upon you as the murtherer of my Son: If the fancy take me I ſhall lock you up eternally in my Chains. As Fortune hath brought me hither into them againſt my will (replied Cyrus) ſo ſhe may chance to take me out againſt yours: And therefore, Madam, without any reguard unto your needleſs threatnings, I will tell you with all poſſible ſincerity, that could I ever have been unfaithful unto Mandana, your charms, Madam, would have made me ſo, when I was in your Court under the name of Artamenes. And I muſt ingeniouſly confeſs, that I gave her a greater teſtimony of my Love in not loving you, than in the taking of Babylon, Sardis, and Cumes: Since certainly it is a more eaſie matter to win Battels and take Towns, than to defend ones heart againſt ſuch a perſon as you were, when I had the honour firſt to ſee you. For to tell you truly, Madam, Though you be as fair now as then you were, yet you are leſs terrible to me now than you were than: For truly as ſoon as you began to perſecute Mandana, as ſoon as ever you began to be cruel, and would needs make your ſelf loved by terrour, you loſt all that would make you amiable. I cannot tell (ſaid ſhe, and in a rage interrupted him) whether I can make my ſelf loved, but I am ſure I can make my ſelf be obeyed. And I perceive if I will ever have any reſt, I muſt hate you living as I did when you were dead, and ſeek out my ſatisfaction in revenge.

After this Thomyris went away and ſtayed not for the anſwer of Cyrus, and ſhe carried with her more thoughts of fury than love, ſhe was vexed at the Soul, becauſe ſhe had not ſaid enough, to tender his heart, ſhe repented of every word ſhe pronounced, and ſometimes ſhe thought that if ſhe had gone the mild way, ſhe had bettter effected her deſires. And ſometimes again ſhe thought that if ſhe had menaced him with the death of Mandana, it would have ſtaggered his conſtancy: So as being unſatisfied with her ſelf, both at what ſhe had done, and what ſhe ſhould have done, ſhe was moſt inſufferably tormented.

On the other ſide, Cyrus was in a miſerable condition; for not knowing that ſhe had ſeen that Letter which he had writ unto Mandana, he thought that what ſhe had ſpoke concerning Mandana's Levity, had a right ground, and was grieved to the very ſoul at it.

But whilſt the ſouls of Cyrus and Thomyris were thus diſquieted, Meriontes who was conceal'd amongſt the Sauromatian Captains, with Mirſiles, Hydaſpes, and Chryſantes, they continued the ſame deſign on foot, which once was ready for Execution: The friends of Ariantes alſo bethinking themſelves how to deliver this Prince, and knowing how the Sauromates were diſcontented, did make a Propoſition to joyn with them, and get Ariantes out of the hands of Thomyris: The Sauromatian Captains without giving any poſitive anſwer unto thoſe who made this Propoſition, acquainted Myrſiles, Hydaſpes, Meriontes, and Chryſantes with it: Who all conceived, that if they could unite the friends of Ariantes unto theirs, that Thomyris would be infallibly loſt, and that Cyrus and Mandana would be delivered: The reaſon why they hoped this was not impoſſible was, becauſe they knew that the friends of Ariantes were afraid Thomyris would put that Prince to death; for ſince he once went about to take a Crown from her, they thought that ſhe would ſeek for a colour to palliate her revenge upon him: So as imagining that if this union could be made it would make much for the advantage of Cyrus, theſe Sauromatian Captains entertained the motion, and brought things to that paſs, that the friends of Ariantes conferred with the friends of Cyrus: But ſince neither ſide could anſwer for thoſe Princes for whom they tranſacted; they agreed that both ſides ſhould endeavour to make known the ſtate of things unto them: And in order to that, Myrſiles, and Meriontes found out means to ſend word unto Creſſus, and Mazares, that they ſhould attempt nothing until they heard further from them.

In the mean time, there paſſed not a day in which Thomyris had not ſome new perſecution for Cyrus and Mandana: For ſhe obliged all the priſoner-Princes to ſee Cyrus one after another, and to perſwade him not to pretend any more unto Mandana: Alſo ſhe would have all the reſt of the Captives in their turns to ſee Mandana, and move her to marry Ariantes, and ſhe ſpoke her ſelf unto the Prince her Brother, (and perſwaded him not to think any more of marrying Mandana, but to give her over unto her vengeance; for this violent Queen was come to that paſs that ſhe thought no more of making Cyrus love her, but only to take his Love off her whom he adored. So that when ſhe ſaw it a thing impoſſible to perſwade Mandana ever to marry Ariantes; ſhe had a fancy to perſwade Ariantes to let her be put to death. That which I deſire of you Brother (ſaid ſhe unto him) you ſhould methinks ask me, and ſhould deſire to be revenged of a ſtrong hearted perſon who ſcorns and hates you: And though you had no other advantage by it, but to imagine the ſorrows of your Rival, yet that were enough to move your conſent unto it.

If you will ſuffer me (replied Ariantes roughly) to go and ponyard Cyrus, I ſhall perhaps conſent that you ſhall poyſon Mandana: I agree unto your propoſition, (anſwered Thomyris ſuddenly.) Oh moſt cruel Princeſs, (ſaid Ariantes then) what a moſt abominable Love is yours? No, no (added he) deceive not your ſelf; I am the Enemy of Cyrus, but I will never be his Butcher. And moreover I do moſt ſolemnly proteſt, that if you attempt any thing againſt the life of Mandana, yours ſhall infallibly anſwer for it; for though I cannot get out of your chains, yet I have friends who will revenge your cruelty, and I doubt not but all the world will arm themſelves and ruin you.

Thomyris ſeeing with what an Aire Ariantes ſpoke this, was aſhamed, but it was a ſhame accompanied with anger, which made her expreſs her ſelf infinitely angry at that Prince: You think perhaps (ſaid ſhe unto him) to get upon that Throne which once you rebelliouſly mounted: But let me tell you, that I will keep you in my fetters as a vanquiſhed Uſurper, and as a rebellions Subject.

After this, that enraged Queen left him, and left him with thoughts of hatred, as great and violent againſt him as againſt Mandana, and her reſolution were as cruel againſt him as againſt her, ſhe knew ſhe was in the wrong, but that knowledg did not induce her to repent, but rather increaſed her fury. Yet in the midſt of all theſe turbulences ſhe ſent orders unto all the Officers of the army and endeavoured to diſpoſe of things that ſhe might be the Commander of Cyrus and Mandana's deſtiny: She had a thouſand deſires to ſee that Prince again, and try if ſhe could overcome his mind by a thouſand teſtimonies of tenderneſs and affection, but the arrogant pride of her heart, and ſhame together, would not give her leave, but contented her ſelf with cauſing him to be told that ſhe asked no more then that he would pretend no more unto Mandana: So as by this means Cyrus ſaw himſelf delivered from the neceſſity of any conference with her, nor could this Queen ever tell Mandana, any more that ſhe required of her to yeild Cyrus unto her, but only that ſhe ſhould marry Araintes: Thus Thomyris thought to hide ſome part of her weakneſs, and conſerve her modeſty a litle more. Yet ſomtimes ſhe would expreſs ſuch viſible teſtimonies of her paſſion that all about her could not doubt it; for ſhe would continually be asking what Cyrus did, and what he ſaid? whether he did not murmur againſt her? whether he ſpoke of Mandana? and a thouſand ſuch like, and what was moſt ſtrange, ſhe would ſomtimes ask men who neither did, nor could know any thing; for none except the Guards, and ſuch as ſhe commanded, ever ſaw him. So as it was impoſſible for Myrſiles, Hydaſpes, Meriontes, and Chryſantes, to acquaint Cyrus with the treaty which they had with the friends of Ariantes, who alſo on their ſide could not make their intentions known unto their Prince; ſo that aſſembling one night in the Tent of one of the Sauromatian Captains, where Myrſiles, Hydaſpes, Meriontes, and Chryſantes were concealed, they reſolved, knowing the generoſity of thoſe two Princes, to go on with that Treaty, as if they conſented; aſſuring themſelves that they would not be againſt it.

Whilſt they were aſſembled to that end, Meliantes eſcaped his Guards, and came thither; much augmenting their hopes by ſeeing their ſide ſtrengthned by ſuch a valiant man, who had intelligence of many things which Meriontes had not known but for him: Yet Hydaſpes was troubled to ſee his Rival the Protector of Cyrus, and Meliantes was aſtoniſhed to ſee Hidaſpes in that place, yet conſidering how the caſe of Cyrus, and all things elſe ſtood, he looked upon him in this buſineſs, as the friend of Cyrus rather then as the Lover of Arpaſia, ſo as telling him the ſtate of affairs, he was of their opinion and concluded that there was an abſolute neceſſity of uniting themſelves to deliver Cyrus and Ariantes. He who negotiated moſt for Ariantes was a Meſſagettan called Otryades, who had been the friend of Aripithes, and who had a great deſire to ſee Ariantes King; ſo as excepting againſt nothing which the friends of Cyrus propounded, ſo Ariantes might be delivered and out of the power of Thomyris, the Treaty, was quickly concluded and agreed upon. They promiſed a mutual aſſiſtance to execute this great deſign; they ſwore they would fight joyntly againſt thoſe that would oppoſe the Liberty of Cyrus and Ariantes, and when thoſe two Princes were free, they would addreſs themſelves unto them to know what they would have them do, every one then to have the Liberty to take which ſide they pleaſed, in caſe thoſe Princes could not continne friends: Yet there was one difficulty which Otryades ſtopt at, for the friends of Cyrus would have the firſt attempt that was made upon the Tents Royal to deliver Cyrus, and the other ſide would have Ariantes firſt delivered: Then there was an expedient propoſed to reconcile the matter which was to go, and fall upon the Tents Royal of Thomyris, and ſecure her perſon, for (ſaid he who made the Propoſition) by aſſuring your ſelves of that Queen, you will deliver both Cyrus, Ariantes, and Mandana: But though there was ſome colour of reaſon in this Propoſition, yet the friends of Cyrus would not accept of it, becauſe they ſaid that if they ſhould fall upon Thomyris at firſt they ſhould hazard themſelves to be overcome, ſince it was impoſſible but the people would arm themſelves for the defence of their Queen, whereas on the contrary, if their deſign appeared to be only to deliver Cyrus, they will not ſtir, ſo as finding no reſiſtance, the thing will be more eaſily executed: Adding that if once they had Cyrus in the head of them, then victory would certainly be theirs. Otryades anſwered unto this, that it's true the Liberty of Cyrus was more eaſily gotten that way, but not the Liberty of Ariantes, ſince it depended after that upon the will of his Rival. So as finding out a middle way between theſe two extreams, Myrſiles propoſed to make two aſſaults at once, ſo as to amuſe Thomyris the more who would be forced to divide her forces. So then it was reſolved that this expedient propounded by Myrſiles ſhould be followed, and that the Tents where Cyrus and Ariantes were guarded ſhould be ſet upon both at once: That they ſhould not go unto that of Mandana, becauſe they would leave the glory of delivering her unto the two Princes: That in the mean time they ſhould promiſe each other, that they who did firſt execute their deſign, and had effected it, they ſhould go immediately and aſſiſt the other to execute theirs, and that they ſhould oblige the Prince whom they had delivered to go and help to deliver his Rival. Theſe things being thus reſolved upon, they waited for the day, and hour of Execution. They ſent away immediately unto Creſſus and Mazares, to the end they might fall upon the Camp of Thomyris; when the Sauromates came to the Tents Royal to joyn with the friends of Cyrus and Ariantes, and to the end they might ſend unto Artabates to fall upon Andramites with part of his forces, and ſend the reſt to entrench themſelves between the Tents Royal, and the Camp of Thomyris: Thus it was reſolved that after four days, and juſt at midnight after, this great deſign ſhould be executed: But at the end of this conference, Meriontes knowing upon what terms both Meliantes and Hydaſpes were, he came unto them, and very diſcreetly obliged them to refer all their difference until Cyrus was delivered, ſo as both of them being perſwaded unto it with equal generoſity, they unanimouſly tranſacted together for the intereſt of this great Prince, as if they had never been Rivals. Thus Meliantes looked upon Hydaſpes as the friend of Cyrus, and Hydaſpes looked upon Meliantes as the Protector of this Hero.

In the interim, thoſe, for whom this great deſign was in tranſaction, were not a jot the leſs miſerable, but ſaw ſo little likelihood of any alteration in their fortunes, that they did not only ſuffer under their preſent afflictions, but alſo under the fears of thoſe which would infallibly fall upon them in the future: Yet Thomyris was in a worſe condition than they, becauſe her hopes were leſs than theirs; and all the ſweetneſs that ſhe had in life, was only in the long torments which ſhe was preparing for thoſe who rendred her ſo unhappy. But her principal drift was, to put oft that Winter without fighting, to the end that the Army of Cyrus might be forced to retreat on the other ſide of Araxes, it not being poſſible it ſhould ſubſiſt in an Enemies Country, by continual ſupplies ſo far fetched.

As Thomyris was in this mind, and in order unto that, ſending Order upon Order not to hazard a fight, at leaſt, unleſs upon ſome great advantage, there chanced an accident, which much augmented her inquietudes: For as it is a hard matter that a great ſecret known unto many men ſhould be long undiſcovered, eſpecially when it is amongſt perſons of ſeveral ſides: ſo there was one of Ariantes his Friends, Kinſman unto Otryades, who ſeeing this great deſign ripe, and that it would be executed the next day at midnight, he began to repent; for ſince he knew not how far the generoſity of Cyrus might extend, he imagined that when this Prince was delivered, he would load Thomyris with the ſame Chains wherein he had been fettered: That he would ruin Ariantes; that he would make all the Maſſagettans Tributaries, or elſe in revenge would quite extirpate them. So as wondring that he ſhould have theſe thoughts no ſooner, he repented of his engagement with Otryades; and his repentance went ſo far, that he intended to betray all thoſe unto whom he had promiſed fidelity. 'Tis true, he thought that by acquainting Thomyris, he ſhould oblige her to deliver Ariantes: So, without more delay he went unto the Queen ſecretly in the night, and deſired private conference: At the firſt, he deſired of her a promiſe of Ariantes his liberty, in caſe he acquainted her with ſuch things as ſhould let her ſee he had done her the beſt ſervice that ever any did. But ſince that Queen would not engage her ſelf unto any ſuch promiſe, he then told her that he would impart no further unto her: Thomyris being incenſed at him, ſaid, that it was not his duty to capitulate with her, but bad him know, that he was in her Tent, that ſhe was Miſtreſs, both of his liberty and life, and therefore ſhe would make him tell all he knew, without any conditions.

This man being terrified by the fury of Thomyris, he told her all he knew concerning the deſign which was to be executed the night following; alſo he did ſo punctually circumſtance the buſineſs, that ſhe did not doubt of any thing he ſaid, ſo as ſhe was infinitely amazed and perplexed; and to confirm her belief, Agathirſis ſent to acquaint her, that part of Artabates his Troops drew near them, and that he could not dive into the deſign of it: That he underſtood alſo by ſome Priſoners which he had taken, that there was ſome great enterpriſe preparing in the Camp of Cyrus, and that he thought himſelf obliged to tell her how he underſtood that there was a Confederacy amongſt ſome Officers in her Army. Thomyris finding a Concurrence with what the Kiſman of Otryades had told her, her ſoul was ſo perplexed, that ſhe knew not what to reſolve upon.

At the firſt ſhe intended to arreſt Myrſiles, Meliantes, Hidaſpes, Meriontes, and Chryſantes, in the Tent where this Kinſman unto Otryades ſaid they were: But upon ſecond thoughts ſhe conſidered, that though they were arreſted, yet they were but five men; that this would not hinder the Sauromates from ſevering from her Army, and from coming to the Tents Royal; nor would it hinder Creſſus and Mazares from falling upon her Camp, nor Artabates from aſſaulting Andramites, nor the reſt of his Forces from encamping between the Tents Royal and her Camp; And that ſo ſhe ſhould only make a great noiſe to no purpoſe, and perhaps haſten the execution of that deſign which would ruine her: So as not knowing neither what to do, nor what to think. ſhe was almoſt out of her wits: But ſince her greateſt care was to hinder Cyrus and Mandana from ever being happy together, her deſign was to make ſure of them, and that their lives might be in her power, in caſe ſhe was forced to fly: And in order to that, ſhe commanded that Mandana ſhould be immediately removed out of that Tent where ſhe was unto another, near that where Cyrus was kept; to the end, that if her party proved the weaker, ſhe might put them to death before ſhe fled. For ſhe conceived that if the deſign of her Enemies did take, ſhe could not be in a condition to carry them unto Iſſedon, as her intention was to retire her ſelf if ſhe was forced. Alſo ſhe gave orders that double Guards ſhould be ſet upon Ariantes: She commanded the Tent wherein Myrſiles, Meliantes, Hidaſpes, Meriontes, and Chryſantes were concealed, to be ſet round in the evening: She commanded all the Cavalry ſhe had to be ready upon a minutes warning: And ſhe acquainted all the Officers of her Army with what the Kinſman of Ortyades had told her; alſo ſhe ordered all the Souldiers to be ready in Arms, and ſhe her ſelf made choice of him whom ſhe intended for the Murtherer of Cyrus and Mandana, and accordingly ſhe ſent for that Gelon Captain, who preſented her the head of Spitridates in lieu of the head of Cyrus, and propounded this cruel act unto him; for knowing him to be a man that was void of all humanity, and ſo corrupt, ſhe believed he would obey her in any thing; and indeed ſhe was not deceived in him, for this barbarous Gelon promiſed her to ponyard Cyrus and Mandana, whenſoever ſhe gave the word: And to that end ſhe gave him abſolute command over all thoſe who guarded them, and permitted him alſo to have many of his own Souldiers with him, in whom he truſted more, than in the former Guards of thoſe two illuſtrious Perſons, who plainly perceived by this change, that ſome bad intentions were towards. This Gelon Captain being naturally harſh and cruel, he treated them in a manner much different than they were before: For Mandana durſt not ſo much as whiſper unto Doraliſa, or Marteſia, or Heſionide, who now waited upon her, and Cyrus had not ſo much liberty as to ſpeak unto any of the Guard.

But whilſt Thomyris was diſperſing her ſeveral Commanders, the night came on, and all thoſe who laboured for the liberty of Cyrus, Ariantes, and Mandana, prepared themſelves for the execution of the deſign; Myrſiles, Meliantes, Hidaſpes, Meriontes, and Chryſantes, were much ſurprized when they heard that Mandana's Tent was changed, and that there were ſome men in Arms, who beſet the Tent wherein they were. Otryades alſo wondred that he did not ſee his Kinſman, and the more when he heard that he was ſeen to go into the Tent of Thomyris, and being a man of much honeſty, he ſent ſecretly to advertiſe Myrſiles, Meliantes, Hidaſpes, Meriontes, and Chriſantes of his fears: So as they began to conſult what they ſhould do to get into ſome place where they might ſafely wait until they heard that the Sauromates, who were to quit the Camp of Thomyris, were come, and had made an aſſault upon thoſe who guarded the Tents Royal, and conceiving there was no ſafe ſtaying in that Tent wherein they were, they got the habits of Slaves upon their own, and as ſoon as ever it began to be dark, they went out at ſeveral doors unto another Tent where Chriſantes carried them, and where he and Feraulas lay hid when they diſguiſed themſelves like Maſſagettans, and came to enquire of their illuſtrious Maſter: Otryades alſo ſhifted his Tent, and aſſembled ſo many of his friends about him, as it had not been an eaſie matter to take him, though it had been attempted.

In the mean time, Thomyris was in a ſtrange perplexity as ſoon as the night came; for conſidering the intelligence which ſhe had received, ſhe had a deſire to be in the head of her Army: But not being able to be far from Cyrus and Mandana, ſince ſhe would be ſure to diſpoſe of their lives, therefore ſhe would ſtay in the Tents Royal: And in the midſt of all her violent thoughts, ſhe found ſome ſweetneſs in thinking, that though all her Army were defeated, though the Tents Royal were forced, and though ſhe were forced to fly, yet ſhe could prevent Cyrus and Mandana from being delivered, ſince it was in her power to put them to death as ſoon as ſhe ſaw no other hopes. To that end, ſhe would not go to Bed that Night, but be in readineſs to give Orders as ſhe ſaw occaſion, and to fly, if forced. But at laſt the fatal time of diſturbing the ſerenity of that quiet night being come, every one from ſeveral Quarters began to act their buſineſs at ſuch a juſt hour, that almoſt at the very ſame inſtant Artabates fell upon Andramites at the entrance of the Wood; Creſſus and Mazares aſſaulted the Camp of Thomyris; The Sauromatians came to the Tents Royal, half of Artabates his Forces got between the Camp and the Tents Royal, and the Friends of Cyrus and Ariantes met in the place appointed: And indeed as ſoon as the Sauromates began the Aſſault, the Friends of Cyrus and Ariantes divided themſelves; one went to the Tent of Cyrus, the other to that of Ariantes, each of theſe couragious Troops, conſiſting of about a hundred ſtout Souldiers, which they had ſecretly made ſure of: So as Thomyris hearing by ſeveral ways at one time that her Camp was aſſaulted; That Forces had got betwixt and cut off all Communication, that others would fall upon the Tents Royal, and that ſome alſo would aſſault the Tents of Cyrus and Ariantes, ſhe was more perplexed than is imaginable. In this great diſorder, ſhe commanded that they ſhould defend that Tent wherein Cyrus was as her own, and indeed that wherein the Prince was, and that wherein Mandana was, were ſo cloſe to hers, that they all made but one.

In the mean time, according to the Maſſagettan cuſtom in popular tumults, or in ſurprizals of War, every one began to ſet a Light upon the tops of their Tents, to the end they might diſtinguiſh between Friends and Enemies: So as hard by this huge multitude of Tents, having every one a Lamp like a guilded Apple wherewith the Maſſagettans uſed to adorn the tops of their Tents, they made ſuch a pleaſant ſhew, and gave ſuch a light as one might eaſily know Friends from Foes. The Tent of Thomyris ſtanding in the midſt, and the higheſt, ſhe might diſcern from thence the noiſe which the Sauromatians made in aſſaulting the Tents Royal: The noiſe which Otryades made in aſſaulting the Tent of Ariantes; that which Myrſiles, Meliantes, Hidaſpes, Merientes, Chryſantes and their company made in forcing thoſe who guarded a bar which was before the firſt door of the Tent where Cyrus was, which Tent was ſo contrived, that they muſt paſs through three Tents before they came into that wherein he was, and by conſequence they had three Courts of Guard to force.

Thomyris hearing ſuch a tumultuous hurly burly from all parts, did prepare her ſelf for flight, and indeed there were Horſes ready behind the Tent, and thoſe who were to wait upon her were ready alſo; and ſhe called for a Ponyard, to the end ſhe might be Miſtreſs of her own life, as well as of the lives of Cyrus and Mandana, and never become a Captive to her Enemies.

Every minute ſome came to acquaint her with the ſtate of things, and every minute ſhe received a freſh affliction: Creſſus and Mazares having faln upon the Camp of Thomyris at the ſame time when the Sauromates fell upon the Tents Royal, they had put them into ſuch great diſorder, that all the valour of Agatherſis, and of all the reſt of the High Officers, could not keep their men from ſinking under their own fears: So as thinking it fit to acquaint Thomyris with the ſtate of things, Agatherſis was ſo plain with her, as ſhe knew that ſince ſuch a valiant man as he deſpaired of victory, ſhe might well fear the worſt.

On the other ſide, the Sauromates, who aſſaulted the Tents Royal, fighting as well to revenge their dead Prince, as to deliver Cyrus, their animoſity was ſo great, that their valour was terrible, ſo as Thomyris ſaw all went wrong with her: But her greateſt grief was, thoſe who would force the Tent where Cyrus was were Maſters of the firſt Bar, and were fighting for the firſt entrance into the Tent. Her greateſt aſtoniſhment was, that the People would not ſtir againſt the Sauromates, nor offer to relieve her: For ſince they thought the impriſonment of Cyrus to be unjuſt, they wiſhed that he and Mandana were both at liberty, in a thought that then the war would ſoon be at an end.

Thomyris ſeeing her ſelf in this extremity, had but the choice of theſe two ways before her flight, either to leave Cyrus and Mandana happy in their liberty, or elſe to put them to death. A thought of Juſtice, Generoſity, and Love gave ſome repugnancy unto ſuch a tragical reſolution; but on the other ſide, Love being accompanied with Jealouſie, Deſpair, and Fury, ſhe thought that ſince there was no hopes of enjoying the party loved, there was no way but revenge: Yet ſhe ſtood and ſtudied a while, as unreſolved, and would tarry till the very laſt extremity, before ſhe did execute her cruel reſolution. She intended to ponyard Mandana before ſhe killed Cyrus; and ſhe intended, during this great tumult, to try once more if ſhe could tender the heart of that Prince: But as ſhe entred into his Tent, ſhe heard him name her, ſo as ſtaying to hear what he ſaid, ſhe changed her mind: For Cyrus being in a ſtrange inquietude to know the cauſe of ſo great a noiſe which he heard, he asked that cruel Captain of the Gelons whether Thomyris had deſigned him for his Butcher, and he anſwering him as arrogantly, as if he were to ponyard him him preſently, Cyrus could not hold from ſpeaking ſharply unto him, I plainly ſee (ſaid he unto him) that thou art fit to be the murthering Miniſter of that cruel Queens injuſtice, and who had never been in a condition to perſecute Mandana, if I had killed her as I eaſily could in the Wood of the Sauromates. That thou mayſt not upbraid me for letting thee live, (cried out the fierce Thomyris) as thou doſt upbraid thy ſelf in ſparing my life, I will cauſe thee to be ſtabbed as ſoon as Mandana has given up her laſt breath; and all the favour that thou canſt expect, is to dye by the ſame hand that ſhe did, and that the Dagger which pierced her heart ſhall pierce thine alſo.

After this, ſhe called for the Captain of the Gelons, and went to her Tent, leaving Cyrus more grieved at her menaces againſt Mandana, than ever he was before; as for his own life he did not value it, nor could he anſwer unto what that unjuſt Queen ſaid: For he did ſo wonder to hear her voice, and to hear that ſad ſentence againſt Mandana, that before he could recover himſelf out of his aſtoniſhment, and be ſure that he underſtood how ſhe was gone;yet he could not chooſe but ſpeak out of the abundance of his grief as if ſhe were preſent, and vented ſuch moving expreſſions, as if the Guards had underſtood him, doubtleſs their hearts had been mollified; but ſince they did not underſtand that language wherein he expreſſed himſelf, they were not at all moved: For being almoſt all Gelons, they underſtood not the Perſian, Armenian, Grecian, Cappadocian, nor the Median languages, ſo as all the complaints of Cyrus before them, were but wind.

However, the tumult ſtill increaſing, Thomyris underſtood that the Sauromates had forced thoſe who reſiſted them. So as foreſeeing that Cyrus and Mandana would infallibly be relieved, if ſhe did not put them to death, and that ſhe her ſelf would be taken if ſhe did not fly; ſhe commanded that barbarous Captain of the Gelons, whom ſhe had brought into her Tent, to go and ponyard Mandana, and afterwards Cyrus; appointing him to let the death of that Princeſs be firſt known unto him: This Horrid Officer began to prepare himſelf for obedience, and he had not gone two paces but ſhe called him back, and told him in a ſhaking voice, that ſhe would have him kill Mandana, and not Cyrus: But one of the Guards coming in and acquainting her that the Tent wherein he was would be quickly forced, ſhe called for the fatal Executioner again: Go (ſaid ſhe) and execute my firſt Commands, and be ſure you firſt acquaint Cyrus with the death of Mandana, for I ſhall not be revenged enough, unleſs he do alſo know of her death; as ſoon as you have done, return back unto me and bring me word of the end of their lives, who have ſo troubled the tranquility of mine, to the end I may ſee whether I muſt dye, or fly. The inhuman

Thomyris having given this moſt horrid command, he who was to execute it, went into Mandana's Tent; as ſoon as he was entred all the Women were heard to cry out moſt lamentably, and preſently after, this bloody man came out with a Dagger all bloody in his hand, and entring in that Equipage into the Tent of Cyrus; he went ſtraight towards that illuſtrious Prince, with intentions to ſtrike him to the heart, and thought that his Companions would help him in the Aſſaſſination, if his firſt blow miſſed, but ſince he would exactly obey the Commands of Thomyris, he told him in broken Aſſyrian, that his Dagger ſtill wreaked with the blood of Mandana, and as ſoon as he had ſaid ſo, he lifted up his Arm to ſtab the greateſt Prince upon Earth, but as he thought to have ſtruck him to the heart, Cyrus having heard of Mandana's death, and deſiring revenge, he did invigorate his valiant ſtrength, and ſnatched it out of his hand, and without more delay ſtruck him to the heart, and made him fall at his feet. This Heroick action was done ſo ſuddenly, and deſpair had made the viſage of Cyrus ſo terrible, that his Guards were all affrighted, and knew not what to do.

But at laſt one of them falling upon him, and by his Example, ſhewing others what to do, Cyrus was in greater danger than ever, but fighting now in revenge of Mandana, more than in defence of his own life, his valour appeared more than ever.

He got a Sword from one of the Guards, as before he got a Dagger from the Gelons Captain, and did things ſo prodigious, as to relate them in particular, would ſeem incredible. For he did not only kill three or four of the Guard, wounded many, and made the reſt to fly, but he came boldly out of his Tent, and went into that of Thomyris, to ſeek for ſome more noble victory to ſacrifice unto Mandana, than thoſe he had in his Tent: So as all making way for ſuch a terrible enemy, he went juſt unto the door of that Queens Tent, who expected the return of him whom ſhe had commanded to kill both Mandana and Cyrus.

Her wonder was not a little, when in Lieu of him ſhe ſaw Cyrus himſelf holding a Dagger in one hand, and a Sword in the other, and who by a menacing action made thoſe who guarded the Tent to let him enter.

Thomyris ſeeing his Action did think he came with intention to kill her, ſo as taking the Dagger which ſhe had: No, no, Cyrus, (ſaid ſhe and ſhewed it unto him) thou ſhalt not be Maſter of my deſtiny, ſince I have not been Miſtreſs of thine, and if thou comeſt a foot further, I will let thee ſee, in ſlighting Death, that I was not worthy of thy ſcorn.

Thomyris pronounced theſe words with ſuch a reſolute voice, that the Grandeur of her courage, equalling that of her cruelty, did a while ſuſpend the intentions of thoſe who heard her, for Cyrus did not advance, the Guards of the Queen did not fall upon that Prince, and for a while all was ſilent, as if amazed.

But at laſt, the great Soul of Cyrus not permitting him to have any hand in the blood of a Queen as cruel as ſhe was: Since I cannot kill thee (ſaid he unto Thomyris) without polluting that hand which ought to revenge Mandana, ſacrifice thy ſelf unjuſt Queen unto her, whoſe death thou gaveſt, whilſt I go and beſtow it upon my Rival. At theſe words Cyrus making his way through all that would ſtop his paſſage (for he knew not that Ariantes was priſoner) he heard the ſame Queen who before commanded him to be killed, now forbid thoſe who aſſaulted him, and ſhe came in perſon to forbid them.

As things were thus, another great noiſe was heard which made Cyrus believe, that now he ſhould ſhortly go unto Mandana, and die before he had revenged hers by the death of his Rival. But he was ſtrangely ſurprized to ſee that they who made that great noiſe were Myrſiles, Meliantes, Hydaſpes, Meriontes, Chriſantes, and thoſe who followed them; who after they had cleared their way, and forced unto the Tents of Cyrus, which they found empty, went afterwards unto Mandana's, where they found the unfortunate Heſionide dead, whom the Gelon Captain had killed in lieu of Mandana; for ſhe being of the ſame ſtature, ſhe had put on Mandana's Clothes, and Mandana hers, in hopes to eſcape during that great hurly burly which they heard: So as Myrſiles and the reſt having no mind to leave Mandana in that Tent, did bring her along with them with Doraliſa and Marteſia, when they found Cyrus at the entrance into the Tent of Thomyris. This great Prince ſeeing his Princeſs amongſt his friends, was ſo tranſported with joy, that he never thought upon the ruin of that cruel Queen, who would have ruin'd her ſelf.

But on the contrary, his firſt rapture of joy being over, he perceived that Thomyris did lift up her arm to kill her ſelf, he cried out unto thoſe who ſtood neareſt to prevent her: For ſeeing Mandana was not dead, though ſhe had given orders for it, yet did he moſt generouſly pardon her.

But during this tumultuous minute when friends and enemies were ſo mingled together without fighting, another great and ſtrange noiſe was heard: ſo as Cyrus thinking now upon nothing but how to preſerve Mandana; he never thought upon Thomyris; who being hindered by her own men from killing her ſelf did take that opportunity to go out of her Tent by a Back-door: ſo as taking Horſe, ſhe, with thoſe who were to convoy her, forſook the Tents Royal, and did abandon her ſelf unto more horrid ſorrow than ever ſoul was ſenſible of.

But whilſt ſhe was flying away, it hapned that thoſe who made the great noiſe were the Prince Intaphernes, Atergatis, and Feraulas, whoſe Guards being affrighted at this great diſorder, had left them: So as being got out, they went to the Tents of the Sauromates, who were to fight for Cyrus, and afterwards unto Tent of Thomyris where they found them: But when the firſt apprehenſions of joy were paſſed, Chriſantes not ſeeing Thomyris in her Tent, asked Cyrus whether he would not follow her, and bring her captive back? But this generous Prince underſtanding from Myrſiles and Meriontes, the conditions of the Treaty which they held with the friends of his Rival, he told Chriſantes that it was better to keep promiſe with his friends in delivering Ariantes, than to purſue an unfortunate Queen, whom queſtionleſs the Gods would puniſh, without his medling with her. And indeed, Cyrus, after he had taken all requiſite order for the ſafety of Mandana, he went himſelf to help the friends of Ariantes and his own, in the delivery of that Prince, but there was no need: For in going thither, he met with Otryades, who told Meriontes, that Ariantes was dead. How (replied Cyrus) is Ariantes killed? Yes, (replied Otryades) and killed by an ancient Rival of his, yet the truth is, that unfortunate Prince did urge him unto it: But I pray (ſaid Cyrus) let us underſtand in few words how Agathyrſis came to kill Ariantes? Sir, (replied Otryades) when your Army had entirely defeated that of Thomyris, maugre all the valour of the Maſſagettans, Agathyrſis thought it his beſt courſe to come with that ſmall remnant of his Cavalry, and joyn himſelf with Thomyris. But, Sir, in his way thither, all thoſe who followed him, forſook him, except only five or ſix. However, his great heart would needs go through unto that Queen: but in his way he was to paſs before the Tent of Ariantes, and came juſt thither, as we had delivered that Prince, unto whom we had given Arms, to the end he might come according to our promiſe to your friends, and help them to deliver you. So as Ariantes ſeeing Agathyrſis, (whom he had never ſeen ſince their laſt difference) and his mind being exaſperated by his ill fortune, he ſpoke ſomething unto him in an arrogant way, as if he had upbraided him with all the misfortunes of his life. Agathyrſis having a high and ſenſible ſoul, anſwered him in the like: Upon which Ariantes without any reply drew his Sword, and fell upon him ſo furiouſly, that Agathyrſis who out of his reſpect was alighted from his Horſe, was forced to defend himſelf: And indeed ſo he did, in ſuch a manner, that before we could part them, Ariantes was mortally wounded, and Agathirſis in the throng eſcaped: So ſince Ariantes was the firſt who aſſaulted, honour would not permit us to follow him: However, as ſoon as Ariantes was fallen, he thought he ſhould die: therefore beginning to ſpeak, and looking upon me, 'Tis paſt Otryades (ſaid he unto me) and I have no more ſhare in life, only ſo much as to entreat you to tell Mandana that none ever gave her a greater teſtimony of love, than my ſelf in being ungrateful unto Cyrus.

After this, Ariantes growing weak, upon a ſudden he expired: ſo as having laid his Corps in the next Tent under the guard of ſome friends, I came with the reſt, to keep my promiſe unto the Prince Myrſiles, Meliantes, Hidaſpes, Meriontes and Chriſantes. Otryades having done ſpeaking, Cyrus according to his cuſtom behaved himſelf with all imaginable generoſity; for he ſpoke very worthily of the valour of Ariantes, and ſeemed to lament his death very much, ſince he had taken from him the glory of uſing him kindly.

After which, this great Prince received news that Creſſus and Mazares were advancing toward the Tents-Royal, and were joyned with thoſe Forces which quartered between the Tents, and the Camp of Thomyris: That Artabates had defeated Andramites, who died at that bout; and that at the ſame time he had re-taken the Fort of Sauromates, and conſequently delivered the King of Hircania and Anacharſis. So as ſeeing no more Enemies to fight againſt, he had nothing to do but to appeaſe the great tumult which was in the Tents-Royal, and to prevent plunder. Thus cauſing Proclamation to be made, that Thomyris was fled, that Ariantes was dead, and that he would pardon all the Maſſagettans, ſo they would lay down their Arms: In one hour all was quiet, all the Maſſagettans laid down their Arms, and kept within their Tents: The Sauromates left plundering, and went under their Enſigns unto all the advenues of the Tents Royal, unto the publick places, and before the Tent where Mandana was: After which Cyrus permitted Intaphernes, Atergatis, gatis, Meliantes, and Hidaſpes, to go unto the Princeſs Oneſile, the Princeſs of Bythinia, Iſtrina, Arpaſia, and Telagenes, to bring them unto Mandana: Yet he would not have given this permiſſion unto Meliantes and Hidaſpes to ſee Arpaſia, but upon condition they ſhould carry themſelves in this buſineſs as friends, and not as the Lovers of Arpaſia. And indeed they obeyed Cyrus, who after he had given all requiſite orders for all things, he went unto Mandana, unto whom all the captive Princeſſes were come: And ſhe received him with ſo many ſigns of joy in her countenance, that he thought himſelf richly recompenced for all the miſeries he had endured ſince firſt he began to love her.

And to render his happineſs more compleat, Feraulas gave him to underſtand in few words, how much too blame he was in ſuſpecting the fidelity of Mandana, and the upbraiding her with thoſe joys which ſhe ſeemed to have after he had acquainted her with his being alive: ſo that his ſoul being fully ſatisfied, and his mind in perfect tranquility, he accoſted her with unexpreſſible delight: Oh, Madam, (ſaid he unto her after he had ſaluted her, and done all his befitting Complements unto the reſt of the Princeſſes with her) I begin now to hope that Fortune has done her worſt, and that the Gods will render juſtice unto your merit and virtue, ſince Creſſus and Mazares have vanquiſhed our Enemies, ſince Artabates hath done the like, and ſince the Fort of the Sauromates is taken.

My greateſt hope is (replied Mandana moſt obligingly, unto whom Feraulas had ſpoken enough to juſtifie Cyrus for upbraiding her) that you do ſo well deſerve to be happy, as I need not fear being unfortunate, ſince you have perſwaded me that you will never think your ſelf ſo if I be miſerable: But for all that, Sir, I have ſeen ſuch great and ſudden alterations in my Fortune, that ſometimes my fears are above my hopes: Yet when I conſider how the King of Aſſiria, the King of Pontus, and the Prince Ariantes are all dead: That Thomyris is fled: that I am in the ſame place where I was a Captive: that you are abſolute Maſter of the Tents Royal, that your Armies are victorious, that the Fort of Sauromates is taken, that the paſſage over the River Araxes is free, and that the Prince Mazares is more vertuous than amorous, methinks I am much too blame if I fear any thing, but have all the reaſon in the world to hope that the end of my life will be much more happy than the beginning was. Doubtleſs, Madam, you have reaſon to think ſo, (replied Cyrus): But for me, whoſe deſtiny is in your hands, more than in Fortunes, I have ſtill more reaſon to fear, than hope.

As long as you believe me to be juſt (anſwered Mandana moſt obligingly) doubtleſs you have more reaſon to hope than to fear: and therefore ſince I believe you will do me juſtice, I do not think it neceſſary to give you any new teſtimonies of my acknowledgments: Alas, Madam, (ſaid he) how ill does the word acknowledgment ſuit with my expectations? my ſupream hopes is in the honour of your affection; and I look upon it as a thing ſo precious, that though I had done you millions of ſervices more than I have, yet I ſhould think my ſelf infinitely ungrateful, if I did not deſire to do you much more, and to employ every minute of my life in doing you new ſervices, and giving you freſh teſtimonies of my affection.

After this, the night being ſo far ſpent, that day was ready to break, Cyrus thought it fit to leave the Ladies to their reſt: And therefore left them in the Tent of Thomyris, whilſt he went into another, with all the Princes who had been ſharers with him in his miſeries, and now were to be partakers of his happineſs. However, ſince Mandana in the midſt of her joys was ſtill grieved for the death of Heſionide, ſhe appointed all honours ſhould be rendred unto her Funeral, and Feraulas had it in charge to have an eſpecial care of it. On the other ſide, Cyrus whoſe eye was upon every thing, he took ſingular care, that all the Women of Thomyris who did not follow her, ſhould receive no wrong: As for Gelonide, though ſhe did not approve of that Queens paſſion, yet ſhe followed her as a comforter in her miſery.

In the mean time, ſince it was impoſſible to think upon any ſleep that night, and ſince Cyrus was accuſtomed to awake without any prejudice to himſelf, he employed that little time between his leaving Mandana and the break of day, in thinking of departure the next day from a place where his Princeſs and he had endured ſuch miſeries; for ſince the Battle which Creſſus and Mazares fought was not deep in blood, becauſe the Sauromates differting the Maſſagettes, the Army of Thomyris was put into diſorder, he thought it not impoſſible, and much leſs when he heard that his Army was Encamped within twelve furlongs of the Tents Royal; and that Creſſus and Mazares ſent to him to know what his pleaſure was: So as ſeeing no obſtacle unto his deſign, ſince his Troops were re-aſſembled, and encamped ſo near; as ſoon as he thought that the Ladies had ſufficiently reſted themſelves, and quitted all their fears, he ſent to aſk Mandana whether ſhe had rather be in the Camp, or in the Tents Royal? And her thoughts being his, he began to give out his laſt Orders. But firſt, the piety of Mandana moved her to begin her journey with a ſacrifice of Thanks unto the Gods: So though the Maſſagettes had no Temples, yet ſhe offered a ſacrifice of Thanks by an Ecbatane Prieſt, who was come into the Army of Cyrus, and who came into the Tents Royal alſo, to ſee whether it was true that the Daughter of his King was at liberty.

After this, Cyrus told Otryades that it was fit that all Funeral honours ſhould be done unto the Prince Ariantes, and he left him wherewith to build a ſtately Sepulchre and Monument for the Prince Spitridates and Araminta: and he commanded that one alſo ſhould be erected next theirs for the faithful Heſionide. Afterwards he ſent ſome to follow Thomyris, and to tell her from him, that though all the Country of the Maſſagettes might be his, as the reſt of his Conqueſts were, yet he would not purſue her, but generouſly reſtore it unto her; declaring that he had never made War but for the liberty of Mandana, he would look no further, but would turn back over Araxes, without taking away any thing that was hers, only ſome Coaches which he could not get elſe where, in which all the Princeſſes and Ladies did get, and Cyrus riding on Horſe-back, accompanied with Myrſiles, Intaphernes, Atergatis, Meliantes, Hydaſpes, Meriontes, Chriſantes, Feraulas, and ſome other Sauromatian Captains, which took his part, were their Convoy, and carried them to the Camp, cauſing all his Troops to quit the Tents Royal, and march in Battalia behind Mandana. And whilſt ſhe was advancing towards the Camp of Cyrus, Creſſus and Mazares prepared themſelves to receive her with all the honours which ſo ſhort a warning would permit. To that end they drew out all their Troops in their Arms, and making a Guard of ſix furlongs in length, they went to meet them, accompanied with the Prince Tigranes, Artamas, Gadates, Indathyrſis, the Prince of Paphlagonia, Gabrias, Silamis, Araſpes, Aglatidas, Ligdamis, Adonacris, Mneſiphiles, Cherſeas, Diocles, and many others.

The truth is, Mazares was not without new agitation of ſoul: For in the time when he thought Cyrus dead, hope had a little revived in his heart, and there kindled new flames, ſo as there was a new Combat between his virtue and his love: yet in the end virtue got the predominancy, and he had ſuch a power over himſelf, that nothing appeared in his countenance but a quiet joy, when he ſaw Cyrus and Mandana together, and ſaw them in ſuch a condition, as in all probability they might hope for happineſs together; and he received them both with many ſigns of eſteem and amity: For after Creſſus had ſaluted them, they gave a thouſand commendations unto Mazares, and afterwards unto all the men that accompanied them. Gadates, he was very glad to ſee Iſtrina again, Gabrias was joyed at the ſight of Arpaſia, and he could not chooſe but be glad alſo to ſee Meliantes, though he knew not well how to carry himſelf between him and Hidaſpes. Indathyrſis was much ſatisfied at the ſight of Telagenes, unto whom he had a ſtrong inclination: Tigranes was as much rejoyced to ſee Oneſile, as if he were her Lover, and not her Husband. Intaphernes ſpoke unto the Princeſs of Bythinia, who was more ſad than any of the reſt, becauſe ſhe mourned for the death of her Father, and Spitridates. Myrſiles he entertained Doraliſa, who according to her humour complained againſt him for not comforting her after the death Andramites, of which ſhe was very glad. As for Meliantes and Hidaſpes, they both ſpoke unto Arpaſia and Gabrias, keeping moſt exactly within the limits which Cyrus had preſcribed them: So the way not being very fit for long diſcourſe, the entertainment of theſe excellent perſons quickly ended, and continuing their march, they were received into the Camp with ſuch acclamations of great joy as never was the like heard.

In the mean time, as impatient as Cyrus was to be far off the place where his Princeſs and himſelf had been Captives yet there was a neceſſity of lying in the Camp; for before all the Officers of the Army had expreſſed all their Joyes and Complements, it was ſo late as there was no thinking of departure: So as Mandana and the other Princeſſes lodged in the Tents of Creſſus and Mazares, Cyrus in that of Artamas, Creſſus and Mazares in thoſe of Gabrias and Gadates, and all the reſt of the Princes in their own. Cyrus was no ſooner diſengaged from that abundance of men who teſtified their joyes, but he went unto the Tent of the Princeſſes, where he paſſed away the Evening in ſuch great delight, that he quite forgot all his miſeries; for ſince there was not one Lady there who had not ſome particular friend to entertain, except Oneſile, who entertained Mazares, Cyrus applied himſelf wholly unto Mandana, and in ſuch a moſt agreeable manner, that in lieu of accuſing, he was forced to juſtifie her: For though Feraulas had told him that he was obliged unto her for that ſmile which he ſaw in her eyes as ſhe paſſed before his Tent, yet he was extreamly glad to hear from the mouth of his Princeſs, that ſhe grieved for him, and was not comforted after ſhe heard of his death: And ſhe did ſo obligingly aggravate her grief that day ſhe beheld the diſmal ceremony of Thomyris, that his joyes were unconceivable. And when he looked upon the fair eys of Mandana, and conſidered that they ſhed tears for him, all the love of his heart appeared in his own; and he thanked her for it in ſuch a paſſionate manner, that Mandana thought him worthy of thoſe tears which ſhe ſhed,and that he did merit her affection: So as laying aſide that exact and ſevere reſervedneſs, which always obliged her to hide the tenderneſs of her thoughts, ſhe did him the favour that night to diſcover part of her mind unto him, and to let him divine the reſt.

But whilſt theſe two illuſtrious Lovers were making mutual exchanges of love, Intaphernes did what he could to comfort his Princeſs in her mourning: Atergatis alſo entertained Iſtrina with abundance of ſatisfaction; for ſince the King of Aſſiria was dead, he believed Gadates would be no hindrance of his happineſs. As for Myrſiles, though he was very much joyed in his talk with Doraliſa, yet he was leſs happy than the reſt; becauſe her humour was ſuch, that though ſhe had loved that Prince as well as he loved her, ye he would find ſuch a ſweet inequality in her, as he would often complain of her rigour, even when ſhe intended to give him cauſe to commend her: For though ſhe was alwayes equally generous towards her friends, yet ſhe was always very unequal towards her Lovers: So as though Myrſiles was much joyed in being with her, yet it was with a mixture of many bitter minutes.

But as for Meliantes and Hidaſpes, they were the leaſt content of all; for ſuch was the temper of Arpaſia's mind, that endeavouring to carry fair unto both, ſhe obliged neither. Yet Meliantes was happier than Hidaſpes, becauſe Hidaſpes thought Meliantes more in Arpaſia's favour than he was; ſo as though Meliantes was not altogether content with his Miſtreſs, yet he was very glad to ſee the ſadneſs of his Rival, though he extreamly grieved that he enjoyed but half that heart of her he loved. But as for Hidaſpes, ſince he hoped to have enjoyed all; and ſeeing it divided into two, his ſorrows were above his expreſſions; for in point of glory, he concealed his vexation from his Rival. Meliantes alſo on his ſide, out of the ſame motive, he made it appear that he was more joyed than he was; and to get him ſome advantage over Hidaſpes, it chanced when the diſcourſe was general, and when Cyrus was ready to retire, that he ſpoke very advantagiouſly of Meliantes unto Mandana, and entreated her very obligingly to let him have the honour of her eſteem and friendſhip: Alſo Meliantes thought himſelf highly recompenced for the ſervice he had done that Prince, ſince he had given him ſuch commendations: For truly Madam (ſaid Cyrus unto Mandana) I aſſure you that Meliantes hath more conquered me by his virtue, than his valour; though his valour be ſuch as made me his Priſoner; and ſuch is his merit, that doubtleſs he deſerves your acquaintance.

Oh Sir, (ſaid Meliantes) I cannot endure you ſhould ſay you were my Priſoner; for I have ever endeavoured to obey you ſince the firſt time I had the honour to ſee you: 'Tis true (replied Cyrus) but however, by the Laws of War, you might have commanded me, and in not doing it, your generoſity the more appears. Alſo I aſſure you, that you have loſt nothing by it; for my acknowledgment gives you more power over me, than the right of Conquerors can over the Conquered.

After this, Cyrus making himſelf ready to go away, Meliantes could not reply, and all the company parted. But Mandana did not yet go to Bed; for ſince Cyrus had told her that he would ſend away Poſts unto Ecbatane and Perſepolis in the morning, that Princeſs would write unto Ciaxares; ſhe writ alſo unto the Queen of Perſia: And accordingly, Cyrus by break of day diſpatched Araſpes towards Cambyſes, and Aglatidas towards Ciaxares, making choice of the laſt of theſe to carry this great news unto the King of Medes, to the end he might ſee his dear Ameſtris. However, to loſe no precious time, as ſoon as all the Princeſſes ceſſes were ready, they departed, and all the Army marched: For there was no Enemy appeared in a Body, yet Cyrus would have his Army march in Battalia, until he was on the other ſide of Araxes. And when he came unto the entrance into the Wood which had been burned, Artabates came and met Cyrus, who received him as a man who had much contributed unto his liberty, by the victory he had gotten over Andramitis, and by thoſe Troops which he ſent unto the Tents Royal. It was in that place alſo where the wiſe Anacharſis did meet Cyrus, and did infinitely commend the moderation which he ſhewed towards Thomyris: But Cyrus deſiring to render juſtice unto the virtue of this illuſtrious Scythian, he preſented him unto Mandana, in a moſt obliging manner, and in few words acquainted her with the merit of this excellent man. This Princeſs alſo did him all imaginable honour, and rendred as much unto his vertue, as unto his quality, which was great.

Since the Fort of the Sauromates was in their way, and a convenient days journey, all the Princeſſes did lye there, and were received by the King of Hircania, who was well recovered of his wounds, and able to meet Cyrus and Mandana at their entrance into the Fort, making many excuſes that he came no further to meet them: After which he told Cyrus, that he would give him more than a Kingdom, if he would be pleaſed to render him what he had loſt, and what ſo few ever knew that he had. This diſcourſe is ſo dark unto me (replied Cyrus) that I cannot return an anſwer before you inform me what it is which you have loſt, and which I can reſtore unto you. When you are in a more fitting place, Sir, to tell it in (replied the King of Hircania) I ſhall more preciſely tell you, how I am this morning aſſured that I have a Son in your Army, though none ever thought that ever I had a Succeſſor, or was ever married: And therefore, Sir, when I have cleared unto you ſome circumſtances which I ſhall this day know, I ſhall beſeech you to reſtore him unto me.

You may well imagine, Sir, (replied Cyrus) that I ſhould be very glad if I could contribute any thing unto your ſatisfaction: You, Sir, I ſay, who was the firſt that came in to my ſide, and unto whom my firſt acknowledgments are due: After this, the King of Hircania returning a civil anſwer, without particularizing any thing of his adventure, Mandana was ready to come out of her Coach, and Cyrus left him to go and preſent his hand unto her. All the reſt of the Princes did the like unto the Princeſſes whom they adored: But Arpaſia having two adorers who would equally ſtrive for that office, they were ready to quarrel about it: And if Arpaſia had not wiſely carried her ſelf, doubtleſs they had faln foul upon one another.

In the mean time, Cyrus being advertiſed of the paſſage, and underſtanding that Hidaſpes was more in the wrong than Meliantes, he drew him apart: And after he had told him how he did not take it well that he ſhould no better comply with a man unto whom he was ſo much obliged, and unto whom he might attribute the name of his Protector, he acquitted himſelf of his promiſe made unto Meliantes, in deſiring Hidaſpes with all affectionate perſwaſions, to think no more upon Arpaſia, but to yield her unto his Rival. Sir (ſaid Hidaſpes) I moſt humbly beſeech you, do not command me peremptorily, leſt I ſhould ſhame my ſelf in my diſobedience. But, Sir, to teſtifie how I reſpect the friend of the illuſtrious Cyrus in the perſon of my Rival, I will promiſe, that if Arpaſia make choice of him, and reject me, I will never diſturb his enjoyment of her, but will ſooner reſolve upon death, than moleſt a man who hath had the glory of doing you ſuch conſiderable ſervice, and hath obtained your friendſhip.

Since you believe that Arpaſia will prefer you before Meliantes (replied Cyrus) you will in this do nothing which will oblige me. Alas, Sir, (replied Hidaſpes) I am much leſs happy than you do imagin: For ſince my Rival hath delivered Arpaſia from the hands of Licander, Licander, he hath gotten ſo much of her heart, that I know not which of us hath the greateſt ſhare. Since it is ſo (ſaid Cyrus) me-thinks you may the more eaſily yield him your half; for I cannot conceive there is any great happineſs to be found in the enjoyment of a divided heart.

However it be, Sir, (replied Hidaſpes) I ſhall loſe that ſatisfaction which I have, and which I cannot voluntarily yield. Since it is ſo (ſaid Cyrus) the Princeſs Mandana ſhall take the pains to negotiate the matter with the fair Arpaſia: For I ſhould be exceeding ſorry, if any misfortunes ſhould befall unto two men who are ſo dear unto me. After this Cyrus went immediately unto Mandana, and entreated her to ſpeak with Arpaſia, to the end ſome courſe might ſpeedily be taken in the buſineſs, leſt theſe two Rivals ſhould quarrel about her. Yet firſt he would talk with Gabrias, who having given unto Cyrus all the power he had over his Daughter, he enabled that Prince to do an act of juſtice between theſe two men whom he exceedingly loved.

In the mean time, Mandana talked with Arpaſia in private; and telling her the ſtate of things, alſo how ſhe was the Miſtreſs of her own deſtiny, ſhe was at a ſtrange dilemma. At the firſt ſhe ſaid that ſhe would refer her ſelf unto the diſpoſition of her Father. But Mandana being very importunate with her to explain her ſelf clearly, ſhe was more puzled: For truly, Madam, (ſaid ſhe, being reſolved to tell her plainly) I cannot give you any anſwer, all I can ſay, is to acquaint you in two words with the condition of my ſoul, to the end you may know, tho I cannot well without a bluſh, that my firſt inclination was towards Meliantes, and that I eſteemed him, and was as tender towards him, as poſſibly one could be: I muſt confeſs alſo, that I was infinitely beholding to him, inſomuch as, but for him, I had married a man whom I did moſt horridly hate, and ſhould have been conſequently the moſt miſerable perſon upon Earth.

I muſt further confeſs, that I was not ſorry he did love me at Alſenes, and that had I never heard of his infidelity unto one, whoſe name was Argeliſe; I had loved him again as he deſired to be; but for all this, Madam, I muſt alſo tell you, that being fully reſolved to be only upon terms of friendſhip with Meliantes, I came afterwards acquainted with Hidaſpes, whoſe humour and diſpoſition I found ſo agreeable unto my own, as at the firſt I believed there would be a great affection betwixt us: And muſt tell you more than ever I did him, that my ſecret deſign of diſingaging my heart from Meliantes, did make me receive the Love of Hidaſpes, ſooner than otherwiſe I had done, ſo as not to diſſemble with you, I did permit him to hope, and a while after promiſed him my Love: Since this Madam, there hath hapned many ſtrange revolutions; and not to inſiſt upon any but the laſt, I will tell you, Madam, that notwithſtanding all my coldneſs to Meliantes, he came diſguiſed unto the Tents Royal, and was ſo generous as to hazard his life in being the death of my laſt Raviſher; and I may truly ſay, Madam, that in killing Lycander, he hath received part of that affection which formerly I had unto him; ſo as I am now in the moſt perplexed condition in the world. For I know, that none can be more perfectly loved than I am, both by Meliantes and by Hidaſpes. The firſt of which hath done me the moſt conſiderable ſervice, and the ſecond hath the Engagement of my promiſe, which I am not able to keep, unleſs I be ungrateful unto Meliantes; nor can I beſtow my ſelf unto Meliantes, unleſs I be perfidious unto Hidaſpes.

Thus can I give my ſelf unto neither of theſe two, unleſs I ſhould grieve for him whoſe I am not. And I am ſo unreſolved what to do, that doubtleſs, I ſhould repent it, if I ſhould make my choice of either. For truly, I do no ſooner entertain an advantagious thought of Hidaſpes, but preſently I have another which blaſts it: And therefore, Madam, to be ſincere with you, I am not able to make him whom I ſhall chooſe, or my ſelf happy, in my choice.

After this, Mandana endeavoured to diſcover whether all this proceeded from the reality of her mind, and indeed ſhe did ſo plainly find that it was ſo, as ſhe could not chooſe but wonder.

But the great difficulty was, to make Arpaſia conſent that her thoughts ſhould be made known unto Meliantes and Hidaſpes, yet reſolve upon it, ſhe muſt: For after Mandana had given an account unto Cyrus and Gabrias of her Conference; they could find out no better courſe, than to tell both Meliantes and Hidaſpes ingeniouſly how the caſe ſtood. So as ſending for them both, Mandana did ſo diſcreetly acquaint them with Arpaſia's mind, and carried the matter with ſuch artifice, as ſhe almoſt inſuſed an equal deſire in them both, to yeild her unto one another, by the impoſſibility which ſhe made them ſee in making either themſelves or her happy; yet they could not reſolve it ſo upon a ſudden, but deſired two things: The one that Arpaſia would in their preſence confirm all that the Princeſs Mandana had told them, that they might ſee there was no poſſibility of changing her mind: The other, that they might have time given them until the next day before they gave their anſwer. Their demands were granted, and Arpaſia was brought unto them, though much againſt her will: But when they ſaw her, they found all that Mandana told them ſo exactly true, that they equally thought themſelves moſt miſerable, yet Meliantes leſs than Hidaſpes: For after an abſolute deſpair, he found ſome ſweetneſs, in ſeeing that he had made ſome entrance into Arpaſia's heart, ſince he had gotten half of it from his Rival, yet this partition was a great affliction unto him as well as unto Hidaſpes, and they were in a hundred minds, to give over all thoughts of a perſon who could not tell what to reſolve upon: And thus they paſſed away that night in a reſtleſs perplexity.

However, Meliantes being as generous as amorous, the very thought that Hidaſpes would ſtill be in a corner of Arpaſia's heart, though he ſhould marry her; he was in a mind to quench his flames, but ſince generoſity told him it was againſt the hair to yeild her unto his Rival, he was reſolved not to do it, when one came to tell him that Cyrus was very deſirous to ſpeak with him, and ſtayed for him in Mandana's Chamber. He remembring his promiſe of giving an anſwer, did think it was that for which he ſent for him; but he was much ſurprized when in entring into the Chamber of that Princeſs, where there was only Cyrus and the King of Hircania, and he heard Mandana ſay that ſhe had ſuch good news to tell him, as ſhe deſired none ſhould acquaint him with it but her ſelf: For Meliantes (ſaid ſhe unto him) you are Son unto a King, and to a King who was the firſt friend of Cyrus, when he begun the War: But the worſt is, that in giving a Crown you muſt loſe a Miſtreſs; for the King your Father, before whom I ſpeak, hath acquainted me, that according to the Laws of his Kingdom it is not lawful for the Succeſſor unto that Kingdom to marry a ſtranger Princeſs. Madam, (replied Meliantes, much amazed) what you are pleaſed to tell is ſo far from any probability, that not daring but to believe your words, I muſt needs think I have not rightly underſtood them: No, no, (replied the King of Hircania) neither the Princeſs Mandana nor you are miſtaken; for you are really my Son, though you do not know it. And to teſtifie that I do know all that ever you have done, ſince you left the name of Clidaris, and aſſumed that of Meliantes, I muſt tell you that you were brought up in a Province of Aſſyria, that you were believed to be Son unto a man of quality there, that you thought Cleonide was your Siſter, and that you have travelled all Greece.

In the mean time, thoſe from whom you thought you had your birth, were only the Confidents of my Marriage with a perſon whom I eſpouſed ſecretly during the life of my Father, and who died preſently after you were born: But I beſeech you, Sir, (ſaid Cyrus, and interrupted him) what is the reaſon, why after the death of the late King of Hyrcania, you did not declare your Marriage, and recal home the Prince your Son? The reaſon of it was, Sir, (replied he) that having conſulted with the Oracle of Jupiter Belus in Babylon, concerning the Birth of my Son, I was anſwered that if I did not conceal his quality, until he had taken the greateſt Prince upon Earth Priſoner, he ſhould become the moſt miſerable man in the world, and if on the contrary I did not divulge it until he was maſter of a Princes deſtiny who had the deſtiny of all Aſia in his hands, he ſhould be able to cure himſelf of a paſſion which then would torment him, and afterwards be very happy all the reſt of his days. So in obedience to the Gods, I ſent my Son to travel into Greece, in expectation of their promiſes, which now are accompliſhed, ſince my Son hath had the Glory to have ſeen the Illuſtrious Cyrus his Priſoner: And likewiſe the man who did educate him, and who knew me to be his Father, being come hither to tell me he underſtood that my Son under the name of Meliantes was in the Party of Thomyris, and that he thought it fit to avert him from it. I therefore do know of infallible certainty that Meliantes is my Son: But ſince under that name he hath had the Glory of doing ſome ſervice unto ſo great a Prince, I would not have him own any other.

As long as the King of Hyrcania ſpoke, Meliantes had many different thoughts, ſometimes he was glad that his birth was as great as his heart, and ſometimes when he thought his condition would blaſt his pretentions unto Arpaſia, he was ſad.

Thus Love and Ambition ſtrugling in his heart all the while the King of Hyrcania ſpoke, he knew not whether he ſhould be ſad or glad. But as ſoon as that Prince had done ſpeaking. Nature beginning to prevail with his Soul; he rendred unto the King his Father all poſſible reverence in the preſence of Cyrus and Mandana.

After which, the King of Hyrcania by the permiſſion of Cyrus, cauſed the man whom Meliantes thought to be his Father, to enter, who confirmed all that he had ſaid. So as it being out of all queſtion, the King of Hyrcania told Meliantes he was very ſorry that the Laws of his Kingdom were againſt the Laws of his Love; but for all that, he hoped that a Crown would comfort him for the loſs of Arpaſia. So that without requiring any preciſe anſwer, but ſuppoſing that he would conform himſelf to the Law, he told Cyrus in a low voice, that he was very impatient, until Meliantes was known unto the world for whom he was, hoping that the Complements and Addreſſes which would be made unto him upon the advantageous alteration of his condition would wind his mind from its ordinary object, and hinder him from exceſſive grief at his loſs of Arpaſia. So Cyrus beſeeching Mandana to let the people enter into her Chamber, the happy adventure of Meliantes was quickly divulged: For the Prince Mazares, Artamas, Intaphernes, Atergatis, and many others came in, and were informed of it. Yet Meliantes, as ſoon as he could diſingage himſelf from the Company, and being pricked on by his paſſion, he went unto the Tent where Arpaſia was, who knew already who he was; for Marteſia had ſent to tell it unto Niſide, who told her: therefore ſhe received him as Son unto the King of Hyrcania, to wit, with much more Ceremony and Reverence.

But Meliantes at firſt perceiving it: No, no, Madam (ſaid he unto her) I beſeech you do not change your way of behaviour unto me: For if you pleaſe, Meliantes will be the very ſame he was yeſterday, ſince Fortune will needs have it ſo, that he cannot be both Son unto the King of Hyrcania, and Husband unto the fair Arpaſia. After this, Meliantes acquainting her how the caſe ſtood, he proteſted that if ſhe would give him her whole heart, he would with joy renounce all pretenſions unto the Crown of Hyrcania, and would eſteem himſelf much more happy in reigning there, than in a great Kingdom: But, Madam, (ſaid he moſt paſſionately) you muſt do it in all ſincerity: and conſider, that Hydaſpes perhaps would not quit a Crown to enjoy you.

Arpaſia was now much moved at the expreſſions of Meliantes: But being both full of generoſity, and ſincerity, cerity, ſhe thought it not fit to diſſemble her thoughts, nor to let a Prince ſo generous loſe a Crown, ſince ſhe ſaw it as great a difficulty for her to diſoblige Hidaſpes, as him. But though ſhe was as ſweet in her expreſſions as poſſible, yet he thought himſelf ſo wronged, that all theſe teſtimonies of his Love ſhould not oblige her whole heart, that he proteſted he would never pretend more unto her; and that he would do all that ever he could to make ambition ſupply the place of his love, and would never affect any thing but glory, ſince he could never affect any but her, and ſince he could not obtain her Love: And accordingly, he went from her in this mind, and meeting Hidaſpes by the way, he told him that he would yield Arpaſia unto him; and aſſured him, that though he could never ceaſe being his Rival, yet he would ceaſe all pretenſions unto the enjoyment of his Miſtreſs. Hidaſpes received this Declaration with ſo much joy, that Meliantes began to repent: but the anger of his Soul coming into his relief, he did not change his mind; but on the contrary was ſo confirmed, that he hoped in time to cure himſelf of his paſſion, and withdraw his heart from one, who could give him but half of hers.

In the mean time, Cyrus had his ſhares in the inquietudes of Meliantes, though he did not ſhew it: For the Hyrcanian Law, which did forbid the Sons of their Kings to marry ſtrange Princeſſes, was alſo the Law of the Cappadocians: ſo as Mandana, as Queen of that Kingdom, could not marry Cyrus. Yet this Prince did conceal his ſorrows, and would believe, that as Ciaxares might deny the Princeſs his Daughter as Queen of Cappadocia, yet he might give her to him as Princeſs of Media only. Not that this obſtacle was new unto this Prince; but he had ſo many other more weighty, that he never thought of it, until the King of Hyrcania did mention the Law of his Kingdom, and until Mandana told Meliantes, that in gaining a Crown, he muſt loſe a Miſtreſs. However, he diſſembled his inquietudes, and appeared the next day as pleaſant, as poſſible.

In the mean time, Mandana having a great deſire to be on the other ſide of Araxes, ſhe entreated all the reſt of the Princeſſes to riſe betimes, ſo as they went ſo early, that the Troops could not follow them: But after they had paſſed over Araxes, and the Army alſo, the wiſe Anacharſis, who had waited upon Cyrus ſo far, did take his leave of him, and carried Indathyrſis away with him. Meneſiphiles, Cherſeas, and Diocles, accompanied him, and continued their Travels, as they began.

But this wiſe Scythian, at parting from Cyrus and Mandana, did give them ſuch high Elogies, as they had great reaſon to be as well ſatisfied with him, as he with them. As for Indathyrſis, he left Cyrus much againſt his will, as well as the fair Telegenes: and had he thought ſhe could have left Armenia, to go into the Country of the Sauromates, he would not have parted ſo ſoon: but he choſe rather to cure himſelf of a growing paſſion by abſence, than vainly augment it by his ſtay.

In the mean time, Cyrus and Mandana continued on their Journey; but out of prudence, he would not let the King of Hyrcania go unto Ecbatane, for it was apparant, that Meliantes had need to be far from Arpaſia, to quench his flames. So as Cyrus making that his pretence, he moved the King of Hyrcania to go into his own Kingdom with the Troops which he brought: And in parting from Meliantes, he gave him ſuch high applauds, inducing him to love glory only, as he had good reaſon to be well ſatisfied. Mandana alſo teſtified ſo much eſteem of him, and ſo did all the Princeſſes and Princes which followed Cyrus, that he had all the reaſon in the world to be infinitely ſatisfied. But his greateſt ſatisfaction was to ſee, that Arpaſia at parting did look ſo ſadly, that Hydaſpes was angry at it.

Thus he departed with all the glory that he deſerved, and with as much ſatisfaction as his mind was capable of: For though Arpaſia was infinitely amiable, yet every one murmured againſt her: and though Hydaſpes was a man of as excellent parts as any in the world, yet they thought ſhe was injurious in not giving her whole heart unto Meliantes.

However, when Mandana came near Media, Cyrus ſent Orders unto Arianita, and all the reſt of the Women whom he had left with Lycaſte, to be at Ecbatane. And that day they entered upon the Frontiers of Media, Harpagus, and Pactias, who were gone unto Mytelene after the Siege of Cumes, becauſe the firſt durſt not ſhew his face unto Cyrus, and the other unto the King of Lydia, they now returned; and addreſſing themſelves unto Hydaſpes, they informed him, that in their deſign of travelling, they Embarked in a Ship which a Tempeſt had driven into Mytelene, and that they went afterwards into the Iſle of Crete, ſo famous for the wonderful Labyrinth which is there to be ſeen: That being there, the Ship in which thoſe whom the Prince of Phoceus and Bomilcar had ſent unto Cyrus, did there Land: So as underſtanding that they had Letters from that Prince, and were going into a Country which was commended for its beauty, they followed them and came to Marſeilles, where they ſaw the admirable Cleonibe, and were preſent at her Marriage with the Prince of Phoceus, of whom they ſpoke all imaginable good: Adding that not being able to live longer out of their own Country, they implored the aſſiſtance of Cleonibe and that Prince; who being glad to meet with an occaſion of thanking Cyrus for the happineſs which they enjoyed, had writ a Letter of thanks unto him; and in it beſeeched him to pardon Harpagus, and to mediate Creſſus for a pardon of Pactias. So as Hydaſpes taking upon him that buſineſs, he ſpoke unto Cyrus, who not being able to deny any thing in a time when Fortune gave him all things he could hope for, he conſented that Hydaſpes ſhould preſent Harpagus unto him, and deſired Creſſus to pardon Pactias: This Prince being extream glad to hear by them that the admirable Cleonibe and the valiant Prince of Phoceus were happy together, though he was very ſorry the caſe was not ſo with the generous Bomilcar.

Afterwards Cyrus took all requiſite order for Mandana's arrival in Ecbatane, in an Equipage proportionable to her quality: And to that end he reſted in a little Town in a Province of Media, which is called the Province of Sapires. During their ſtay there, all that Love could invent, which was tender, ſweet, and gallant, was uſed by Cyrus, by Mandana, Intaphernes, the Princeſs of Bythinia, Atergatis, Iſtrina, and by Myrſiles. As for Doraliſa, ſhe followed her old humours, ſince certainly tender and paſſionate expreſſions were not her cuſtom: all that ſhe was able to do, was to let the Prince Myrſiles uſe them.

But when all things were ready, both for the Train of Mandana, and the Equipage of Aſia's Conquerour, and for all the reſt of the Princes who followed him: This Hero leaving all his Army upon the Frontiers, except five hundred Horſe, he advanced towards Ecbatane, where Cyaxares expected them with impatience, proportionable to the joy which he hoped to receive in ſeeing the Princeſs his Daughter. But Cyrus and Mandana were pleaſingly ſurprized, when they heard that Cambyſes and the Queen his Wife were come unto Ecbatane,the cauſe of their Voyage being unknown unto them.

In the mean time, the day of their Triumphant Entrance being come, the ſight was both unexpreſſible and unimaginable: And though the King of Aſſyria had prepared a very magnificent Triumph for the reception of Mandana into Babylon, when the Prince Mazares by that Kings orders preſented her with the keys of it; yet it was nothing in compariſon of this. The truth is, the Prince Mazares did not contribute any thing unto it; for he made no preparations for it, becauſe he remembred that it was at ſuch a Ceremony that he loſt his liberty: So as looking upon Mandana that morning when ſhe had dreſſed her ſelf:Take heed,Madam (ſaid he unto her) leſt you ſhould this day make ſome other as miſerable as my ſelf;for you may remember it was at ſuch a Ceremony that I had the misfortune to fall in love with you: I was ſo ſad and miſerable that day (replied Mandana and ſmiled) as it was no wonder your compaſſion of my misfortunes ſhould mo-

ſifie your heart: But ſince I am this day in a happy condition, I need not fear any ſuch adventure will befall me: And if I have any cauſe of fear, it is to loſe your friendſhip. Oh, Madam! (ſaid Mazares and ſighed) did you but know my heart, you would ſee there was greater danger of my loſing yours, than you mine: and yet I aſſure you, Madam, you cannot deprive me of your friendſhip, unleſs you be unjuſt. Then I ſhall never take away mine (replied Mandana) for it is not my cuſtom to be unjuſt: ſo that as long as you keep your ſelf as you are, I ſhall be ſure to be the ſame I am, and will never change, unleſs you do.

Your expreſſions, Madam, (replied Mazares) ought to be received with fulneſs of joy: and though it do not appear in my eyes, yet my heart is moſt ſenſible of it: But, Madam, I beſeech you pardon an unvoluntary melancholy, which perhaps will appear in my face againſt my will, ſince it is the only thing which you ſhall ever have any cauſe to chide me for: Since it is ſo (replied ſhe) I will pity, in lieu of chiding you, but do not think it ſtrange if I never ask you the cauſe of your ſadneſs. As Mandana ſaid ſo, one came to tell her that all things were ready for her departure; and preſently after Oneſile, the Princeſs of Bythinia, Iſtrina, Arpaſia, and Telegenes, came into her Chamber, and ſo dreſt, and ſo fair, as it was evident that joy is a wonderful advantage unto Beauty. Yet the Princeſs of Bythinia was in Mourning, but ſo, that her Beauty appeared not a jot the leſs.

As for Mandana, ſhe was never ſo fair as that day: And when Cyrus came into her Chamber to preſent his hand unto her, and to conduct her unto her Coach, he was ſo ſurprized and dazled at her Beauty, that he ſtood a long while gazing, and adoring it: For ſince he had never ſeen her ſo dreſt, nor ſo merry, ſince his departure from Cumes, he thought her more charming than ever, and he was more in Love than ever: and by conſequence the diſquiet of his ſoul was the greater, though he did ſometimes flatter himſelf in a belief that it was ill grounded.

At laſt all the Glorious Train departed; The Ladies all in rich Chariots of Triumph, and all the Princes on moſt excellent Horſes, and there was not the meaneſt ſervant who had not ſome marks of his Maſters magnificence. When they were within two hundred furlongs of Ecbatane, Ciaxares and Cambyſes met them in the head of all the Perſians and Medes of quality who followed them, and ſtayed for them cloſe by a triumphant Arch, which they had erected unto the glory of Aſia's Conqueror, and Mandana's deliverer, where the Inſcriptions and Paintings were ſo ingenious, as they extolled and repreſented all the victories of that Prince. But Cyrus being as modeſt as valiant, he would not paſs under this Arch, which they had erected unto his glory, but left that honour unto Mandana, as the true cauſe of all his Conqueſts.

This interview had all the circumſtances which could poſſibly render it delightful; for there appeared ſo much joy in the Countenances of Ciaxares and Cambyſes, when they ſaw Cyrus and Mandana; and Cyrus and Mandana were ſo glad to ſee them, as they did communicate the ſame unto all that ſaw them, ſo as never was ſuch acclamations upon Earth as then. But being impatient to be in a place where they might talk, they went towards Ecbatane; and all the way there were ſtill new marks of magnificence to be ſeen, either in the Troops which were ranked on the right and left hand, or in other triumphant Arches erected to the glory of Cyrus and Mandana, or the infinite number of men of all qualities, who came far and near to meet them with Garlands and Crowns of Flowers which they preſented unto them, and caſt at their Feet in homage to them.

At the Gates of the Town ſtood all the Magiſtrates who made Orations to them: Likewiſe at the Gates of the Temple were all the Magi of Ecbatane, ready to offer Sacrifices of Thanks unto the Gods.

But as ſoon as all theſe Kings, theſe Princes, theſe Princeſſes, and Men of Quality had taken thoſe places in the Temple which were aſſigned for them, the ſame accident which hapned in the time of Aſtiages, did now happen again; for the Temple did ſhake, the Lamps extinguiſhed, all except one over the head of Cyrus, which burned ſo clear and full of Luſtre, as if all the reſt had united their lights unto it.

At the ſame time alſo, for a quarter of an hour together, was a noiſe heard in the Vaults of the Temple which reſembled Thunder, and the roaring of the Sea, and which ſtruck fear into the ſouls of all that heard it. This Prodigy did amaze all the Aſſembly; the Magi themſelves all, except one, were affrighted, and ſo were all except Cyrus, in whoſe Countenance was not the leaſt ſemblance of fear. When they offered to begin the Sacrifice, they could not end it, for all the Victims eſcaped from thoſe who held them, and the Sacrifices aſſured Ciaxares and Cambiſes, that of neceſſity they muſt defer it till another time, and appeaſe the Gods unto whom they would ſacrifice.

As for Cambiſes, he did imagine according to the Religion of his Country, that the Gods were angry, that men ſhould be ſo bold as to adore them in Temples built with prophane hands. But as for the Magi, that there was ſomething of importance which the Gods would make known unto them by it.

The chief of them, who was he which was leaſt amazed, did very well remember the interpretation which was formerly given upon thoſe Lamps which redoubled their light over the head of the Queen of Perſia: So as imagining that the Gods required this accompliſhment of that Prediction; he told Ciaxares that he muſt retire unto his Palace, and that he muſt give him time to obſerve the Stars, and turn over his Books, and to penetrate into the ſecrets of the Gods; and accordingly all this great company went out of the Temple into the Palace; but this was ſadly reſented by the Queen of Perſia, and every one talked of this prodigy according to their ſeveral fancies. As for Ciaxares who was moſt perplexed; his reaſon why the Gods were ſo angry, was, becauſe he would marry his Daughter againſt the Laws of the Cappadocian Kingdom, which would not have her marry a Stranger Prince. So that nothing being able to keep his fears within the compaſs of his own heart, he told them unto very many, and they became ſo publick, that they were the common talk, and they made ſuch deep impreſſions upon the mind of Ciaxares, that he ſent Aglatidas unto Babylon, in his name, to conſult with the Oracle of Jupiter Belus. But in the interim of this voyage, and whilſt the Magi were conſulting with the Stars and their Books, Cyrus was extreamly troubled, and Mandana for all her prudence could not chooſe but be very melancholy. Is it poſſible (ſaid ſhe unto Marteſia) that the deſtiny of Cyrus ſhould yet be doubtful ? Can it be, that after he hath been impriſoned at Synope for the love of me; after he hath ſaved the life of the King my Father in the War againſt the late King of Pontus; after he hath won two Battels in one day; after he had gloriouſly ended that War, by bringing that King into captivity; after he hath beaten the King of Aſſiria, taken Babylon, ſurprized Synope, ſubdued Armenia, won the Battel of Thybarra againſt Creſſus, taken Sardis, put the King of Pontus to flight, after he had delivered me by taking Cumes; after he has vanquiſhed Thomyris and Ariantes, and gloriouſly brought me home to Ecbatane. Can Cyrus, I ſay, doubt of a recompence for all his Conqueſts and Travels? He who above all this hath been thought twice to be dead; who was mangled almoſt in pieces after the combat of two hundred; who has received ſeveral moſt dangerous wounds beſides, in ſeveral Encounters; who hath been Priſoner both of War and State for the love of me, and who hath given me a million of teſtimonies of his Love, muſt he now be ſlighted? Whilſt Mandana was thus complaining, and whilſt Marteſia was comforting her, all the Town were at their Prayers to appeaſe the Gods.

But at laſt Aglatidas returned from Babylon, who after he had conſulted with the Oracle in the name of Ciaxares, whether he might give his Daughter unto Cyrus, ſince he was a Perſian, and ſince the Cappadocian Laws did prohibit that Princeſs to marry a Stranger, he was returned this anſwer.

The Oracle

Out of your thoughts expel
All fears of any danger,
Who can all Aſia quell,
In no place is a Stranger.

This favourable anſwer did ſo rejoyce the hearts of Ciaxares, Cambiſes, the Queen of Perſia, Cyrus, Mandana, and all that heard it; that it may be termed a publick joy; eſpecially becauſe it concurred with the Dooms of the Magi, who rendred an account unto Ciaxares and Cambiſes of all their obſervations before all the Princes in the Court: For the chief of the Magi addreſſing his ſpeech unto the two Kings, told them a thing which made him the more wonderful, becauſe it concurred with the ſecret thoughts of their own ſouls, although they did not impart them unto any.

Sirs (ſaid he unto them) upon a recollection into my memory of things paſt; and when I think upon that Prodigy which hapned, when the Lights of ſeveral Lamps united themſelves unto that which was over the head of the Queen of Perſia; after, I ſay, a compariſon of that with this which we have ſeen over the head of the illuſtrious Cyrus; I examined the interpretation which was then upon it; I have conſulted with the moſt learned books we have; I have ſeriouſly obſerved the Stars, I have ſo clearly read in Characters of Gold, and Light, the will of the Gods, that I cannot make any more doubt of it.

And Sirs (continued he and looked upon Ciaxares and Cambiſes) that which the Gods do require of you is, that you refer the whole cares of your Kingdoms upon the Government of the invincible Cyrus, and that you leaving off Sovereign Authority, he may be the ſole Soveraign over all Aſia; ſo many Kings as he hath ſubdued, do teach us that the Gods would have all obey him, and this is the interpretation of all the Lights extinguiſhing and re-uniting again in one over the head of Cyrus, as thoſe were heretofore over the head of the Queen his Mother: Yes, Sirs, I dare aſſure you, that if you do, as I now ſay, you will ſatisfie the Will of the Gods, your Sacrifices will be acceptable unto them, and you will ſee no more Prodigies to aſtoniſh you.

But on the contrary, you will peaceably enjoy all the pleaſures of Life under the ſhadow of Cyrus his Palms and Trophies, you will reign in his Perſon, and without your being his Subjects, he may yet be the ſole Soveraign over all Aſia.

Conform your ſelves therefore unto the Will of Heaven: And that you may both conjunctly reign in the Perſon of this great Prince, make up the marriage immediately between Mandana and him.

This Magi had no ſooner done ſpeaking, but Ciaxares and Cambiſes declared their wills unto him, and told him that they were ready to conform themſelves unto the Will of the Gods.

The modeſty of Cyrus was ſuch, that he refuſed to accept the Soveraign Power, which the Kings would have yeilded up unto him; but they were ſo urgent upon him, and the Magi told him ſo peremptorily that the Gods would have it ſo, as without any more delay, Ciaxares and Cambiſes made a publick declaration the next day, by which they made it known unto all the World, that they did voluntarily inveſt their Authorities in the hands of Cyrus, and accordingly the chief of the Magi in Ecbatane in the preſence of all the Court, and in the midſt of as many people as that Temple was able to hold, did inveſt him with all the Ceremonies and Signs of Soveraign Authority, that is to ſay, with a Scepter, a Royal wreath, and all other things which diſtinguiſh the Kings of Perſia, and the Kings of Medes from other Princes. Ciaxares would have thrown at his feet as many Crowns as he had conquered Kingdoms, and made Tributary Kings: But Cyrus would not have it ſo, not only out of modeſty, but in conſideration of Creſſus and Myrſiles, whom he highly eſteemed and ranked as his friends. The moſt obſervable was, that the Sacrifice which was offered after Cyrus was declared

King, was very acceptably received: And the Magi aſſured Cyaxares and Cambyſes, that the Gods whom they adored, were never better pleaſed.

But after this magnificent Ceremony was accompliſhed, Cyrus had a moſt impatient deſire to ſee Mandana, that he might offer unto her all the Crowns which he had taken upon him: And diſengaging himſelf as ſoon as he could, he went unto her to tender that Homage, and to aſſure her that he thought himſelf more glorious in being her Slave, than in being Maſter of ſo many Kingdoms.

In the mean time, the day of Marriage being ſet down, nothing was thought upon but preparations for that glorious Ceremony: And Cyrus being a moſt dear lover of his friends, he thought alſo of their ſatisfaction. Therefore he perſwaded the Princeſs of Bythinia, who had full power over her ſelf, to make Intaphernes happy: As for Gadates, he did voluntarily conſent unto it: And Cyrus after that perſwaded that Prince to give Iſtrina unto Atergatis: As for Arpaſia, ſhe was in a ſtrange condition: For ſhe did ſo reſent the abſence of Meliantes, that Hydaſpes was hardly pleaſed: and ſhe was in many minds to recall Meliantes, though at the rate of Hydaſpes his Baniſhment: and yet ſhe was reſolved to marry him, becauſe Gabrias her Father did ſo command her: But certain it is, ſhe had much ado to carry her ſelf between her love, and her friendſhip, ſince ſhe neither made her ſelf, nor any of her friends happy, for Hydaſpes was but half contented, after he had married her.

But when Cyrus went about to ſatisfie the love of the Prince Myrſiles, he found himſelf a little puzled, not that Creſſus was againſt the affection of the Prince his Son: For though the quality of Doraliſa was inferiour unto that Prince, yet conſidering the ſtate of things he did not inſiſt upon it: But the main difficulty was, how Myrſiles ſhould be aſſured of her Love before he married her; for Doraliſa would never confeſs it, though thoſe who knew her beſt, believed that ſhe did not hate Myrſiles. However, ſhe ſpoke always either ſo lightly, or ſo ſharply, or ſo negligently of it, that none knew well what to think; and which was rare, Cyrus did ſooner perſwade her to marry Myrſiles, than he could perſwade her to confeſs that ſhe loved him: But after ſhe was reſolved upon it, ſhe did this favour unto that Prince in a very pleaſant manner: For (ſaid ſhe unto him) I know not why you ſhould complain, Sir; 'tis true, I tell you that I do only eſteem you, but it is not that I do no more; but the reaſon is, becauſe I want words to expreſs the thoughts of my heart, and therefore I had rather have you gueſs at my mind, than down-right tell you what it is.

But at laſt, after the modeſty, and humour of Doraliſa together, had made her ſay yes, and no, unto all the propoſitions which were made unto her, whether ſhe would marry or not marry; at laſt ſhe explained her ſelf that ſhe conſented to marry the Prince Myrſiles: And theſe four marriages being reſolved upon, it was alſo reſolved that they ſhould be ſolemnized three days after that of Cyrus, to the end that the joyes of that Court might the longer continue: And certainly that Court was the moſt glorious that ever was ſeen, for there was not a man nor woman of any quality in all Media who was not there. The lovely Amiſtris alſo had quitted the ſolitude wherein ſhe lived, during the abſence of her dear Aglatidas, and came unto Ecbatane, whereof ſhe was ſtill one of the greateſt Ornaments.

But the day deſigned for the compleat felicity of Cyrus being come, the Temple where the Ceremony of his Marriage was to be celebrated, was illuminated with a thouſand glorious Lamps: All the Streets of Ecbatane were hung with rich Sydonian Tapiſtry, Arches, Pyramides, Obeliſques, and Garlands were erected and hung up to the glory of Cyrus and Mandana, all between the Palace and the Temple, whoſe Inſcriptions being a mixture of Love and War, did embleme as well the grandure of his paſſion, as the grandure of his Conqueſts. Moſt admirable Muſick made the Roof of the Temple eccho all the while of the Ceremony: Never were ſeen ſo many Kings and Princes in one place, as in that; and never did a Royal Chaplet become any head ſo well, as that of Cyrus.

As for Mandana, the Majeſty of her deportment was ſuch, as would have been an Ornament unto the whole World: And her beauty appeared ſo ſplendent that day, as ſhe eclipſed all the reſt of the Ladies, as much as the deportment, the ſpirit, the valour, and the virtue of Cyrus did ſurpaſs the merits of all other men upon earth. Both of them were the objects of admiration unto all thoſe who beheld them upon that ſtately Throne which was erected in the middle of the Temple: Yet this Ceremony was not honoured with the preſence of the Prince Mazares; for he finding his ſoul not reſolute enough to behold the felicity of his Rival, he returned into his own Country the night before the Marriage of Cyrus: But before he went, he left one Letter for Cyrus, and another for Mandana, in which he uſed ſuch noble expreſſions of himſelf, as did ſo double the eſteem which they had of him, that could he have ſeen their thoughts, he had been well ſatisfied. Indeed he did very well deſerve their eſteem; for he asked them pardon for his weakneſs; he aſſured Mandana that he would never marry; he told Cyrus, that ſince he was never like to have an Heir, he intended that all his Subjects hereafter ſhould become his, to the end Mandana might reign over the Saces, as well as in his heart.

Yet their ſorrows for the departure of Mazares did not hinder, but that they eſteemed themſelves infinitely happy, in that the Gods had made their Fortunes inſeparable, and that they had tied ſuch an indiſſolvable knot, which nothing but death could untie. The three days after this great Ceremony were ſpent in Feaſts and Jollity: and the fourth was the Marriage of Myrſiles, Intaphernes, Atergatis, and Hidaſpes celebrated, and for a whole month after, there was nothing but publick rejoycings, and diverſions in this great Court.

Cyrus had then information that Thomyris was returned unto the Tents Royal, and that Agathyrſis had poſſeſſed himſelf of Iſſidon, whilſt Themyris was ſo ſunk in ſorrow, that all the Maſſagettans were preparing to diſinthrone her, and that Elibeſis was become a Subject unto him, unto whom ſhe had been unfaithful, in hopes of being a Queen.

After this, Cyrus received Deputations from all the Kingdoms which he had Conquered; from all the principal Cities which were under his obedience, and from all the Princes who were his Tributaries; from Babylon, from Suſa, from Sardis, Epheſus, Cumes, Sinope, Themiſcire, Artaxates, Apamea, Guide, and others, he received Homage. Thoſe who were riſen againſt Arſamones, ſent alſo their Deputies to offer unto him the Crowns of Pontus and Bythinia: Alſo he had particular Deputies from Heraclea and Chryſopolis. The King of Phrygia ſent unto him his Embaſſadors with rich Preſents: The Queen Tarina, Mother of Mazares did the like: The Prince of Cilicia as much; the King of Armenia the ſame: The Prince Philoxipe alſo ſent to rejoyce with Cyrus, that the Oracle which the Princeſs of Salamis had received, was ſo happily accompliſhed in his perſon.

Amaſis King of Ægypt, the Prince Seſoſtris his Son, and the fair Timarette ſent to congratulate his Marriage: The Prince Thraſibulus ſent his Complements: The King of Hircania, and the Prince Meliantes did the like. Pittacus as much, and all the Sages of Greece writ unto him to teſtifie their joy, that Fortune had done Juſtice to his Virtue.

After all this, Cambyſes and the Queen his Wife returned unto Perſepolis, where they did nothing but devote themſelves unto prayers unto the Gods, though Cyrus commanded Adaſius, whom he ſent to command in Perſia, to take their Counſels in all things. Tygranes and Oneſile returned unto Artaxates, admiring the Virtue both of Cyrus and Mandana: Salamis their Kinſman, followed them. Intaphernes with the Princeſs of Bythinia went unto Chriſipolis with the quality of a tributary King. Atergatis and Iſtrina followed, Gadates, Hidaſpes and Arpaſia went with Gabrias. The Prince Artamas returned unto his dear Palmis: Creſſus, Myrſiles, and Doraliſa ſtayd in the Court of Cyrus: The Prince of Paphlagonia married Telegene, and returned into his Country. Chriſantes had the government of Lydia, Aglatidas that of Babylon, Ligdamis that of Epheſus, and returned towards his dear Cleonice: Araſpes that of Cappadocia: Thraſimedes that of Curia, for the Curians did voluntarily ſubmit themſelves unto Cyrus: Feraulas he waited ſtill about his perſon, and marryed Marteſia a while after: Megabiſes was ſent into a part of Arabia, which gave it ſelf up unto Cyrus: And this great Prince was ſo well able to recompence out of the greatneſs of his Conqueſts, that there was not one of thoſe who had done him any ſervice, which were not fully ſatisfied with his liberality. Ciaxares himſelf was well contented to be without Soveraign Power, though ſuch an act is ſeldom unaccompanied without repentance.

Thus, the greateſt Prince in the World, after he had been the moſt miſerable of all Lovers, became now the happieſt man upon Earth: For he was the poſſeſſor of the greateſt Beauty in all Aſia, of the moſt virtuous perſon in the whole World, and a perſon whoſe great Soul tranſcended the excellency of her Beauty, and one who loved him, as well as he loved her. Moreover his Dominions were bounded on the Eaſt with the Red Sea: On the Weſt with the Iſle of Cyprus and Ægypt: On the North with the Euxine Sea, and on the South by Ethiopia. Again, he had the advantage to ſee himſelf Maſter of all the Treaſures of David, Solomon, and Creſſus and he ſaw himſelf at a higher pitch of glory, than ever any other Priuce did. Alſo he enjoyed his pleaſures with ſo much Art, that paſſing away his Autumns at Ecbatane, his Winters at Babylon, his Summers at Suſa, it was an eternal Spring unto him without the inconveniency either of too much cold, or too much heat. Moreover, this great Prince did with abundance of glory ſettle ſuch Orders in his Dominions, and eſtabliſhed ſuch excellent Laws both for War and Peace, that he merits to be propoſed as a model for all enſuing Princes to imitate. And to compleat his felicity, city, the Heavens did not moleſt him with the leaſt misfortune all the reſt of his life: And let both Fortune and Love conſpire together to make a man as happy as ever they could, it was impoſſible they could make him more happy than Cyrus was, ever ſince the day that he aſcended ſo high a Throne, that all others on the Earth were much below him.
